

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

GENERAL ORDERS AND RULES
OF
THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY,
ISSUED BY THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR.

ORDERS OF COURT.

THE Right Honourable FREDERIC Lord Chelmsford, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of The Right Honourable Sir JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, The Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT BRUCE, The Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir GEORGE JAMES TURNER, The Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir RICHARD TOBIN KINDERSLEY, The Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir JOHN STUART, and The Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, Doth hereby, in pursuance and execution of all powers and authorities enabling him in that behalf, Order and direct that all and every the Rules, Orders, and Directions hereinafter set forth, be, and for all purposes be deemed and taken to be, General Rules and Orders of the High Court of Chancery.—

1. In the following Orders, unless there be something in the subject-matter or context repugnant to such a construction, words expressed in the singular and in the plural number respectively, shall be construed as applicable respectively to several persons or things, or to one person or thing; the word "Order" shall include a Decree; words importing the masculine gender shall include females; the word party shall mean any person appearing at the hearing of the cause, or of the application respectively, as the case may be, and shall include a body politic or corporate, and when any period is specified, the same shall be computed exclusive of vacations.

2. At the time of bespeaking an Order, the person bespeaking the same is to leave with the Registrar his counsel's briefs, and such other documents as may be required by the Registrar for the purpose of enabling him to draw up the same.

3. Every order is to be bespoken, and the briefs and such other documents as by Order 2. are required to be left with the Registrar on bespeaking the same, are to be so left within seven days after the Order is pronounced or finally disposed of by the Court.

4. In case any Order is not bespoken, and the briefs and other requisite documents left with the Registrar within the time prescribed by Order 3., the Registrar may decline to draw up the Order without the leave of the Court.

5. At the time of delivering out the draft of any Order which requires to be settled by the Registrar in the presence of the parties, the Registrar is to deliver out to the party on whose application the draft has been prepared, an appointment in writing of a time for settling the same.

6. A copy of such appointment is to be served on the opposite party one clear day at least before the time fixed thereby for settling the draft Order, and the party serving such copy, and the party so served, are to attend such appointment, and to produce to the Registrar their briefs, and such other documents, as may be necessary to enable him to settle the draft.

7. Service of such appointment is to be effected by leaving a copy thereof at the place for service of the party to be served, or by transmitting a copy thereof by the post to such party at such place for service.

8. At the time fixed for settling the draft, the original appointment, together with a memorandum indorsed thereon of the service of a copy thereof on the opposite party, and signed by the person by whom such service was effected, shall be delivered to the Registrar, in order that he may be satisfied that service has been duly effected: but the Registrar may require such service to be verified by affidavit.

9. When the draft Order has been settled by the Registrar, he is to name a time in the presence of the several parties, or else to deliver out an appointment in writing of a time for passing the order, which appointment is to be served on the opposite party in like manner, as directed by Order 7, with reference to an appointment to settle the draft Order, and similar evidence of service thereof is to be produced and received.

10. If any party fails to attend the Registrar's appointment to settle the draft of any Order, or to pass the Order, or to produce his briefs and such other documents as the Registrar may require to enable him to settle such draft, or pass such Order, the Registrar may proceed to settle the draft or pass the Order in his absence.

11. In any case in which the Registrar may not think fit to proceed in the absence of the party failing to attend or to produce his briefs, and such other documents as aforesaid, the Registrar is to be at liberty to dispense with the production of counsel's briefs, and to act upon such evidence as he may think fit, of the actual appearance by counsel of the party failing to attend or to produce such documents or papers as aforesaid, or may require the matter to be mentioned to the Court.

12. The Registrar's appointment may be in the following form:—

Chancery Registrar's Office, Chancery Lane.

or, "In the matter of A."

I have appointed the day of 1859, at Eleven o'clock in the forenoon, to settle the draft of the Decree [or, "Order"], [or, "to pass the Decree or Order"], pronounced in this cause [or, "matter"] by [The Master of the Rolls] on the day of

H. E. BICKNELL,
Registrar.

13. The Registrar's appointments, with the indorsements (if any) thereon, are to be filed by the Registrar.

14. The Registrar may adjourn any appointment to settle the draft of any Order, or to pass the Order to such time as he may think fit, and the parties who attended the appointment shall be bound to attend such adjournment without further notice.

15. Notwithstanding the preceding Orders, the Registrar is to be at liberty, in any case in which he may think it expedient so to do, to settle and pass the Order without making any appointment for either purpose, and without notice to any party.

16. At the foot of every petition presented to the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, a statement is to be made of the parties or persons, if any, intended to be served therein; and if no party or person is intended to be served with such petition, a statement to that effect is to be made at the foot of the petition.

17. Where any person is by any Order directed to pay any money or deliver up any property to another, it shall not be necessary to make any demand of the money or other property directed to be paid or delivered; but the person directed to pay such money or deliver up such property shall be bound to pay or deliver over the same upon being duly served with such Order without demand, and process of contempt may issue accordingly to enforce performance thereof.

18. These Orders shall take effect and come into operation on the 15th day of April, 1859.

ORDER OF COURT,

Monday, the 4th day of April, in the 22nd Year of the Reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria, 1859.

THE Right Honourable FREDERIC BARON CHELMSFORD, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of The Right Honourable SIR JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, The Right Honourable SIR JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT BRUCE, and The Right Honourable SIR GEORGE JAMES TURNER, the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, The Honourable the Vice Chancellor, SIR RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, The Honourable the Vice Chancellor, SIR JOHN STUART, and The Honourable the Vice Chancellor, SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, Doth hereby, in pursuance of the Act passed in the Session of Parliament holden in the 21st and 22nd years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the course of procedure in the High Court of Chancery, the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and the Court of Chancery in the County Palatine of Lancaster," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, Order and direct in manner following, that is to say :—

1. These Orders are, as to all suits now depending or hereafter to be commenced, to take effect on the day of the date hereof.

2. In these Orders the following words have the several meanings hereby assigned to them over and above their several ordinary meanings, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, videlicet :—

1. Words importing the singular number include the plural number, and words importing the plural number include the singular number.
2. Words importing the masculine gender include females.
3. The word person or party includes a body politic or corporate.
4. The word plaintiff includes informant.

3. Any question of fact, or any question as to the amount of damages which shall in any suit or proceeding be directed by any order to be tried by a jury before the Court itself, or before the Court itself without a jury, shall be reduced into writing in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders, and the same shall be copied on parchment by the plaintiff or such party or person as the Court shall direct, or by the solicitor for such plaintiff, party or person, and shall be called the "Record for Trial," and the same shall be filed with the Clerk of Records and Writs in whose division such suit or proceeding may be, within three days after such Order shall have been passed and entered, and within three days after such filing as aforesaid the same shall be entered for trial as hereinafter mentioned.

4. Where the Court shall order that such question or questions should be tried by a special jury, a direction to that effect shall be contained in the order directing such trial.

5. Upon production to the Registrar of a certificate of the Clerk of Records and Writs that the "Record for Trial" has been filed, the same shall be entered for trial in the Cause Book of the Judge to whose Court the suit or proceeding is attached, and shall be marked "Trial by Jury," or "Trial before the Court without a Jury," as the case may be, and either party may apply to the Court to fix a day for such trial.

6. Where such trial is to take place by a common jury before the Court itself, the plaintiff or such party or person as aforesaid, is, ten days at the least before the day fixed for such trial, to obtain, on motion or petition as of course, and serve on the Sheriff, or, if he is interested in the matter in question, then upon the Coroner, an order for such Sheriff or Coroner to summon a common jury for such trial, which Order shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

7. Where the Court shall have specially directed such question or questions to be tried by a special jury, the plaintiff, or other such party or person as aforesaid, shall, ten days at the least before the day fixed for such trial, obtain on a motion a petition as of course, and serve on the Sheriff or Coroner as aforesaid, and on the opposite party an Order for a special jury, which Order shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders, and the expense of such special jury shall in the first instance be borne and paid by the plaintiff or other such party or person as aforesaid, but shall afterwards be paid and borne as the Court shall direct.

8. Where the Court shall not have specially directed such question or questions to be tried by a special jury, either party shall be at liberty, fourteen days at the least before the day fixed for such trial, to obtain on motion or petition of course, an Order for a special jury, and shall serve the same on the opposite party twelve days at the least, and on the Sheriff or Coroner ten days at the least, before the day fixed for such trial, and the expense of such special jury shall in the first instance be borne by the party obtaining the same; but if the Court upon such trial shall be of opinion that it was proper that such trial should be had by a special jury, the Court may give such directions as to the costs thereof as it shall think fit.

9. Where an Order shall have been made for a special jury, such Sheriff or Coroner shall, in addition to the special jurors, summon twelve common jurymen for such trial, in order that, in the event of a sufficient number of special jurors not being in attendance to make a jury, a tales may be ordered by the Court or prayed for by either party, as hereinafter provided for.

10. The Order for any such common or special jury as aforesaid shall be returned by such Sheriff or Coroner to the solicitor or party or person who shall have lodged the same, together with his return and the jury panel, and such Order and jury panel shall, two days at the least before the day of trial, be left with the Clerk of Records and Writs to be annexed to the Record for trial.

11. Where the trial shall have been specially directed by the Court to be by a special jury, then in the event of there not being a sufficient number of special jurymen in attendance to make such jury, it shall be in the discretion of the Court whether or not to have such jury made up from the common jurymen in attendance.

12. Where a special jury shall have been summoned at the instance of either party, without the special direction of the Court, then in the event of a sufficient number of special jurymen not being in attendance to make such jury, the same shall, unless the Court shall otherwise direct, be made up from the common jurymen in attendance, on the application of either party.

13. Either party shall be at liberty to apply by summons to a Judge at chambers for a view by the jury summoned for any trial, and on the hearing of such summons each party shall name a shower for such view, and any order to be made on such application shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

14. The summons for a view, and the order to be made thereon, shall state the place at which the view is to be made, and the distance thereof from the office of the Under-Sheriff; and the sum to be deposited in the hands of the Under-Sheriff shall be 10*l*. in case of a common jury, and 16*l*. in case of a special jury, if such distance shall not exceed five miles, and 15*l*. in case of a common jury, and 21*l*. in case of a special jury, if it shall be above five miles; and if such sum shall be more than sufficient to pay the expenses of the view, the surplus shall forthwith be returned to the solicitor or party who obtained the view, and if such sum shall not be sufficient to pay such expenses the deficiency shall forthwith be paid by such solicitor or party to the Under-Sheriff, and the Under-Sheriff shall pay and account for the money so deposited according to the scale following, that is to say:—

For travelling expenses to the Under-Sheriff, showers, and jurymen, expenses actually paid, if reasonable.
Fee to the Under-Sheriff when the distance does not exceed five miles from his office.	1	1	0
Where such distance exceeds five miles	2	2	0
And in case he shall be necessarily absent more than one day, then for each day after the first, a further fee of	1	1	0
Fee to each of the showers, the same as the Under-Sheriff, calculating the distance from their respective places of abode.
Fee to common jurymen, each per diem	0	5	0
For each special jurymen, per diem	1	1	0
Allowance for refreshment to the Under-Sheriff, showers, and jurymen, whether common or special, each per diem		0	5	0
To the bailiff, for summoning each jurymen whose residence shall not be more than five miles distant from the office of the Under-Sheriff.	0	2	6
And to each whose residence does exceed five miles of such distance	0	5	0

15. The mode and practice of proceeding to nominate and reduce a special jury, and the proceedings after any order for a view shall have been made as aforesaid, shall be the same in all respects as are now or for the time being shall be in force in the superior courts of common law, when a special jury is ordered to be struck, or a view is to be had, or as near thereto as the practice of this Court will admit.

16. The notice to admit documents may be according to the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

17. Where the Court shall award damages and direct a trial as to the amount of such damages before the Court itself, either with or without a jury or a writ of inquiry of damages as hereinafter provided for, or an inquiry as to the amount of damages in any other manner, the defendant or other the party or person against whom damages shall have been awarded may take out a summons before a Judge at chambers for liberty to pay into court a sum of money in respect of such damages, and in case such liberty shall be given and a sum of money shall be paid into court accordingly, then in the event of a larger sum for damages not being awarded, than the amount so paid into court, the plaintiff or party or person seeking such damages, shall pay the costs of such trial or writ of inquiry or inquiry in any such other manner as aforesaid, unless the Court shall otherwise direct.

18. On the day appointed for any trial, and previously to the commencement thereof, the record for trial with the return and jury panel (if any) annexed thereto, shall be transmitted by the Clerk of Records and Writs to the Registrar of the Court in attendance, and a copy thereof shall be left for the Judge before whom such trial is appointed to be had, by the party or person at whose instance the same may have been entered for trial.

19. The jurors shall be called by the Registrar of the Court, and the oath shall be administered to them by such Registrar, and shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders, and the oath (or declaration as the case may be) shall also be administered by the Registrar of the Court to the witnesses, and shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

20. Upon every such trial the addresses to the jury or to the Court, as the case may be, shall be regulated as follows :—The party who begins, or his counsel, shall be allowed, in the event of his opponent not announcing at the close of the case of the party who begins, his intention to adduce evidence, to address the jury a second time at the close of such case, for the purpose of summing up such evidence, and the party on the other side, or his counsel, shall be allowed to open the case, and also to sum up the evidence (if any), and the right to reply shall be the same as at present in force in the superior courts of common law on trials at Nisi Prius.

21. Where the jury shall retire from the court to consider their verdict, they shall be taken charge of by the Usher of the Court; but previously thereto the Registrar of the Court shall administer to such Usher the oath according to the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

22. The verdict or finding of the jury, or of the Court, as the case may be, shall be indorsed by the Registrar of the Court on the Record for the Trial, and shall be signed by him, and then returned to the Office of the Clerks of Records and Writs to be filed, and if the trial shall have been by a jury, then with the jury panel and the names of the jurors who were sworn indorsed thereon.

23. The notice of any application for a new trial, whether to the Judge before whom such trial shall have been had, or to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, shall be given for the times following, that is to say :—If such trial shall have been had in Hilary, Trinity, or Michaelmas Term, then not later than for the third seal after such terms respectively; and if such trial shall have been had in Easter Term, or during the sittings after Hilary, Trinity, or Michaelmas Term, then not later than for the third motion day in the term then next ensuing.

24. Where the Court shall award damages to any party or person, by virtue of the powers contained in the 2nd section of the said Act, and shall order the amount of such damages to be assessed by a jury before any Judge of one of the superior courts of common law at Nisi Prius, or at the assizes, or before the sheriff of any county or city, the party or person to whom such damages shall be awarded shall be at liberty to sue out at the Office of the Clerks of Records and Writs a Writ of Inquiry of damages according to the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders.

25. The rules now in force in the courts of common law relative to Notices of Inquiry shall be applicable to Notices of Inquiry under any Writ of Inquiry to be issued by virtue of the last preceding Order.

26. The return to the Writ of Inquiry of the verdict or inquisition, shall be in the form set forth in the Schedule to these Orders, and the Writ of Inquiry, with such return thereto, shall, within ten days after such return, be filed at the Office of the Clerks of Records and Writs.

27. Any application to set aside the verdict or inquisition or any such Writ of Inquiry, and to direct a new inquiry, shall be made within ten days after the filing thereof, exclusive of any days on which the Court to which such application ought to be made shall not be sitting.

28. Either party shall be at liberty to sue out at the Record and Writ Clerks' Office subpoenas ad testificandum, and subpoenas duces tecum, to compel the attendance of witnesses on any trial according to the forms now, or which for the time being shall be in use in this Court or as near thereto as the circumstances of each case will admit.

29. The forms of proceedings contained in the Schedule to these Orders may be used in the cases to which they are applicable, with such alterations as the circumstances of the case may render necessary; and any variance therefrom, not being a matter of substance, shall not affect their validity or regularity.

OF

ISSUED BY THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR.

ORDERS OF COURT.

1. In these Orders, unless there be something in the subject-matter or context repugnant to such a construction, words expressed in the singular and in the plural number respectively, shall be construed as applied respectively to several persons or things, or to one person or thing; words importing the masculine gender shall include females; "the Accountant General" shall mean the Accountant General of the High Court of Chancery; the expression "the Bank" shall mean the Governor and Company of the Bank of England; the word "person" shall mean any person, whether such person shall be a party to a suit or not, and shall include a body corporate or politic; the word "Order" shall include a Decree; the word "money" shall include interest or dividends on stock or securities, or any accumulations of interest or dividends.

2. Where, under or in pursuance of any General or Special Order, any money shall be invested in the name of the Accountant General, and with his privity, in the purchase of any stocks, funds, shares or securities, or any stocks, funds, shares or securities shall be transferred into his name and with his privity in the books of the Bank or of any other public company, he is to declare the trust thereof to be to attend the Order of this Court, without any direction for that purpose in the Order directing such investment or transfer.

3. For the purpose of any payment or investment to be made under any General or Special Order of or out of any money in the Bank on the credit of any cause, matter, or account, the Accountant General is (without any direction for that purpose in such Order) to draw on the Bank according to the form prescribed by the Act of Parliament made and passed in the twelfth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the First, intituled "An Act for the better securing the Monies and Effects of the Suitors of the Court of Chancery, and to prevent the counterfeiting of East India Bonds and Indorsements thereon, and likewise Indorsements on South Sea Bonds," and the General Rules and Orders of this Court in that case made and provided.

4. Where any stocks, funds, shares, or securities standing in the books of the Bank or of any other public company, in the name of the Accountant General, in trust in or to the credit of any cause, matter, or account, shall by any Order be directed to be sold, the same are to be sold with the privity of the Accountant General, and one of the cashiers of the Bank is to have notice to attend and receive the money to arise by such sale, and upon receipt thereof, is forthwith to pay the same into the Bank, with the privity of the Accountant General, to the credit of the cause, matter, or account in which such stocks, funds, shares or securities were standing immediately before the sale, without any direction for that purpose in the Order directing such sale.

5. Where any money is directed to be paid out of court to the legal personal representatives of any person, or to any persons as legal personal representatives, the same or any portion thereof for the time being remaining unpaid, may, upon proof to the Accountant General of the death of any of such legal personal representatives, whether before, on or after the day of the date of the order, be paid to the survivors or survivor of them.

6. Where any money is directed to be paid out of court to any person named in the Order, or named or to be named in any report or certificate, or his legal personal representatives, the same or any portion thereof for the time being remaining unpaid, may, on proof to the Accountant General of the death of such person, whether before, on, or after the day of the date of the Order, be paid to such legal personal representatives or the survivors or survivor of them.

7. Where any stocks, funds, shares or securities are directed to be transferred or delivered out of court to the legal personal representatives of any person, or to any persons as legal personal representatives of any person, the Registrar may, upon proof of the death of any such representatives, whether before, on, or after the day of the date of the order, issue a certificate authorizing the transfer or delivery of such stocks, funds, shares, or securities, to the survivors or survivor of them; and where any stocks, funds, shares or securities are directed to be transferred or delivered out of court to any person, or his legal personal representatives, the Registrar may, upon proof of the death of such person, whether before, on, or after the day of the date of the order, issue a certificate authorizing the transfer or delivery of such stocks, funds, shares, or securities, to such legal personal representatives, or the survivors or survivor of them. And in any of the cases hereinbefore mentioned, such stocks, funds, shares or securities, may be transferred or delivered accordingly.

8. No principal sum of money, nor any stocks, funds, shares, or securities, shall, under Order 6. or Order 7, be paid, transferred or delivered out of court to the legal personal representatives of any person, under any probate or letters of administration purporting to be granted at any time subsequent to the expiration of six years from the day of the date of the order directing such payment, transfer, or delivery.

9. No interest or dividends shall, under Order 6, be paid out of court to the legal personal representatives of any person, under any probate or letters of administration purporting to be granted at any time subsequent to the expiration of six years after the day of the date of the order directing such payment, or after the last receipt of such interest or dividends under such order, which shall last happen.

10. Where any money is directed to be paid out of court to any persons named or to be named in a Master's Report or Chief Clerk's Certificate, and such money shall by such Report or Certificate be certified to be due to them as partners, the same may be paid to any one or more of such partners.

11. Where, upon or after the death of any person to whom the interest or dividends of any stocks, funds, shares, or securities standing in the name of the Accountant General, in trust in or to the credit of any cause, matter or account, or any part of such interest or dividends, were or was payable for life, an Order shall be made for the sale, transfer, or delivery of such stocks, funds, shares or securities, or for payment of the interest or dividends to accrue due thereon subsequently to the death of such person; the same Order shall also provide for the payment to the legal personal representatives of such person, of such proportion of the interest or dividends on such stocks, funds, shares, or securities, as shall have accrued between the last period of payment, and the day of his death, unless the Court or Judge shall be of opinion that such legal personal representatives are not entitled thereto, or shall for any other reason otherwise direct.

12. The amounts of residues, and shares of residues, by the 28th General Order of the 21st day of December 1833, directed to be ascertained and specified by affidavit, shall be specified and ascertained by affidavit, without any direction for that purpose in the Order directing the application of any such residues or shares, unless such residues or shares shall be certified by the Taxing Master, who is to be at liberty to certify the same without a direction for that purpose in such Order.

13. Where any costs are by any Order directed to be taxed, and to be paid out of any money in court, the Taxing Master in his certificate of taxation is to state the total amount of all such costs as taxed, without any direction for that purpose in such Order.

14. Where, by any general or special Order, any money is directed to be laid out with the privity of the Accountant General, in the purchase of Exchequer bills or bonds to be deposited in the Bank to the credit of any cause, matter or account, and where any Exchequer bills or bonds shall be deposited in the Bank, with the privity of the Accountant General, to the credit of any cause, matter or account, any principal money or interest which may thereafter be received and paid into the Bank in respect of such bills or bonds, or of any bills or bonds to be purchased with principal money or interest in pursuance of this Order, or in respect of any exchange bills or bonds, shall (unless the Order shall otherwise direct), from time to time as the same shall be so received and paid into the Bank, be also laid out in the purchase of Exchequer bills or bonds, with the privity of the Accountant General, and such Exchequer bills or bonds, when so purchased, shall be deposited in the Bank with the privity of the Accountant General, and placed to the credit of the same cause, matter, or account, subject to the further order of the Court.

15. Where any stocks, funds, shares or securities, standing in the name of the Accountant General, in trust in or to the credit of any cause, matter, or account, or any part thereof, shall be directed to be divided and transferred or delivered out of court to or among several persons, or to be carried over to several separate accounts; and where any money shall be directed to be paid out to or among several persons, or carried over to several separate accounts, the Registrar shall be at liberty, where it shall appear to him to be more convenient so to do, to state the respective amounts of such stocks, funds, shares, securities or money to be so transferred, paid or carried over, in a schedule at the foot of the Order; and it shall be sufficient to refer to such schedule in the mandatory part of the Order; but in every such case, the total amount of the stocks, funds, shares, securities or money, respectively, to be dealt with in such schedule, shall be stated in words at length in the mandatory part of the Order.

16. In taking any account directed by any Order, all just allowances shall be made, without any direction for that purpose in such Order.

17. Where, by any Order, any recognizance shall be directed to be vacated, the Clerk of Enrolments shall, on due notice thereof, attend the Master of the Rolls for that purpose, without any direction for that purpose in such Order.

18. In any order where the words "the Judge" shall be used, such expression shall mean the Judge to whose Court the cause or matter wherein such Order is made is for the time being attached. Where the words "the Taxing Master" are used, such expression shall mean the Taxing Master in rotation, or, in case any previous reference shall have been made, the Taxing Master to whom the cause or matter stands referred, as the case may be; and where the words "the Clerk of Records and Writs" shall be used, such expression shall mean the Clerk of Records and Writs in whose division the cause or matter wherein such order is made, is.

19. Where any cause shall have been standing for one year in the Cause Book, marked as "abated," or standing over generally, such cause shall, at the expiration of the year, be struck out of the Cause Book.

CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED

IN THE

Courts of Chancery,

AND ON APPEAL TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

COMMENCING WITH

MICHAELMAS TERM, 22 VICTORIÆ.

Nov. 2. } WELLESLEY v. WELLESLEY.

Practice—Enrolment of Decree—Extension of Time.

Although the Court is disposed to take a lenient view of circumstances, which may have prevented an appeal from being prosecuted within five years, yet after that time it is desirable that the Orders as to enrolment, &c. should be strictly adhered to.

A decree was made in 1849, and an order on further directions in March 1853. In 1854 the plaintiff enrolled the former order. In 1858 a decree was made in another suit, which was considered favourable to a defendant in this suit; and he applied to enrol the order of March 1853, as the five years had so recently expired, and he had been for some years resident out of the kingdom; but the Court refused the application.

This was a motion, on behalf of the defendant Beavan, that an order on further directions, made on the 14th of March 1853, and a subsequent order, dated the 17th of July 1855, might be enrolled, notwithstanding the time limited by the General Order had expired. The application was made under the 6th General Order of the 7th of August 1852, relating to enrolment of decrees, &c., and which is as follows:—“That the Lord Chancellor, either sitting alone, or with the Lords Justices, or either of them, shall be at liberty, when it shall appear to him under the peculiar circumstances of the case to be just and expedient, to enlarge the periods hereinbefore appointed for a rehearing or an appeal, or for an enrolment.”

By a decree, made in July 1849, the plaintiff (the present Countess of Mornington) was declared to be entitled to an annuity of 1,000*l.*, secured on her husband's lands in priority to certain incumbrancers, one of whom was Mr. Beavan (1).

By the order on further directions before mentioned the defendant Beavan was to be at liberty to add his costs to his security. In January 1854 the plaintiff obtained leave to enrol the order of 1849 and that of 1853, although the limited time had expired as to the former; but she enrolled the decree of 1849 only. The order of the 17th of July 1855 directed the carrying on of the proceedings under the order of 1853.

A decree was subsequently, in November 1857, made in the suit of Wellesley v. Mornington, and another in the suit of The Countess of Mornington v. Keane (2), which were considered to be favourable to

(1) Wellesley v. Wellesley, 10 Sim. 256; a. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 21.

(2) 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 791.

the incumbrancers; and accordingly Mr. Beavan applied, under the order of January 1854, to the Clerk of Enrolments, to enrol the order of 1853, but without success, the five years having expired in March 1858.

The present application was made on the ground of the shortness of the time which had elapsed since the five years had expired, the decree in The Countess of Mornington v. Keane having been made after the expiration of the five years, and of Mr. Beavan having been resident out of the United Kingdom for some years past.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Cole appeared in support of the motion.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Freeling opposed.

The following cases were cited:—

Horne v. Barton, 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 225.

Kay v. Smith, 7 De Gex, M. & G. 383; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 136.

Brandon v. Brandon, Ibid. 365; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 896.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the defendant moving must satisfy him that it was "just and expedient, under the peculiar circumstances of the case," that after the lapse of so long a period he should be allowed to enrol this decree. The object of the General Order was to prevent parties from being kept in ignorance for an unreasonable length of time whether a decree was to be appealed from or not. Although the Court was disposed to take a lenient view of circumstances which might have prevented an appeal from being prosecuted within five years, yet after that time it was desirable that the Order should be strictly adhered to. In the present case there was a decree affecting Mr. Beavan's interests in July 1849. That decree declared the priority of the Countess of Mornington's claim over those of Mr. Beavan and other incumbrancers. Mr. Beavan might then have appealed; but an order was obtained by the Countess for enrolling the decree of 1849, and also the order on further directions in 1853, but the former only was enrolled. Mr. Beavan, although abroad at the time, was aware of these proceedings. It was competent to him to enrol the order of 1853, when the Countess omitted to do so; but he allowed the five years to elapse without doing anything as to this order. In consequence of the decision in The Countess of Mornington v. Keane, he now thought that the decree of 1849 might be reversed on appeal to the House of Lords. Such an appeal would not, on account of the lapse of time, be received by the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords; but if Mr. Beavan could induce this Court to allow the decree of 1853, on further directions, to be enrolled, it might draw down leave to appeal from the former decree. But would it be "just or expedient" to do so? The order on further directions only carried into effect the decree of 1849; and the Countess having during this long period had that decree in her favour might have fairly assumed that there were no reasonable grounds of appeal, and therefore none to justify the present application. The motion must be refused, with costs.

Nov. 9, 10. } ATKINSON v. SMITH.

Settlement—Sufficiency of Consideration—Baron and Feme—Mortgage of Wife's Estate—Proviso for Redemption.

A. and his wife, joint tenants in fee, in 1818 mortgaged their estate to B, the proviso for redemption being, that on payment of the mortgage-money B. should re-convey to A. and his wife, their heirs or assigns, or unto such other person or persons, and for such intents and purposes, and in such manner and form as A. and his wife, or the survivor of them, or the heirs or assigns of such survivor, should appoint. In pursuance of a covenant in the mortgage-deed, a fine was levied by A. and his wife. In 1823 the mortgage-money was repaid, and in 1827, by a deed reciting these circumstances, B, by the direction of A. and wife, conveyed, and A. and wife appointed to a trustee the property to be held to the use of the wife for life, then of A. for life, and afterwards of S. (a daughter) and her children, &c. After the death of the wife, A. in 1854 conveyed the estate to his son for a valuable consideration. The son after A.'s death instituted a suit to set aside the settlement of 1827 as voluntary and void against himself, a purchaser for value. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree in the plaintiff's favour; but, upon appeal,—Held, that a power was created by the proviso in the deed of 1818, which enabled A. and his wife effectually to convey their interests, as they did by the settlement of 1827, without levying a fine; and that the wife's parting with her interest for the purpose of the settlement was sufficient to prevent the settlement being voluntary on A.'s part, and accordingly the plaintiff's bill was dismissed, with costs.

This was an appeal, by the defendants, from a decision of Kindersley, V.C., by which a decree had been made in favour of the plaintiff, under the following circumstances:—

John Atkinson and Barbara his wife were seised in fee as joint tenants of certain real estate in Cumberland, and, by an indenture, dated the 16th of May 1818, and made between them of the one part, and John Brown of the other part, they, in consideration of 170*l.* paid to them by J. Brown, conveyed the lands to him in fee, subject to a proviso, "that if the said J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife, or either of them, or either of their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, should pay unto the said J. Brown, his executors, administrators or assigns, the sum of 170*l.* with interest, &c., then and in such case the said J. Brown, his heirs and assigns, should, at the request and expense of the said J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife, their heirs and assigns, or either or any of them, re-convey, &c., unto them the said J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife, their heirs or assigns, or unto such other person or persons, and for such intents and purposes, and in such manner and form as they the said J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife, or the survivor of them, or the heirs or assigns of such survivor, should nominate, direct or appoint in that behalf, free from incumbrances." In pursuance of a covenant contained in this deed, a fine was subsequently levied by J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife to enure to the uses of the deed. In 1823 the mortgage-money was repaid to J. Brown, but no re-conveyance was then taken. By an indenture dated the 31st of December 1827, and made between J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife of the first part, J. Brown of the second part, and Joseph Atkinson (a trustee) of the third part, after reciting the mortgage-deed, and that the money had long since been repaid, and that J. Atkinson and his wife, being desirous to settle the property upon the uses after mentioned, had requested J. Brown to join with them in limiting such uses, which he had agreed to do; it was witnessed, that in consideration of the 170*l.*, and for settling, conveying and assuring the premises on the uses and trusts after mentioned, and for the nominal consideration from Joseph Atkinson to Brown, he, J. Brown, at the request of J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife, bargained and sold, and J. Atkinson and Barbara his wife appointed unto Joseph Atkinson and his heirs, the premises, to hold to him and his heirs, to the use of Barbara Atkinson for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to trustees to preserve remainder to the use of J. Atkinson for life, with divers remainders in favour of Agnes Smith (a daughter of J. Atkinson) and her children, with an ultimate remainder to Joseph Atkinson, the trustee, in fee. Barbara Atkinson died in February 1838, and J. Atkinson went in 1853 to reside with his son, Solomon Atkinson, the plaintiff. On the 10th of June 1854 J. Atkinson, by a deed of that date, for the valuable consideration therein expressed, conveyed the property to the plaintiff in fee. In January 1857 J. Atkinson died, and afterwards Agnes Smith, the tenant for life under the settlement of 1827, brought an action of ejectment, and the present suit was instituted by the plaintiff to restrain this action, and to have the indenture of the 31st of December 1827 delivered up as voluntary, and therefore, under 13 Eliz. c. 5, void as against himself, a purchaser for value. The cause coming on to be heard, before Kindersley, V.C., on the 3rd of July, his Honour made a decree in favour of the plaintiff (1), and the defendants now appealed.

(1) The following is the judgment of Kindersley, V.C.—His Honour said that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief which he asked. Where a pur-

Mr. Solomon Atkinson, the plaintiff, appeared in person, and contended that the operation of the fine was exhausted in the mortgage to Brown, and that to pass Mrs. Atkinson's estate upon that mortgage being satisfied, another fine was necessary. The terms of the mortgage to Brown gave no indication of an intention to alter the wife's previous estate, which would be necessary in order to effect such alteration.—

chaser came to this Court to set aside a voluntary instrument, although perfectly cognisant that the object of the purchase was to defeat such instrument, still the law was that he was entitled to set it aside, being a purchaser for value, and the Court must not be influenced by any reluctance on other grounds in giving such relief. It was quite clear that, so far as related to the question, whether any consideration passed to the parties who made the settlement from those for whose benefit it was made, Agnes Smith and her children, no consideration whatever, pecuniarily speaking, passed. The question was, whether, on the face of the deed itself, having regard to the rights of the parties, Atkinson or the trustee, had any valuable, not necessarily pecuniary, consideration from Mrs. Atkinson? If at that time an estate in fee was vested in Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson as joint tenants, whether such estate was legal or equitable, Mrs. Atkinson, being a feme covert, could not part with her interest, except by means of a fine levied of the equity of redemption vested in her and her husband. If Mrs. Atkinson did not part with any interest by that deed, of course, John Atkinson received no consideration for parting with his, because the only contention to shew consideration was that Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson were joint tenants in equity, the effect of that being that there was a contingent remainder to the survivor in fee; that John Atkinson parted with his interest in favour of the settlement, in consideration of Mrs. Atkinson also parting with hers, each having an interest in having it so conveyed; and, therefore, if that was a parting with his and her interest, then there was a consideration to support the deed. If there was such a consideration, it must have been because Mrs. Atkinson, by the deed, parted with her interest. That she could not do, except, as was said before, by levying a fine; and that not having been done, the defendants argued that if the interest, as an estate or interest in land, could not be parted with, without a fine, yet Mrs. Atkinson was donee of a power of appointment which a married woman could exercise without a fine. It was likewise urged that the original fine supported both deeds; but that was not so, it operated only to convey the legal estate to the mortgagee. If, then, there was such a power, the defendants' case would be established, and the question really was, whether, under the proviso in the mortgage-deed any such power as above referred to was created? It was a rule well established, that where a wife's estate, or an estate in which she had a vested interest, was parted with to a mortgagee, in order that her husband might raise money, in whatever form the equity of redemption was reserved it would not affect, beyond the mere purpose of the mortgage, the interest of the wife, unless a clear intention could be found so to affect the interest ultra the mortgage. In the absence of an indication of intention, it was always presumed that the only reason for the wife joining was to enable the husband to make a valid mortgage and raise the money, and the mere reservation of the equity of redemption, unless in a form indicating most clearly an intention to alter the settlement of the estate ultra the mortgage, had no such effect. Whatever might be the effect of Anson v. Lee, it was not that the Judge meant to dispute this rule, although he might have erred in its application. Before the mortgage Mrs. Atkinson was joint tenant with her husband in fee; at all events, there was a joint estate for life, with a contingent remainder to the survivor. Her interest was of such a character that before the abolition of fines, she was protected by law from parting with it, except by a fine, or since that period by a deed acknowledged, and by examination apart from her husband, not only to ascertain that she knew what she was doing, but that she did it voluntarily. It was not like the case of an adult male, for there was the additional protection which the law threw around a married woman. Suppose the words of the proviso created a power, were they sufficient in the absence of indication of intention to alter the position of the wife to her detriment? For, if they were, she became enabled to act without that protection which she would otherwise have against the undue influence of her husband; so that she might execute a deed without fine or acknowledgment. On the principle of Jackson v. Innes, in the absence of a clear indication of intention to alter the wife's position (and here none such could be found on the face of the deed, either by recital or otherwise), no power would be created, and the obligation of Brown to re-convey was nothing more than leaving the estate in Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson, as it was before the mortgage, that was a joint-tenancy in fee. The simplest mode of creating a power, had that been intended, would have been to direct, when the money was paid off, that the mortgagee should re-convey to such uses as Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson should appoint, and in default to them in fee. Supposing Brown had called in the mortgage-money, and the mortgagors could not pay it, they would have obtained the money from another person, and transferred the security; but he might have objected to re-convey to a third party, as would have been his clear right, except for the words here inserted, which would operate to enable such a re-conveyance, without the intention to create a power. On the whole, therefore, it could not be considered that there had been an intention to create a power, and it would alter Mrs. Atkinson's estate to her detriment so to hold. There was, then, such an estate as Mrs. Atkinson could not part with without a fine, and the voluntary deed, so far as she was concerned, had no operation; she passed nothing, and had she survived her husband, would have been entitled to say, by virtue of the contingent remainder becom-

It was distinctly admitted, by the plaintiff, that the words in the proviso were sufficient to create a power, although they differed from the usual form. That being so, it was contended by the plaintiff, that no power was actually created, although the words used might have been sufficient, because there was no intention that such a power should be created; and he cited a number of authorities, from Ruscombe v. Hare down to the recent case of Heather v. O'Neill, to establish the proposition, that where there is a mortgage of a wife's interest, with a proviso for redemption, reserving uses different from those in the original settlement, unless the terms in the proviso manifestly shewed an intention that the old uses should be altered, no change was effected. Indeed, Mr. Atkinson strongly urged that it was not enough that such intention to alter the uses should be apparent in the proviso itself, but that it should also appear aliunde from some recital or declaration. Reliance was placed upon certain expressions of Lord Eldon in Jackson v. Innes; but whatever opinion Lord Eldon might have entertained at first (9) as to the mode in which such intention should be manifested, he changed his opinion on the subject, and placed the matter on the footing which had ever since been followed. Lord Eldon said (10), "The judgment of this House will remove a difficulty which I know is floating in the minds of many persons. I conceive it to have been the opinion of Lord Thurlow, that in order to dispose of the equity of redemption of the wife in an estate, it was absolutely necessary there should be in the recitals of the instrument some expression that the parties meant it so; that it was not enough to collect the intention from the limitations; but that there must be something more upon the face of the deed to lead the wife to understand what those limitations were. It does, however, occur to me, on looking into the cases which have been referred to, that such a proposition cannot be supported, and therefore I am of opinion that the decree must be reversed."

The whole effect of that decision was to leave it open as to the question of intention, but at the same time to shew that the intention to alter may be manifested by the language of the proviso itself, and that there was no necessity for an express declaration or a recital to that effect. It would be found that all the cases referred to in the argument which adverted to the question of intention were decided on the particular circumstances of intention indicated in those cases. But, in fact, all those cases had no direct or indirect bearing on the present, because in them the question was, whether the change of the limitations indicated any change of intention, but here there was, in fact, no change of limitations. The only circumstance here was, that in the proviso a new quality was annexed to the wife's estate, by which she acquired a greater facility to dispose of it. The question, therefore, was, not whether on the face of the proviso any indication of intention to change the limitations was to be found, but whether the wife, speaking by the fine, had chosen to secure to herself what might be considered an advantage, viz., that which would enable her to concur with her husband in the disposition of the property. The plaintiff asserted that, inasmuch as there was no change in the limitations, the creation of this power was utterly nugatory, because it was involved in the interest to be re-conveyed by the mortgagee to Atkinson and his wife, and for that purpose he cited Wagstaff v. Wagstaff. But that was no authority for the principle contended for. If a man conveyed an estate to A. and B. in fee, with power to appoint, the latter was involved in the fee which was conveyed. That, however, was different from a re-conveyance to husband and wife with a power in them to appoint to other persons, as that power was something ultra the fee, and annexed a quality to the estate which it did not before possess, and thereby enabled the wife to deal with her interest in the property, not by means of a fine, as otherwise she must have done. It was said by the plaintiff, that an explanation could be given for these words of the proviso, because without them the mortgagee would not be bound to re-convey except to the mortgagor. But that told strongly against the plaintiff. In many of the cases the ground upon which it was contended that there was no change of limitations was because expressions had been used through mistake or inadvertence. If, however, the plaintiff's explanation were correct, it appeared that these words were introduced, not by mistake, but with the intention of accomplishing a particular object. If, then, the words had a design and object, and the intention could be collected from the proviso without going beyond it, then it at once appeared that there was a direct intention that these words should form part of the proviso for redemption, and it was admitted that the words were sufficient to create a power in the husband and wife. If that was clear, why was the Court to deny to the wife the right to create such a power, and to give to herself a benefit, the facility of transferring her interest without a fine? It was said that it was to the prejudice of the wife (taking away the protection which the law gave her, guarding her against the husband's influence) to allow these words thus to operate. But it was no part of the office of this Court to force upon the wife any protection which she deliberately refused. If a husband sought to obtain possession of his wife's property the Court would not give him its assistance without a proper settlement being made upon the wife; but however strongly the Court considered her entitled to such a settlement, the Court would not force one upon her, if she refused. His Lordship, therefore, did not follow the argument that the Court was bound to interpret this proviso in a particular way by reason of the supposed protection which ought to be given to the wife. But it was said that this power had no effect whatever upon the equitable interests of the husband and wife, and that it was a mere power to enable them to direct the mortgagee to convey the legal estate to such persons as they should appoint. Undoubtedly the words were "to such persons," and not "to such uses"; but there was no doubt as to the intention of the parties in the terms they had used. That intention clearly was to enable Atkinson and his wife to direct the mortgagee to clothe with the legal estate any re-settlement that they might desire to make at any future time.

That intention being clear, the Court was at liberty to construe the power so as to render the deed of 1827 operative. If that were so, there was an end of the whole question, because if the deed of 1827 was an exercise of the power given by the deed of 1818 it ceased to be voluntary; as there was a consideration moving from the wife to her husband, by which she parted with her interest for the purpose of the settlement, which was quite sufficient to prevent the deed from being voluntary within the meaning of the statute. His Lordship differed from the Vice Chancellor with reluctance, but he had considered the case very carefully, and his opinion upon it was perfectly clear. The result therefore was that the plaintiff's bill must be dismissed, with costs.

 Nov. 5, 10. } In re HART'S TRUSTS.

Will—Construction—Legacy payable out of the Proceeds of Land—Vesting.

*A testator devised his real estate to trustees upon trust for one for life, and afterwards upon trust to sell and hold the proceeds of the sale and the rents in the mean time in trust to pay H. A. D. the sum of 500l. sterling when she should attain the age of twenty-five years. He then directed that the "said legacy" should carry interest from the time of the death of the tenant for life, such interest to be paid in and towards the maintenance, education, and support of H. A. D. until she should attain the age of twenty-five years. He then directed that, subject as aforesaid, the said trust monies should remain, and be in trust for certain parties. One of the Vice Chancellors, on the authority of Batsford v. Kebbell (1) and Watson v. Hayes (2), decided that the legacy was contingent, and that, as the legatee did not attain twenty-five, the 500l. belonged to the residuary legatees of the testator; but, upon appeal,—Held, reversing his Honour's decision, that as the direction for sale was absolute in every event, and as the legatee* survived the tenant for life, the legacy vested absolutely in her.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart, pronounced upon the petition of Mr. George Block, the administrator of the estate and effects of his deceased wife, Harriet Ann, praying the payment out to him of stock produced by the investment of 500*l.*, paid into court by trustees in respect of a legacy given by the will of William Hart, deceased, to the petitioner's wife, late Harriet Ann Dale. The facts were, that William Hart, the testator, by his will, dated the 13th of November 1849, after appointing two persons his executors, gave and devised to his mother, Maria Hart, all and singular his messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, to hold to her and her assigns for her life, and from and immediately after her decease, he gave and devised the same in trust for sale. The testator directed that his trustees and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, "should stand possessed of all monies to arise from the sale of his said hereditaments, and the rents and profits thereof until sale," upon trust, after paying the expenses attending such sale, "to pay to his natural daughter, Harriet Ann Dale, the sum of 500*l.* sterling when she should attain the age of twenty-five years." And the testator directed that the said legacy "should carry interest from the time of his said mother's decease, which interest should be paid in and towards the maintenance, education and support of his said natural daughter until she should attain the age of twenty-five years." The testator then bequeathed several legacies, and, "subject as aforesaid," he directed "that the said trust monies should remain and be in trust for all and every the children and child of his cousin, the widow of the late Ralph Johnson, who should be living at the decease of his said mother, and be paid to them when and as they should severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, in equal shares, as tenants in common, the interest in the mean time to be applied for and towards their respective maintenance, education and support." The testator then bequeathed his personal estate to his trustees upon trust to convert into money, and thereout to pay debts and certain legacies; and as to the residue upon trust to invest the same, and out of the interest and dividends thereof to pay an annuity to Hannah Groom during her life, and to pay the residue of such interest and dividends unto his brother during her life, and from and after their deaths the trust monies were to remain and be upon the like trusts in favour of the children of his cousin, the widow of the late Ralph Johnson, as were mentioned and expressed of and concerning the residue of the monies to arise from his real estate.

The testator died on the 14th of November 1849. His mother, Maria Hart, died in 1850. Harriet Ann Dale attained twenty-one in the month of February 1855; on the 25th of October 1855 she married the petitioner, George Block, and in September 1857 she died. After the death of Mrs. Hart the trustees sold the real estate, and out of the produce they set apart the sum of 500*l.* to answer the legacy, which sum was invested by them on mortgage at 4*l.* per cent., and the interest paid to Harriett Ann Block during her life. After her death the mortgage-money was called in, and this sum, with interest which since accrued, was paid by the trustees into court under the Trustees' Relief Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96.

On the 24th of July the petition was heard, before Vice Chancellor Stuart, and the question argued was, whether the gift of 500*l.* to Harriet Ann Dale was contingent on her attaining twenty-five years, or whether it had vested, although she died under that age, or, in other words, whether the money paid into court belonged to her husband and administrator, or had fallen into the residue of the testator's estate. His Honour reserved judgment; and on the 26th of the same month held, that the legacy was contingent, and that the legatee having died under twenty-five years of age, the money belonged to the residuary legatees (3). From this decision the administrator appealed.

(1) The Vice Chancellor gave the following judgment:—"There is no doubt of the difficulty of cases of this kind, and this is perhaps as difficult a case as any. The difficulty arises from this, that in

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. D. Evans, for the appellant, argued that where a legacy was given and the interest of the legacy in the mean time for maintenance, the legacy was vested, and that the decision of the Court below was erroneous, for it was plain that the legacy was vested, the only possible question being whether it vested on the death of the testator, or on the death of the tenant for life, Mrs. Hart.

Hanson v. Graham, and in Vawdry v. Geddes (1), and even in Watson v. Hayes, which is the latest case of value, there are expressions to be found which greatly favour the argument addressed to the Court to induce the Court to hold that this was a vested legacy, although the legatee died before the time when the testator directed that the legacy should be paid. It is the duty of the Court unquestionably, where a doubt occurs as to whether any interest given by a will or deed be vested or contingent, to endeavour to solve that doubt in favour of the vesting of the legacy. But it is still more the duty of the Court not to disturb authorities which have been recognized as binding authorities, and which have governed the decisions of the greatest Judges that ever sat in this court. The latest important authority cited in this case is Watson v. Hayes, decided by Lord Cottenham, upon a review of all the cases; and he takes care there to state that his decision was governed by the decision of the case of Batsford v. Kebbell. The case of Batsford v. Kebbell, to my mind, it is impossible to distinguish from the present case. If any distinction exists, the language and terms of the gift in Batsford v. Kebbell were more favourable to the vesting of the legacy than in the present case. Watson v. Hayes is valuable, and for this—that it points out the importance of the Court directing its attention to this circumstance, whether, when there is a gift of a legacy payable when the legatee attains a certain age, without any words of gift as separated from the time of payment, there be a distinction between the gift of the capital of the legacy and the gift of interest or dividends for maintenance in the mean time. In Watson v. Hayes, what Lord Cottenham says is this: 'When maintenance is given, questions arise whether it be a distinct gift, or merely a direction as to the application of the interest; and if it be a distinct gift, it has no effect upon the question of the vesting of the legacy.' He says that before addressing himself to the case of Batsford v. Kebbell, which is the governing case as applicable to the present. The principle which governed the case of Batsford v. Kebbell was considered by Sir Wm. Grant in deciding the case of Hanson v. Graham—which Mr. Malins implores me not to overrule in this case, and which certainly if I had the presumption to attempt to overrule, I should think myself a very absurd person. Hanson v. Graham was decided by Sir Wm. Grant; and Sir Wm. Grant again, in Leake v. Robinson, in perhaps the most elaborate judgment he ever delivered, recurs to this question; and I intend to decide this case upon those clear and distinct principles enunciated by Sir Wm. Grant more clearly, I think, in the case of Leake v. Robinson than in Hanson v. Graham. The great argument in support of the vesting of this legacy depends upon a distinction taken between a gift for maintenance in the mean time and a gift of the whole interest in the mean time. In Batsford v. Kebbell the language was neither to give maintenance nor to give interest, for it was what was equivalent to the gift of interest: it was a direction and a trust to pay the whole dividends to the legatee till the particular age was attained, and when the age was attained to transfer the principal stock to the legatee. So far from Sir Wm. Grant making any difference upon the question of dividends, between dividends and interest, when he speaks in Leake v. Robinson of the case of Batsford v. Kebbell, he says there that the case of Batsford v. Kebbell was more favourable to the legatee, for the interest of the fund was given to him absolutely till he should attain the age of thirty-two; therefore Sir Wm. Grant considered the gift of all the dividends of the fund and all the interest of the fund in the mean time as meaning the same thing, and treating Batsford v. Kebbell as a case in which the whole interest of the fund was given absolutely to the legatee till he should attain the age of thirty-two, at which time all the principal was to be transferred for his use. He quoted the words of Lord Rosslyn, who says: 'There is no gift but in the direction for payment; and the direction for payment attaches only upon a person of the age of thirty-two. Therefore he does not fall within the description'; but Sir W. Grant does not notice what Lord Cottenham took the pains to notice, and that was, that Lord Rosslyn, in Batsford v. Kebbell, treated the gift of the dividends and the gift of the capital as two separate legacies. If there are two distinct gifts to the same person, the duty of the Court is to attend to the language of each of the gifts, and to give effect to the intention of the testator in regard to both. If they are distinct gifts, little aid could be expected from the gift of the interest or dividends, as assisting the construction upon the question of vesting; and so it was held by Lord Cottenham in the case of Watson v. Hayes. Here there seems to me to be what occurred in Batsford v. Kebbell, that is, two distinct subject-matters of gift in favour of the legatee. The first is to pay 500*l.* to the legatee when she shall attain twenty-five, and then, beginning with new words, he says: 'And I direct that the said legacy shall carry interest from the time of my mother's death, which interest shall be paid in and towards the maintenance, education and support of my said natural daughter until she shall attain the age of twenty-five years.' If in Batsford v. Kebbell the gift of the dividends and the gift of the capital were held to be two separate legacies, and therefore in that view not to affect the question—the gift of the dividends not to affect the question of the vesting of the interest—much more must it be taken to be a distinct gift when the first gift, as in Batsford v. Kebbell, is a gift where the legatee cannot be entitled until the description is ascertained. Therefore I am bound to adhere to the case of Batsford v. Kebbell, which

(1) 1 Russ. & M. 203; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 63.

On the latter point the case of Vawdry v. Geddes (4) was cited, and on the former the following cases were relied on:—

Hanson v. Graham, 6 Ves. 239.

Harrison v. Naylor, 2 Cox, 247; s. c. 3 Bro. C.C. 108.

Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363.

And it was argued that the present case was distinguishable from Leake v. Robinson: that here there was not only a gift over, but a gift over of the whole interest.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Southgate, for the children of the residuary legatee, contended that this being a legacy payable out of real estate, the rules applicable to real estate must determine the case. According to those rules, the legacy was plainly contingent on the legatee attaining the age of twenty-five years.—

Watson v. Hayes, 5 Myl. & Cr. 125; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 49.

They contended that the case now before the Court was in effect decided by Batsford v. Kebbell, and urged that there was a total absence of authority to shew that the gift of the interest of a legacy operated to vest the legacy, while the cases of Carter v. Bletsoe and Gawler v. Standerwick proved that if the legacy were payable out was considered by Sir W. Grant as not inconsistent with Hanson v. Graham, but as consistent with it, and which was affirmed by Lord Cottenham, as governing his decision in the case of Watson v. Hayes. It is with great regret that I feel bound to hold, in this case, that the legacy did not vest. At the same time I have come to the conclusion with a full sense of the difficulty of the question—a sense increased by this, that Sir Lancelot Shadwell, in the case of Watson v. Hayes, held that the gift was the gift of a vested interest, whereas Lord Cottenham directly overruled that, as some other Judge may overrule the decision at which I find myself called upon to arrive in this case."

of real estate, such a fact had a contrary effect. Lord Cottenham, in Watson v. Hayes, considered that the proceeds of real estate were real estate.

Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the trustees.

Mr. Malins, in reply, said that the manifest intention of the testator was to give the whole interest in the 500*l.* to the legatee, and not to benefit the residuary legatee out of the legacy, or any part of it. He cited the additional cases of—

Nov. 10.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.
—The order to be made by us on this petition depends upon the construction of the will of W. Hart, so far as the gift of 500*l.* contained in it in favour, absolute or contingent, of Harriet Ann Dale, the petitioner's late wife, is concerned. Whether it would have been right to dismiss the petition if Maria Hart, mentioned in the will, the mother of the testator, had survived Harriet Ann Dale, it is unnecessary to say, and I give no opinion; for, although Maria Hart survived the testator, she was survived by Harriet Ann Dale, who, if the gift in question had been a legacy out of the testator's personal estate merely, would in my opinion, equally upon principle and authority, have acquired a vested right to the 500*l.*, for her absolute use, either upon the testator's death, subject to his mother's life estate, or upon the death of his mother; for by the will, interest was made payable upon the 500*l.* from the time of the death of the testator's mother; and that interest was directed to be applied wholly for the benefit of Harriet Ann Dale. The circumstance, therefore, that she died before attaining the age of twenty-five, would certainly, I conceive, have been immaterial, if, as I have said, the 500*l.* had been made payable out of the testator's personal property, and the gift had not affected his real estate. The single question accordingly, as I view the matter, is, whether, upon the ground that the real estate only, or its produce, was made liable to the 500*l.*, Harriet Ann Dale did not acquire a vested right to that sum, or whether there was a lapse of the benefit of the gift as to the capital upon her death, happening as it did when she was under twenty-five, which question, I think, ought to be answered in favour of her administrator, the petitioner. The whole of the real estate was by the will, not only empowered, but absolutely directed, to be sold on the death of Maria Hart—a sale not only for the purpose of raising the 500*l.*, but for that and other purposes—so that the sale would have been as proper and necessary if Harriet Ann Dale had not survived the testator, as it was under the actual circumstances. The whole of the produce of the sale has been upon all hands assumed to have been treated as having been by the will effectually disposed of. All the parties have assumed that the heir, if any, of the testator took nothing legal or equitable in that character. I am not sure whether I should or should not have taken the same view of the petitioner's case as I now do if the 500*l.* had not been directed to be raised by sale, but been made, with interest from the death of the testator's mother, a charge merely upon the land, and the land subject to the charge had been devised in any manner or allowed to descend. Howsoever the claim would have stood in those circumstances, I think the will being as it is, the petitioner has shewn a title to the disputed fund, and should, as his wife's administrator, have it, subject, of course, to the payment of such costs as it ought to bear. Possibly, it is as well to add, that I have not considered as important the use by the testator of the particular word "legacy" with reference to this sum of 500*l.*, or overlooked the circumstance of the gift being in the shape of a trust, to pay the sum directly or not otherwise than directly to Harriet Ann Dale.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I also am of opinion that this legacy became vested in Harriet Ann Dale, although she died under the age of twenty-five years. The estate out of which the legacy is given is, by the will, after the death of the testator's mother, vested in trustees on trust to sell, and they are to stand possessed of the monies to arise from the sale upon trust in the first place to pay the expenses of or attending such sale or sales, and in the next place to pay to the testator's natural daughter, Harriet Ann Dale, the sum of 500*l.* sterling, when she should attain the age of twenty-five years; and the testator adds the words, "I direct that the said legacy shall carry interest from the time of my said mother's decease," the mother having a previous life interest before the estate of the trustees, "which interest shall be paid in and towards the maintenance, education and support of my said natural daughter, until she shall attain the said age of twenty-five years." And then there are directions to pay two other legacies, and after the mother's death to dispose of the property, subject as aforesaid, among those of the children of the testator's cousin, Ralph Johnson, who should be living at the decease of the mother. There is, therefore, not merely a trust to pay the legacy when the legatee attains twenty-five, but a direction that the legacy is to carry interest which is to be applied for her maintenance. The legatee, therefore, was in this position. She was to be paid the legacy when she attained twenty-five, and to take the interest in the mean time. Both the principal and the interest are appropriated to her; but it was said, that the gift of the interest is distinct from the gift of the principal; and it was sought upon this ground to bring the case within the authority of Batsford v. Kebbell and Watson v. Hayes. I think, however, that those cases do not govern the present. In the former of those cases, Batsford v. Kebbell, the direction was to pay the legatee the dividends until thirty-two, and at that time to transfer to him the principal; and the Court, in holding the legacy not to be vested, seemed to have proceeded on the marked distinction which was drawn between the dividends and the capital; and in the latter of the cases, Watson v. Hayes, Lord Cottenham treats the gift of the 25*l.* per annum as a gift, not of interest, but of maintenance only. But in the present case the direction is, that the legacy shall carry interest, annexing, as it seems to me, the interest to the legacy; and I do not see how we could hold this legacy not to be vested, unless we were prepared to hold that no legacy to be paid when a legatee attains a prescribed age, with interest in the mean time, vests until the legatee has reached the prescribed age—a conclusion which would be quite at variance with Hanson v. Graham, and many other decided cases. Where a legacy is given by a direction to pay when the legatee attains a certain age, the direction to pay may import either a gift at the specified age, or a present gift with a postponed payment; and if the interest is given in the mean time, it shews that a present gift was intended. A further point, which was urged against the legatee in this case, was, that the legacy ought to be considered as subject to the rules which apply to legacies charged upon land, and that, according to those rules, it could not have vested; and Watson v. Hayes was referred to on this point also; but I think that what fell from Lord Cottenham upon this subject in that case, had reference merely to the general rules applicable to legacies charged upon land; and having decided in that case that a legacy if not charged upon land was not vested, he said, à fortiori it could not be vested if it were charged upon land. I have not met with any case in which it has been held, that the rules as to vesting which apply to legacies charged on land, are to be applied to legacies given out of monies to arise from the sale of the land. The case of Harrison v. Naylor certainly tends to the opposite conclusion, and I think that conclusion the better one; for the legacy is held by the trustees, and paid to the legatee as money; and besides, the rule of the Court is to deal with property in the state in which it ought to be, and not in the state in which it is. The order, therefore, must be discharged, and there must be an order for payment to the petitioner.

LORDS JUSTICES. Ex parte COOKNEY, in re
 NOV. 3. THE ELECTRIC TELE-

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Allottee of Shares—Subscriber—Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act.

Mr. J. T. C. applied, through an agent, for fifty shares in a joint-stock company provisionally registered, and at the same time paid up the value. He entered into no agreement in writing to take the shares, but they were allotted to him, and when the deed of settlement was tendered to him he refused to execute it, but assigned no reason for his refusal. The deed contained a schedule in which his fifty shares bore distinctive numbers. The company was completely registered, and the name of J. T. C. was inserted in the register of shareholders as T. C. the holder of fifty shares, but numbered differently from the schedule to the deed. After an order for winding up the company, J. T. C. was placed on the list of contributories in respect of fifty shares, and upon appeal, the order was confirmed.

The alteration in the distinctive numbers of the shares was considered to be unimportant, as was the mistake in the christian name.

A person may be a contributory in respect of his application for shares, although he signs no written agreement to take shares, and does not, therefore, fall within the description of a "subscriber" mentioned in the 3rd section of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. (The Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act.)

This was an appeal, presented by Mr. James Thomas Cookney, from an order of the Master of the Rolls refusing to remove his name from the list of contributories of the above-named company, on which he had been placed by his Honour's chief clerk. The circumstances were as follows:—The company was provisionally registered in January 1852, under the name of the Irish Channel Submarine Telegraph Company; which name was afterwards changed to the Electric Telegraph Company of Ireland. In the month of April 1852, Mr. Cookney, at the instance of the Hon. Mr. Curzon, one of the provisional directors, applied for fifty shares in the company, and paid by a cheque the full amount of the shares, namely, 50*l.* The shares were accordingly allotted to him, and his name appeared in the schedule to the deed of settlement, dated the 12th of July 1852, as the holder of fifty shares, numbered from 7,131 to 7,200. In this schedule, Mr. Cookney's name was correctly given as "J. T. Cookney," but in the Numerical Register of Shares and the Register of Shareholders, made after the complete registration of the company, his name appeared as "Thomas Cookney." It appeared by the same registers that the shares actually allotted to him were numbered from 12,241 to 12,290, and that the shares numbered from 7,151 to 7,200 had been allotted to another shareholder, one Mr. Rowbotham. In August 1853, an act (16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxiii.) was passed, incorporating the company, and making it subject to the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The 9th section of the last-mentioned act provides, "that the company shall keep a book to be called the 'Register of Shareholders,' and in such book shall be fairly and distinctly entered from time to time the names and additions of the several persons entitled to shares in the company, together with the number of shares to which such shareholders shall be respectively entitled, distinguishing each share by its number, and the amount of the subscriptions paid on such shares."

A winding-up order having been made, the Master to whom the matter was referred on the 11th of February 1857 inserted Mr. Cookney's name in the list of contributories in respect of fifty shares, but in the month of June last Mr. Cookney took out a summons in the chambers of the Judge to review that decision; affidavits were read and witnesses were examined. Mr. Cookney's affidavit denied that he had ever possessed any shares in the company, and stated that he had never received any letter of allotment or certificate of shares, and that he had never executed the deed of settlement; that he had given 50*l.* to Mr. Curzon upon his applying to him to take shares, and that he had heard nothing more of the company until Mr. Mayhew applied to him, when, without seeing Mr. Mayhew, he had refused to sign the deed, stating that he had never signed but one deed in his life, and would not sign another. In his cross-examination he stated that he had never made any inquiries as to the 50*l.* after he had paid it; that he never received any circulars from the company, or from the official manager, although he believed that at the time of the winding-up, and subsequently, several had come addressed to Thomas Cookney, but being so addressed he had taken no notice of them; that he had never taken any steps to procure the removal of his name from the shareholders' list, not knowing, in fact, that it was inserted there; that he considered that all his liabilities in respect of, and all his connexion with, the company had ceased upon his refusing to execute the deed; that if the undertaking had been prosperous, and paid a dividend, he should not have considered himself entitled thereto until he had signed the deed of settlement.

At the hearing of a summons before the chief clerk, he decided that Mr. Cookney was a contributory, and the summons being adjourned into court the Master of the Rolls refused to disturb his decision (1), and Mr. Cookney appealed.

(1) The judgment of the Master of the Rolls was as follows:—"I think Mr. Cookney must be held to be a contributory in this case. I have looked through the books and the evidence upon the subject, and the way in which it strikes me is this. I will shortly recapitulate what I said yesterday, and will state what I have derived from an examination of the books. I am clear that there was a distinct agreement by Mr. Cookney to become a member of the company, and that Mr. Curzon was authorized to take shares for him in the company, and to pay for them, and that in consequence of that shares were given to him in the books of the company. Now I find nothing in the evidence to shew me that at any time he repudiated those shares until the winding-up order was made. He refused to execute the deed, but even when he refused to execute the deed he did not repudiate the shares, for the expression he uses is singular. It does not appear that he saw the gentleman who brought the deed, but he only saw the clerk who came in to him, and he said, 'No; I shall not execute the deed; I never executed but one, and will never execute another.' That is, in substance, what he says, which is a little vague, but which I assume to mean this: 'I never executed but one joint-stock company's deed, and I never intend to execute another.' But that does not mean (as I infer from the evidence) an intention to say that, 'by refusing to execute the deed I mean to repudiate all the shares, and to have nothing to do with them'; but 'I do not mean to execute the deed or to have anything to do with it.' His Honour then remarked upon what was in evidence as to the receipt of the letters, and proceeded: "On looking at the books of the company it does, undoubtedly, appear that the number of shares allotted to him (Mr. Cookney) were afterwards transferred to another person, and that a new number of shares were given to him; but if this were done with a view of saying, 'In consequence of his not executing the deed we reject him as a shareholder,' I should hold it to be conclusive that he could not be a shareholder, and I should take the two together (i. e. the allotment of other shares, and the want of proof by the company that previously to the winding-up they

Mr. Roundell Palmer, for the appellant, relied upon the words of the 9th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacting, that "the company shall keep a book to be called 'The Register of Shareholders,' and in such book shall be fairly and distinctly entered from time to time the names and additions of the several persons entitled to shares in the company, together with the number of shares to which such shareholders shall be respectively entitled, distinguishing each share by its number and the amount of subscriptions paid on such shares," and remarked that that statute having been incorporated with the act authorizing this company (16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxiii.), it was incumbent upon them to keep for Mr. Cookney the shares they had allotted to him, viz. from No. 7,151 to 7,200, if they intended to hold him to his bargain, whereas, in fact, they had done no such thing, but had after complete registration allotted to him Nos. 12,241 to 12,290.

Mr. Roxburgh, on the same side, relied upon the 3rd section of the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, which enacts, "that the word 'subscriber' shall mean any person who shall have agreed in writing to take, or have taken, any shares in a proposed company, or in a company formed, and who shall not have executed the deed of settlement, or a deed referring thereto." Mr. Cookney was clearly not a "subscriber" under this section, as it could not be alleged that there ever had been any agreement in writing by him to take shares, and he urged that he could not, as a subscriber, be held liable to the company. Again, his refusal to execute the deed of settlement when presented to him was a repudiation of the shares which, it was admitted, had been had ever sent any letters or circulars to Mr. Cookney), as shewing that they had chosen to accept his refusal to execute the deed as a repudiation of the shares, and had acted upon it accordingly. But, on the contrary, they always kept him as a shareholder, and on no occasion does his name appear for the full amount of shares with the words 'paid-up' against it, in which case no circular for calls could be addressed to him, and all that he would receive would be the circulars to attend meetings. Not finding any distinct repudiation on his part, not finding any act of the company in which they treat him as having repudiated and rejected the shares, I am of opinion that he must be treated as a contributor."

allotted to him; and the deed contained the proviso usual in such cases, that the privileges and liabilities of shareholders should not commence until after the allottee had executed the deed. That the company so understood that repudiation was clear, for they had acted as if the shares had been forfeited by Mr. Cookney, and had allotted them to another person; and if they chose to allot to him differently numbered shares at their own pleasure, they could have no title to hold him liable for those shares. In other respects, too, their conduct proved that they had considered Mr. Cookney as having forfeited his shares, for they had failed to prove that they had addressed or sent to him a single letter or circular, until immediately before or after the winding-up order.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. J. T. Hamilton Humphreys, for the official manager, argued that there had been no repudiation by the appellant, who relied only on his refusal to execute the deed of settlement. He could not have considered it as a merely executory contract, or he would, on resolving not to accept the shares, have applied to have his deposit returned; but this he never did. The company, on the other hand, had always treated him as a shareholder, and if the non-allotment of the shares as originally numbered was to be taken as any evidence that they considered him as being no longer a shareholder, surely the allotment of the same number of shares, identical in all other respects with those originally allotted, must be held to be evidence of a contrary understanding. The company had not sent Mr. Cookney any letters or circulars, simply because there was no business on which to communicate with him, as upon application being made for his shares the entire sum payable upon them had been paid up.

Mr. Roxburgh was heard in reply.

For the appellant, the case of Ex parte Beresford (2) was cited and relied upon; while for the respondent that of Ex parte Yelland (3) was cited.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Mr. Cookney proposed and agreed to take fifty shares in the company, or intended company, in question; he paid for them 50*l.* Those who acted for the company or intended company accepted the proposal, accepted the 50*l.*, and on their part allotted him fifty shares accordingly. In that state of circumstances—a state of things which is substantially undisputed—it lies of course upon Mr. Cookney to exempt himself from the consequent burden which would accompany the benefit that he derived from the transaction: and it is said, on his behalf, that he desired to relinquish, and did relinquish, his shares. Assuming that he did so desire, without giving any opinion, it is plain that to make that wish effectual it must have been communicated to the other parties, and by them acceded to. There is no evidence that it was communicated to the parties; assuredly there is no evidence that they ever acceded to it. It is said that letters were from time to time addressed to Mr. Cookney, which he did not notice or answer. If he had meant to rely upon any such circumstance, he should have caused them to be informed why it was that he did not do so. Reliance has also been placed, on his behalf, on the circumstance that he declined to execute the deed of constitution of the company (or, however that instrument ought to be designated), but neither on that occasion did he assign anything that can be deemed a reason for the refusal. It must be taken, therefore, subject only to the two points I have mentioned or am about to mention, that all matters remained between him and the company just as they did from the moment of the accepted proposal and payment. It has been argued that the words “in writing” to be found in the 3rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, are fatal to this application; because there was no agreement in writing. My opinion, however, is, that the intention of that section was not to render impossible such a position as that which is ascribed to Mr. Cookney, but that the operation of those words, to be found in a portion of the section on which reliance is placed, was confined to the manner of reading the particular act of parliament, and I think they have no bearing upon the present question.

It has also been argued that the company or intended company, or those who acted for them, intended to release Mr. Cookney, by reason that in their allotment book, shares bearing particular numbers were originally allotted to him, but that afterwards, shares bearing those numbers were allotted to another person, and shares bearing different numbers were allotted to him. If that act could be considered as evidence of an intention to release him, it might be material, but the evidence forbids us to attribute it to any intention of that sort. It was a mere matter of internal arrangement, of convenience in the management of their affairs, without reference to the slightest notion of discharging him. They continued throughout to treat him as a member of the association, and the mere act of changing the designation of the number of the shares allotted to him, without any intention of discharging or releasing him, seems to me to amount to nothing. It appears to me, he has been rightly treated as a contributory by the Master of the Rolls, and that the order of His Honour cannot be disturbed.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls in the opinion which he has formed of this case. In the first place, there was in my opinion a complete agreement here to take fifty shares in the company. There was the payment of 50*l.* by this gentleman, on account of those shares to the company. That 50*l.* he never attempted to claim back. The company retained it, and retaining that 50*l.* I cannot see by what possible argument they could resist the claim of Mr. Cookney to have fifty shares for which he had paid that 50*l.* which they retained. There being, then, an agreement with these parties on the part of Mr. Cookney for taking fifty shares in the company, the only question is, whether that agreement has been put an end to. Now, no doubt that agreement might have been put an end to by the company upon Mr. Cookney refusing to execute the deed. The question which we have to consider is, not whether it might have been put an end to, but whether it was in fact put an end to. All the evidence, in my judgment, conclusively proves that the company never did intend, and never did, in point of fact, put an end to that agreement. It is said that they altered the numbers of the shares which had been allotted to Mr. Cookney. I do not think it is necessary for us to give an opinion upon that point, for I think the company's act of parliament puts that point entirely out of the question; but if it were necessary to give an opinion upon the point, I think the alteration in the shares which, in the schedule to the deed, were described as allotted to Mr. Cookney, does not destroy the contract of Mr. Cookney to take those fifty shares, for it was clearly not intended to destroy it; and I do not perceive by what communication Mr. Cookney ever knew what were the shares which were allotted to him, for when the deed was taken to him all that passes is, that he tells his own clerk that he will not execute the deed, that he never has executed more than one deed, and that he never will execute another. Therefore, to me it is not at all apparent that Mr. Cookney ever had these shares appropriated to him, or that there ever was any binding agreement on the part of the company to appropriate those shares to Mr. Cookney, for all the company did was to put Mr. Cookney's name in the schedule to the deed as entitled to those shares; and Mr. Cookney never adopted or acceded to the appropriation that was made of them. He had continued to hold the right to fifty shares, and therefore has, I think, become a contributory within the meaning of the Winding-up Acts. I think, therefore, this motion must be refused, and, if my learned Brother concurs, refused with costs.

1858. { HENRY VICKERS AND JOHN
May 10, 11. { PHILPOT v. MARY POUND AND OTHERS.

Legacy—Demonstrative or Specific.

A testatrix, by her will, gave all her real and personal estate to be converted into money, on trust, to pay debts, &c. and "the following legacies"; then followed a legacy of 10l. and a legacy of 5l., and the will proceeded thus, "Also I give to my nephew G. T. the sum of 2,000l., in which sum, or thereabouts, he now stands indebted to me, subject nevertheless, to and I hereby charge the same with the payment of the following annuities and sums of money, that is to say, to—" &c. The will, after declaring when these legacies were to be paid, went on thus: "Provided always, and I hereby declare that I do not intend by the legacy of 2,000l. hereinbefore bequeathed to my said nephew, G. T., to exonerate or release him from the debt which may be due from him to me at the time of my decease. But I direct that whatever sum or sums of money shall be due or owing from him to me at the time of my decease, shall be taken and considered in part or in satisfaction (as the case may be) of the said legacy or sum of 2,000l., and shall be reckoned and accounted for by him accordingly." G. T. became insolvent, and was never able to satisfy the debt due to the testatrix's estate:—Held, by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cranworth (Lord Wensleydale dissentiente), that the deficiency to meet the annuities and legacies charged on the 2,000l. must be made up out of the general assets.

The question in this case was, whether certain annuities and legacies made payable by the will afterwards stated were payable out of the proceeds of all the testatrix's estate, or were payable only out of a particular fund mentioned in the testatrix's will.

Rebecca Yonge, by her will, dated the 30th of August 1850, after directing payment of debts, &c. as soon as conveniently might be after her decease, gave to the appellants all her freehold, copyhold and leasehold hereditaments, upon trust for sale, and all her personal estate and effects whatsoever unto the appellants, their executors, &c. upon the trusts declared in the will, first, to convert the same into money, then to pay the debts, &c.; "and, in the next place, do and shall pay and discharge the following legacies, that is to say, I give and bequeath to my sister Hannah, the wife of William Lewington, the sum of 10l., and to my sister Mary, the wife of James Pound, the sum of 5l., which I direct shall be paid to them respectively as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. I also give and bequeath to my nephew George Tennant the sum them by G. Tennant upon the decease of Mary Pound would be payable and should be provided for out of the proceeds of the testatrix's real and personal estate. The appellants contended that the annuities and sums of money so payable to the said claimants were not charges upon the general estate of the testatrix, but were only payable out of the debt owing by G. Tennant.

On the 7th of March 1854, the respondents filed their bill, in the High Court of Chancery, against the appellants, and alleged that G. Tennant was in fact wholly unable to pay the debt or any part thereof; and they prayed in effect for a general administration of the testatrix's estate.

The appellants duly appeared and put in their answer to the bill, which answer in substance submitted that the annuity and sums of money by the will of the testatrix made payable to the respondents Mary Pound, David Pound, C. Pound, J. Pound and Ann Dolley, were charged upon and payable out of the legacy of 2,000*l.* bequeathed by the will of the testatrix to G. Tennant, and that such annuity and legacies were not payable out of the general fund to be produced by the sale and conversion of the freehold, leasehold and personal estates of the testatrix.

The cause was heard, before Vice Chancellor Sir John Stuart, who, by a decree made on the 6th of March 1855, declared that the several annuities and legacies bequeathed to the respondents, and by the will charged on the debt of 2,000*l.* therein mentioned to be due to the testatrix from her nephew G. Tennant, were general bequests, and were properly payable out of the general assets of the testatrix, and were not subject to any abatement in consequence of G. Tennant not being able to pay the debt or any part thereof, and that the legacies to the half brothers and sisters of the testatrix and to the appellant H. Vickers were entitled to be paid according to the priority given to them by the will, before all the other legacies and annuities bequeathed by the will. Accounts of the testatrix's estate were also directed to be taken.

The appellants presented a petition of rehearing to the Lord Chancellor; and the cause was, on the 12th of July 1855, re-heard before the Lords Justices of Appeal, who dismissed the appeal. An order on further directions was made in accordance with that decision.

The present appeal was then brought.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. C. Hall, for the appellants, contended that the annuities and legacies charged upon and made payable out of the debt of 2,000*l.* due from G. Tennant, were chargeable on that alone, and were not payable out of the general assets. They cited—

Heath v. Weston, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 601.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that this was an appeal against a decree of Vice Chancellor Stuart, affirmed by the Lords Justices, declaring that certain annuities and legacies were payable out of the general assets of the testatrix's estate, and not out of a particular fund mentioned in the will of Rebecca Yonge, namely, a debt from a nephew.—[His Lordship stated the will.]—The will was ambiguous, and its construction was necessarily difficult, but after a careful consideration of all the circumstances, his mind had come to a conclusion in accordance with the decision of the Court below. On the part of the appellants, it was contended that the legacy to G. Tennant, though originally a general legacy, was made specific by the declared intention that it was not to exempt him from the debt due from him to the testatrix, and that the other legatees and annuitants were made dependent for payment upon the fund which he was to provide out of the debt. On the part of the respondents, various authorities were cited to shew that it was only where a fund was specifically bequeathed, and that fund itself ceased to exist, that the bequests failed, but that where a legacy was merely charged upon a particular fund and that fund failed, the legacy was payable out of the general assets. That, however, could not be asserted as a general rule, and each case must receive its own construction, on the apparent intention of the testator to be derived from the ordinary interpretation of the words used. In this will, the apparent intention of the testatrix was, that at all events a fund of 2,000*l.* should be provided, out of which the payment of the legacies and annuities was to be made. If at the time of her death G. Tennant had paid off his debt, the 2,000*l.* must have been raised out of the general estate, and so far as much as was beyond the amount of his debt at the same period. What G. Tennant was to supply was to be considered alternative and substitutionary. He was to be a trustee for the annuitants and legatees to the extent of the 2,000*l.*, but they were not solely to be dependent on his ability to supply the fund out of which the annuities and legacies were to be satisfied; nor did there appear to have been an intention that the estate of the testatrix was to be relieved from the payment of the annuities and legacies, or that they should fail, if he paid off his debt during her life. The conclusion therefore was, that they should be paid at all events, and that a sum of 2,000*l.* was to be provided absolutely for that purpose; that they were not bequests payable out of a specific fund, which having failed, they failed with it, but that they were to be provided for out of the general estate of the testatrix, unless provided for by G. Tennant. As he had not so provided for them, the legatees and annuitants were entitled to call on the executors and trustees to make good their claims, and the decree of the Court below was right, and must be affirmed, with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH had come to the conclusion, that the decree of the Court below was substantially correct. There was here a clear legacy of 2,000*l.* Was the character of that legacy afterwards altered? If the 2,000*l.* had been paid to G. Tennant, to him alone must the annuitants and legatees have looked for payment. He was constituted trustee for them, upon trusts beneficial to them, and inter alia to himself. There was a provision in the will which had been commented on in the argument, namely, that the trustees (which must mean the trustees of the will, and not G. Tennant) were to invest the two sums of 40*l.* and 50*l.* in case, at the time when, according to the terms of the will they would be payable, the persons to receive them should be infants. That must have meant that the two sums were to be repaid to the trustees, or that if the trustees actually paid the legacy to Tennant, the payment was to be reduced by 90*l.*, which was to be kept in trust for the children. At the time of the testatrix's death, G. Tennant was indebted to her in the sum of 2,000*l.*, and if nothing had been said about that debt, it would have been the duty of the executors to administer the assets, and they must have required him to appropriate the money in satisfaction of the legacies. There was nothing said in the will which altered that.—[His Lordship read the words of the will, and then said]—The contention for the appellants must go this length: that that which was given in one part of the will as a general legacy, payable out of the general assets, was afterwards converted into a specific legacy payable out of the sum of 2,000*l.* due from G. Tennant. There was nothing to shew that such was the intention of the testatrix, or that she meant to make the whole provision for her brothers and sisters and their children dependent on the solvency of G. Tennant. Suppose that G. Tennant had been perfectly solvent and the rest of the estate insolvent? could it have been contended, when the testatrix said she gave the preference to others, that the 2,000*l.* legacy would take precedence. It could not; and yet that must have been so according to this argument of the appellants.

The fair result of the whole direction in the will was this, that this was to be the fund which was to be applied in making up the 2,000*l.*, but not the only fund for that purpose. In his opinion, therefore, the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE had the misfortune to differ from his noble and learned friends. He thought the question depended entirely upon this: whether it could be collected from the will that this was a legacy left by the testatrix to be paid by her executors and trustees to the different parties as a legacy from the testatrix, in which case the pointing out the 2,000*l.*, which was the debt due from George Tennant, would only have been the pointing out the fund that was to be appropriated to the payment of the legacy, and not the absolute satisfaction of the legacy; and if that fund was deficient, then, according to the cases which had been cited, it was perfectly clear that they might have recourse to the general assets. If that was the true construction to be put upon the will, there was an end of the case. That was the view taken by the Vice Chancellor and by Lord Justice Turner. It was impossible for him to help thinking that that judgment could not be sustained. The grounds on which the judgment of the Court below proceeded, were not those which were adopted by either of his noble and learned friends. There was no ground for saying, that this was a legacy that was to be paid by the executors. Lord Justice Turner relied on the words which directed payment within twelve months, or so soon as the real and personal estate could conveniently be converted into money, as shewing that to be the true construction. But it had been, as he (Lord Wensleydale) thought, successfully contended by Mr. Palmer, that it was impossible to put that construction upon those words, because they would not apply to legacies which were not to be paid until within twelve months after the decease of the testatrix's sister, of which kind there were several to children of her nephews. The second ground on which Lord Justice Turner placed great reliance was, that in certain events the executors were to secure the fund which was payable to the infant children. But if the whole of the sentence was looked at, it was impossible to put that construction upon it: for the direction was "that the said legacies or sums of money so given to the said David Pound, Charles Pound, Ann Dolley, Joseph Pound, the child of the said William Pound, and children of the said David Pound, shall be paid to them respectively by the said George Tennant within the space of twelve calendar months next after the decease of my said sister Mary Pound, free from legacy duty, which I direct shall be paid by the said George Tennant." Therefore, the hand to pay was his, and not the trustees'. And then the remaining part of the sentence could be easily explained, without the addition of more than a single word. The direction was, "that the said legacies payable to the child of the said W. Pound and the children of the said D. Pound shall be vested interests in them respectively at their respective ages of twenty-one years, and in the mean time shall be invested by my said trustees or trustee for the time being in or upon any government or real security, and the interest and dividends thereof either accumulated for the benefit of such children, or be paid and applied in or towards the maintenance and education of such children in such manner as my said trustees or trustee shall think proper." It was, therefore, perfectly clear that she meant the trustees to receive the money from G. Tennant, and when they had received it to invest it. This was clear from the whole framework of the will. A testator could make a gift arising out of his bounty an absolute charge upon a particular legacy. No words could be stronger than those here employed to effect that particular purpose. But then, it was said, that there was a general direction to the trustees to get in all the debts, to convert into money such parts of the estate as should not consist of money, and then to satisfy the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, together with the 28th of June 1822 he further charged the same property to the said S. Broadley, to secure a further sum of 500*l.* and interest.

S. Broadley, by his will, dated in May 1825, devised all the property whereof he was seised by way of mortgage unto his wife, Elizabeth Broadley, and three other persons, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust, on payment to his, the said S. Broadley's, executors of the respective sums secured by the said several mortgaged premises, to convey the same unto the person or persons who at the time of making such respective payments should be entitled to the equity of redemption thereof. The testator appointed the same four persons his executors, and died in July 1825.

Elizabeth Broadley, the testator's widow, died in August 1826.

By indentures of lease and release of the 20th and 21st of November 1831, William Maud and James Greenwood, the then two surviving trustees of the will of S. Broadley, transferred to Mary Bacon the said mortgage of November 1818 and further charge of June 1822, in consideration of 2,987*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, then paid to them by her, being the amount of the said two principal sums of 2,200*l.* and 500*l.* and an arrear of interest, amounting to 287*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, then due in respect thereof.

Mary Bacon, by her will and codicil, dated respectively in July 1845 and June 1851, devised to her executors, therein named, all the property which at the time of her decease might be vested in her by way of trust or mortgage, to hold the same upon the trusts and subject to the equity of redemption, which at the time of her death should be subsisting or capable of taking effect therein.

By indentures of lease and release of the 25th and 26th of July 1825, John Cromack the younger conveyed by way of mortgage certain other hereditaments and premises situate in Idle and Eccleshill, in the parish of Bradford, to the said Elizabeth Broadley, to secure a sum of 1,800*l.* and interest; and by the same indentures three several terms of 1,000 years were assigned to John Ness Blakey, upon trust for better securing the payment of the said sum and interest.

Elizabeth Broadley died in 1826 a widow and intestate, leaving Sarah Balme, spinster, and the said Mary Bacon, widow, her sole next-of-kin and also her co-heiresses-at-law, who, in December 1826, obtained a grant of letters of administration of her estate and effects.

Sarah Balme, by her will, dated in March 1828, appointed Robert Turner and Mary Bacon her executor and executrix, but the said will contained no devise of the estates vested in the testatrix as mortgagee or trustee. Sarah Balme died on the 18th of March 1828, leaving the said Mary Bacon her heiress-at-law and sole next-of-kin, who afterwards proved her said will.

Mary Bacon died in February 1853, and her will was shortly afterwards proved by the executors named therein.

On the 26th of September 1853 letters of administration of the goods, &c. of Elizabeth Broadley, left unadministered by the said Sarah Balme and Mary Bacon, were granted to John Turner Bacon, one of the executors of the said Mary Bacon.

By indenture, dated in October 1853, the executors of the said Mary Bacon, in consideration of 5,000*l.* paid to them in the proportions and in manner therein mentioned, transferred the said mortgage and further charge of November 1818 and June 1822, and also the said mortgage of July 1825 to the plaintiffs as tenants in common.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 20th and 21st of August 1828, the several hereditaments comprised in the mortgage of July 1825, and also the hereditaments comprised in the mortgage of November 1818, were conveyed by the said J. Cromack by way of mortgage to John Jackson Lee and two other persons, their heirs and assigns, to secure 500*l.* and interest.

J. Cromack died in July 1842, leaving Jane Padgett his only child and his heiress-at-law and sole next-of-kin, and having by his will devised and bequeathed to her, her heirs, executors and administrators, absolutely, all his real and personal estate.

The bill was filed against Jane Padgett and her husband and J. J. Lee, the survivor of the mortgagees under the mortgage deed of August 1828, and it prayed payment of the sums secured by the indentures of mortgage and further charge of November 1818 and June 1822, and the indenture of mortgage of July 1825, or for foreclosure in default of such payment.

The cause came on for hearing on the 16th of April 1857, when a decree was made to the effect that on the defendant J. J. Lee paying what should be found due on all the above-mentioned securities, he should be at liberty to redeem the mortgages of both estates, or otherwise that he should stand foreclosed.

This decree was not drawn up, and on the 23rd of December 1857 the defendant Lee presented a petition for a rehearing of the cause, under which it now came on to be reheard: the question being, whether the defendant Lee was entitled to have the decree varied by directing that he should be at liberty to redeem, at his pleasure, either or both of the estates mortgaged.

Mr. Malins and Mr. J. Pearson submitted that as the mortgages upon the two estates had become consolidated, the defendant Lee could not be allowed to split up the demand, and insist upon redeeming one estate alone; but must either redeem both estates or be foreclosed. They admitted that the plaintiffs and the representatives of Mary Bacon had, at the time of the mortgage to the plaintiffs, notice of the mortgage to the defendant Lee and others, and they cited—

STUART, V.C. said that, in taking by way of security the equity of redemption of two separate estates, the defendant Lee must be considered as having deliberately incurred the risk which he ran from those securities meeting in one hand, and the entirety of both estates becoming thereby affected by both mortgages. The decree which had been made for payment by him of what was due upon both mortgages or foreclosure must therefore stand.

From the foregoing decision J. J. Lee appealed.

Mr. Lee and Mr. W. H. Terrell, for the appellant, argued that the present case was most materially distinguishable from all the cases which had been relied upon by the other side. It was fully admitted that if two estates be mortgaged by one owner to different persons, and the two mortgages become vested in one individual, the owner cannot redeem one estate without redeeming the other. It was also admitted that a subsequent mortgagee may, by acquiring the legal estate, obtain priority over a former mortgagee, but that was only provided he had no notice of the prior mortgage at the time he acquired the legal estate. In this case, however, the distinction was, that when the mortgage of 1828 was executed it was admitted that notice to the mortgagees of 1818 and 1825 had been given, wherefore the case did not fall within the authorities cited. They cited in detail the following cases:—

Bowker v. Bull.

Holmes v. Turner;

and contended that the case of Tilley v. Davies was an authority, when carefully examined, in favour of J. J. Lee, the appellant.

Mr. Malins was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that a series of authorities precluded the possibility of there being more than one arguable question in the case, if any. The only arguable question was that which Mr. Lee had very ably put—namely, whether notice was material; and one authority for holding it so was cited—that was Titley v. Davies, the observation of Lord Hardwicke upon notice in which was peculiarly made with reference to another point in the case, and for a different purpose. He, the Lord Justice, had looked in vain for, and Mr. Lee had been unable to furnish the Court with, any other case in which notice had been considered material. With respect to this subject, his Lordship apprehended that according to the decisions it was perfectly immaterial whether where a first mortgagee transferred his security to a third mortgagee there was or was not notice of a second incumbrance. The second incumbrancer must be deemed to have knowledge that the two mortgages are liable to coalesce, and knowledge also of the consequences. His Lordship was, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Vice Chancellor was correct; but he agreed with Mr. Lee that there might be ethical considerations of weight against such a doctrine; but that was a matter for the legislature to consider.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER entirely concurred, and observed that the case was governed by the authorities, beginning with Fovey v. Skipwith, and it was not to be supposed that, if the question of notice was one of importance to the decision of these cases, such a point would have escaped the observation of a series of eminent Judges. If notice had been a material consideration, it would have been necessary to allege want of notice in the pleadings, but no trace of any such allegation could be discovered in any of the cases which had been reported. He thought that the appeal must be dismissed; and he also agreed with his learned Brother that if any alteration of the rule upon such a subject as this were necessary, that was a matter wholly for the consideration of the legislature.

Nov. 3. } COMPANY.

Annuity—East India Company—Contract—Refund of Subscription.

A scheme was promoted by the East India Company for granting annuities to their civil servants who subscribed to a fund upon stated terms, which in the result proved in certain cases more favourable to the fund than to the annuitant; but it was held, that in such cases the annuitant was not entitled to a refund.

The Bengal Civil Servants' Retiring Annuity Fund was promoted by the East India Company to provide annually at half the purchaseable value nine annuities of 10,000 rupees each, for nine of their civil servants who on retiring had been twenty-five years in the service, twenty-two years of which had been actually spent in India. One object in view was to keep the service efficient, and to accelerate promotion. The company, according to their statement, had fixed the value of the annuity according to the following table, which had been calculated upon the principle of their allowing interest at 6 per cent. per annum upon all the balances of the fund as thereafter explained.—

The fund commenced on the 1st of May 1825. It was to be made up of deductions of 25 per cent. from the salaries and allowed emoluments of their civil servants who subscribed to the fund; the sum thus raised was to be left in the hands of the East India Company, at interest at 6 per cent., and the company were further annually to subscribe a sum equal to the amount contributed by the subscribers; this was also to be accumulated at like interest; there were, however, some provisions stating that it was to be limited to the amount necessary to meet the nine annual annuities. If any servant having been in the service the required time retired during the first twenty-five years of the institution, he was to pay the difference to the fund between half the value of the annuity on his life and the accumulated value of his previous contributions in case the latter quantity should be less than the former. Separate accounts for each subscriber were kept to determine the accumulated value of the contributions of any subscriber. On the 1st of November 1852 the plaintiff, John Stephen Boldero, who was then between sixty-one and sixty-two years of age, retired, having been twenty-five years in the service, twenty-two of which he had resided in India. In the same year he accepted an annuity of 10,000 rupees (1,000*l.*) a year for life, its value, estimated by the table of values annexed to the regulations, being 76,170 rupees, one moiety of which was 38,085 rupees, but as the plaintiff required his annuity to be paid quarterly, an additional sum of 4,726 rupees was payable; this made the half-value of the annuity amount to 42,811 rupees. At the date of the plaintiff's retirement the sum standing to his separate account, being the accumulated value of his contributions with interest, was 87,504 rupees; this exceeded the half-value of the plaintiff's annuity by 49,419 rupees, and the total amount chargeable against the plaintiff, by the fund regulations, by 44,693 rupees. The plaintiff, accordingly, when he accepted the annuity, applied for a refund of the excess of the accumulated amount of his subscriptions and interest, and he in writing protested against the non-payment of the excess. It was alleged that after making provision for all payments to be made out of the fund, together with some additional charges, which it was proposed to throw upon the fund, there would remain a disposable balance of 1,086,257 rupees, applicable to no purpose of the fund, unless it should be applied to repay to subscribers, who had paid more than the half-value of their annuities, the excess of their subscriptions. This sum of 1,086,257 rupees, with an appropriated balance, amounting together to 2,626,357 rupees, the East India Company proposed to capitalize, and allow the interest thereof in reduction of the contributions of the company to the annuity fund. As the company refused to recognize the plaintiff's claim to a refund, he filed the bill in this cause, and charged that the East India Company were trustees for the subscribers to the fund, and that he had been induced to become a subscriber on the belief, founded on the regulations, that on retirement he would have, in addition to his own savings, accumulated in the shape of subscriptions, a life annuity proportionate to his share in the contributions to the fund, and that he should derive advantages of larger amount than could be realized by other modes of investment, such advantages being available by those eligible to receive them upon terms of strict equality; and that in order to maintain strict equality, the amount of the purchase-money should depend on the value of the annuity, which would be regulated by the age of the annuitant, and that half the value of their respective annuities, and no more, would be required to be paid by servants becoming annuitants.

The bill then prayed for a declaration that the plaintiff and the other subscribers were entitled to a refund of any excess of the accumulated value of their contributions and interest above the aggregate amount of the half-value of their respective annuities, according to the table annexed to the regulations of the fund, and of the sums payable by them in respect of the advantages conferred by the 33rd, 34th, and 40th regulations. It also prayed for payment, with interest, out of the disposable balance in hand, and that the defendants might be restrained from capitalizing the 2,626,357 rupees.

The facts and arguments are further stated in the judgment.

Mr. Butt, Mr. Rolit, Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Freeling, for the plaintiff.

Sir R. Bethell, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Melville, for the East India Company.

Mr. Macnaghten, for George Palmer and Francis Boyle Pearson, subscribers to the fund, who had not paid the half-value of the annuities.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Rogers, for the managers of the fund.

Mr. Palmer, in reply.

Nov. 3.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff desires this Court to put a construction on certain written documents, some of which contain the regulations of the Bengal Civil Service Annuity Fund, and others of which are explanatory thereof; and he asks, that according to the true and proper construction thereof it may be declared that he, as one of the subscribers to this fund, is entitled to the refund of the excess of the accumulated value of his subscriptions, and the interest thereof above the amount of the half-value of an annuity of 1,000*l.* per annum for the rest of his life, at the date of his retirement from the service: such half-value to be calculated according to the table annexed to the regulations of the fund. The suit is not instituted for the plaintiff alone, but he sues on behalf of himself and all other subscribers to this fund who are similarly situated; and the prayer is for the sake of all of them. The bill further prays, that the amounts due to the plaintiff and to others situated as he is, may, in accordance with this view of the case, be paid to them out of certain funds applicable to that purpose. The defendants are, first, the East India Company, next nine gentlemen who are the managers of the fund, and lastly, two gentlemen who represent those subscribers to the fund who have not already by their subscriptions paid the half-value of their respective annuities according to the table referred to, and have not accepted the annuities to which they might be entitled. The documents adduced by the plaintiff in evidence, in support of his claim, are of three different classes. The first class consists of documents which bear date in and prior to the year 1825, and by which the annuities of retiring civil servants in Bengal were established and regulated. The documents of the second class bear date in the year 1835, and relate to the temporary substitution of a new and experimental plan for the purchase of the annuities for retiring civil servants at one-fourth of their value instead of one-half, in consequence of the partial failure of the original scheme; and the documents of the third class bear date in the years 1838 and 1841, and relate to the substitution of a new plan for the acquisition of the annuities by retiring civil servants, and to the various modifications in the scheme of the institution which were proposed, and which were accepted or rejected. The two latter classes of documents bear little upon the real question. They relate rather to the history of the institution, after the experience of some years had shewn its working and tested its efficiency. The question really depends on the documents which bear date in and prior to the year 1825, by which the fund for compensating the retiring civil servants was created and the institution established. The documents of this period are also of very unequal value. They are four in number. The first bears date the 1st of May 1822. It is a proposal in writing made to the East India Company by their civil servants in the presidency of Bengal. It suggests the propriety of raising a fund for providing annuities for retiring civil servants, and points out the means by which this might be done, which is partly by a subscription by themselves, and partly by a contribution of an equal amount to be made by the company itself. It further suggests that the East India Company should act as treasurers of the fund, and that in that character the company should make and pay interest on the funds subscribed and to be retained by them. The second document of this series bears date the 29th of June 1822. It is a despatch from the Governor General to the East India Company, recommending the adoption of this proposal. The third document is the answer of the Directors of the East India Company, which bears date the 8th of December 1824. The fourth document is a letter written by the Secretary of the Government of Bengal to the members of the committee of the civil servants, transmitting and accompanying the answer of the directors. This last document bears date the 12th of May 1825. The document of most importance in this series is the third;—viz. the answer of the directors of the 8th of December 1824, which is an assent to the principle of the proposal made by the civil servants; but servants should subscribe 4 per cent. per annum on the amount of their official incomes and emoluments in the first place, and as this would not be sufficient to provide a fund sufficiently large for the purpose required, the directors of the East India Company to supply a sum proportionate to what they allowed to the Madras fund, which was then in operation; that is, to supply an equal amount with the sums subscribed by the civil servants themselves: and by these means they calculated that a fund would be created, which would be sufficient to make up whatever might be required in order to admit of eight or nine retirements every year upon life annuities of 7,000 company's rupees each; and they suggested that the subscriber should become absolutely entitled to the offer of an annuity for his life of that amount when he had been a subscriber for twenty-three years, but that he was also to be able to entitle himself to a like annuity at any time before that period, provided he paid to the institution the difference between two-thirds of the actual value of the annuity on his life at the date of his retirement, and the accumulated amount of his previous subscription to the fund. The proposal then contains many regulations for working out this scheme in detail. The East India Company, by their letter of the 8th of December, adopted the principle of the proposal of the Bengal civil servants, but on a more liberal scale, and introduced several modifications which were better calculated to secure the object they both had in view. The object of the directors of the company is thus expressed in the 33rd paragraph of their public letter. They state their favourable opinion of the establishment of such a fund, because it was calculated to "answer useful and wise ends as providing for an unexpected loss of fortune, as occasioning the return of the company's servants to Europe by a quicker movement than would otherwise take place, and thus securing to the company the services of Europeans in the most active period of their lives, and making way for the advance of younger servants." The modifications which the directors introduced to promote this object, were to the following effect: they resolved that the annuities should be 10,000 rupees each, at

2s. per rupee, that is 1,000*l.* sterling per annum; raising the annuity therefore from 7 to 10; that the period to entitle a person absolutely to the annuity should be twenty-five years' subscription and twenty-two years' actual residence in India, and that before that time the civil servant might entitle himself to receive it by payment of half of the value of the annuity, towards the payment of which the amount of his subscriptions was to be allowed in account; and the East India Company undertook to contribute whatever money might be required, in addition to the contributions of the subscribers, to enable the fund to grant as many as nine annuities annually on the principle thus stated. Furthermore, in order to diminish the amount to be paid by the retiring civil servant to entitle him to his annuity, the company resolved, by Article 64, that interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum should be allowed on the fund set apart for the payment of the annuities, which would have the effect of causing the subscriptions of the civil servants to accumulate at that rate at compound interest. The annuities in each year were to be offered to the civil servants according to their seniority on the Gradation List of the service as settled by the directors. With respect to existing civil servants, the subscription was to be optional; but with respect to all future civil servants in Bengal it was to be compulsory: and an engagement to subscribe to the fund was to become a part of the covenants of all persons thereafter to be appointed writers.

The general effect of this scheme, in the majority of cases, is very plain. Every one of the Bengal civil servants was to subscribe 4 per cent. out of his official income and emoluments. This was to accumulate at compound interest at 6 per cent. until he retired. Whenever he was desirous to do so, provided the pensions then available were not taken by his seniors, he was entitled to a retiring pension of 1,000*l.* per annum for his life on payment of so much money as, together with the fund created by his subscriptions of 4 per cent. accumulated at compound interest of 6 per cent., would amount to half of the value of such an annuity at the age he had then attained. Thus, supposing a civil servant to have attained the age of forty-five years, and to be then desirous of retiring, the value of the annuity of 10,000 company's rupees for his life is calculated at 101,100 company's rupees, according to the tables appended to the regulations. The consequence would be, that the price to be charged against him for this annuity would be half, or 50,550 company's rupees; and if his subscription of 4 per cent. out of his official income, with the accumulated interest thereon, amounted to 50,000 company's rupees, he would have to pay 550 company's rupees additional, to entitle himself to the annuity. If the subscriptions amounted to 50,550 company's rupees, he would have to pay nothing. In these cases, the regulations are distinct and unambiguous; but if his subscriptions, either with or without the accumulated interest, exceed the 50,550 company's rupees, then arises the question raised by the bill. In that event, is the civil servant entitled to the refund of his subscriptions over and above the 50,550 company's rupees; that is, over and above the sum which was required to be paid, or made good by him, for the purpose of purchasing his life annuity of 1,000*l.* at the rate of the half-value thereof? The plaintiff entered the civil service of the East India Company in the year 1827; he retired in the year 1852: he had been twenty-five years in the civil service of the East India Company, of which twenty-two years had been spent in India; he was then sixty-one years of age; and he was entitled to an annuity of 10,000 company's rupees, or 1,000*l.* sterling, at the rate of 38,085 company's rupees, which, according to the tables already referred to, was the half-value of that annuity, for the remainder of his then life. The balance then standing to the credit of the plaintiff, on the books of the trustees and managers of the Bengal Civil Service Fund, was 87,504 company's rupees, which, after deducting the 38,085 company's rupees, leaves a surplus to his credit of 49,419 company's rupees, which is the amount now claimed by him.

On examining the regulations proposed by the Bengal Civil Service, as altered by the directors, there is no reference made, directly or indirectly, to any payments by a subscriber exceeding the price he would have to pay for his annuity. No allusion is made to any refund under any circumstances, except that in the 14th clause it is provided that any subscriber who may be dismissed from the company's service, shall forfeit all right to any benefit from the institution, and shall be entitled to no refund of any payments which he may have made. We are, therefore, driven, in the absence of express enactment, to consider what view of the case is either impliedly involved in, or if not is most consistent with the frame of the scheme of the existing regulations. The clauses which may be said to relate more especially to this subject, are the 1st, 10th, 11th, 12th, and the 30th. The 1st is in these words: "The subscribers shall, from the 1st of January 1824, contribute for the purposes of the fund one twenty-fifth part of their salaries and all other public emoluments, however denominated, compensation for travelling expenses excepted." The 10th is: "Should any subscriber, having resided in India, in the civil service, not less than twenty-two years, and been a member of the institution the full period of twenty-five years, retire from the service before the option of an annuity may devolve on him, he shall be entitled to the same in his proper turn, without any payment to the fund, save what may be claimable under the following rules." The 11th is: "Any subscriber who may accept the tender of an annuity shall be required, to entitle him to such annuity, to pay to the institution, previous to the date at which the annuity is to commence, the difference between one-half of the actual value of the annuity on his life and the accumulated value of his previous contribution, in case the latter quantity shall be less than the former: these values shall be determined as below provided." The 12th is: "Any member so choosing may decline paying the difference defined in the foregoing rule, and shall in such case be entitled to an annuity, diminished in proportion to the sum by which the accumulated value of his contribution is less than one-half of the actual value of an annuity on his life." The 30th is: "To determine the accumulated value of the contributions of any subscriber, the accountant shall keep separate accounts for each member ; and these accounts shall be annually made up with the rate of interest allowed by the company." These, therefore, do little more than specify the amount, if any, which the civil servant will have to pay, should he accept the annuity when his turn comes. And the 30th specifies how the sum already contributed by the retiring civil servant is to be ascertained. It would seem, therefore, if the matter rested on these regulations alone, that the utmost that could be urged on the subject would be, to say that it was a casus omissus ; but if so, it would be unfavourable to the plaintiff ; because to decide in his favour would be to import into the institution, to meet an unforeseen event, a regulation not only not specified, but not even included, by any inference that could fairly be drawn, either from the general scope of the scheme itself, or from any of the particular and individual classes provided for by regulation. It would, therefore, be impossible for this Court, in expounding the meaning of a contract, to adopt any such course ; but on these clauses, the objection to the plaintiff's case does not rest here ; for what is more important is, that to decide in his favour would not be merely to import a new regulation into the institution, but one which would be inconsistent with some of those which are already established. The first regulation provides that a subscriber shall contribute 4 per cent. from his income, without any limit of time ; viz., that he is to remain a subscriber as long as he continues in the service of the company. The 10th provides that after subscribing for twenty-five years and residing in India twenty-two years, a subscriber may cease to be a subscriber, and retire from the service without forfeiting his right to an annuity in his turn, and without making any further payment than that specified by clause 11 ; that is, without doing more than paying the balance, if any, which may be necessary to make up the half-value of the annuity. In other words, if the subscriber at that time has paid his half-value of the annuity, he will have nothing more to pay ; but if he has overpaid the half-value, what more is to be done, according to the regulations ? Nothing : for it is not stated that the excess is to be refunded to him. It might, no doubt, be extremely difficult to introduce a series of regulations which should exactly specify when the subscription should cease, so as to fit exactly the time when the amount standing to the credit of the subscriber would precisely equal the half-value of the annuity at the age when he chose and was about to retire ; but if it had been the intention of the company and directors to effect such an object, nothing would have been more easy than to have approximated very closely to this end. They might have provided, that the subscription to the fund should at all events cease at that period whenever, having regard to the age of the subscriber and the accumulated amount of his subscriptions, an amount was standing to his credit of not less than half the value of the annuity he would be entitled to receive, if one could then be tendered to him for acceptance ; and the regulations, by way of further approximation to this idea of perfect equality, under all circumstances, if such had been the object, might have further provided that when the annuity was afterwards tendered to and accepted by this civil servant, any accumulation which had arisen over the half-value of the annuity, which it would necessarily have done in consequence of his increased age, since the period when his subscription was stopped, should be refunded to him. But the contrary of all this seems to be contemplated ; and, looking at these regulations alone, it would seem to be provided that the subscriptions are always to be paid by every person as long as he continues a civil servant ; that he is not to retire from the service without forfeiting all right to any annuity, unless he have subscribed to the fund for twenty-five years, and have passed twenty-two of these years in India. This is how the matter stands, when rested solely on the regulations themselves. Upon them exclusively the plaintiff would have nothing on which to found an argument in favour of his claim.

But I then turn to the dispatch itself, and to the clauses which precede and accompany the regulations. I am unable to discover anything to controul or alter the view I have taken of the plaintiff's case, as derived from the regulations themselves; but, on the contrary, when taken as a whole, I find somewhat to confirm it. The clauses principally relied on by the plaintiff are the following: The 52nd, 53rd, 54th, 55th, 56th and 57th. I read the first and last, which are the most important and most favourable to the view of the plaintiff.

"The third part requiring attention is the proportion of value of the annuity which should be paid by the annuitants, or, in other words, what shall be the sum paid by a servant, including his accumulated subscriptions, to entitle him to an annuity, if otherwise eligible; upon which point we must observe, that we consider it of essential importance that so far as may be practicable the advantages afforded by the fund should be available by those eligible to receive them, upon terms of strict equality." The last may be termed a species of summary or winding up of the former ones. It is of considerable length; but the beginning of it is to this effect:—"But although in the mode here proposed all servants upon becoming annuitants will pay half the value of their respective annuities, and no more, and will be so far placed upon an equal footing, yet it has not escaped our observation that there will be a material difference in the value of the risks incurred by the several subscribers of losing, by death or early retirement, the amount of their contributions. The extent of this risk depends upon the sum contributed in each year, and upon the number of years for which the contribution has been paid." Then it proceeds to discuss that subject at considerable length. The first part is the most important for the plaintiff. The first of these regulations, therefore, it is contended, contemplates, as a foundation for the scheme, in the first place, strict equality; which would not, it is argued, be attained if one civil servant contributed a much larger sum than another, and after having so done received only the same amount of annuity. To enforce and maintain this equality, it is argued, by the plaintiff, to be essential to repay to the civil servant the excess which he has paid over and above the half-value of his annuity. The other clause (the 57th) is, it is contended, still more precise in the same direction; for it expressly lays down that the principle of the scheme is "That all servants upon becoming annuitants will pay half the value of their respective annuities, and no more, and will so far be placed upon an equal footing." For the plaintiff, it is argued (and apparently at first sight with great force), that it would be a direct violation of this rule to say, that when a civil servant has contributed out of his official income more than half the value of his annuity, that excess is to be retained, and he is not to have any increase made to his annuity. It is impossible to say, that there is not great weight in these arguments, when these clauses are looked at alone, without the rest of the document with which they are united, but taken in connexion with the rest of the clauses which constitute this institution, it is impossible to give to them the effect contended for by the plaintiff.

In the first place, when we come to the clauses which specify the means by which the annuity fund is to be formed, from 60 to 66, both inclusive, it is stated that the fund is to arise from three sources, and three sources only: viz., first, by subscriptions from civil servants proportioned to their official income; secondly, by contributions from the company; thirdly, by fines from persons being annuitants. In the former case, it is expressly laid down that it is to be an inseparable condition, attached to all persons thereafter appointed writers, that they are to contribute 4 per cent. upon their salaries and allowed emoluments. There is no exception stated; no deduction allowed; no period specified, when this subscription is to cease; but as long as any person is a civil servant, so long must he be a subscriber, and that he shall be a subscriber is to form a part of the covenant which he is to enter into with the East India Company. I have already noticed, how easy and obvious it would have been to stop the subscription at a time when the amount standing to his credit equalled the half-value of the annuity at the age which the subscriber had then reached. If such had been their intention, why did this clause omit to state the period when the subscription should stop, or be silent as to any refund? But what is still stronger, when we look at the words of this clause, according to their rigid and strict construction, they do not import that no civil servant is ever to subscribe more than half of the value of the annuity, but they import that he shall never pay any more than half the value of the annuity. In other words, it simply enacts that the payment, if any, which he will have to make, and which constitutes the third source by which the fund is to be supplied, shall not exceed what, together with his contributions to the first source from which the fund springs, viz. his subscription, accumulated at 6 per cent., shall amount to the half-value of the annuity of 1,000*l.* at his period of life. It might appear, at first sight, that this was a trifling and technical distinction to draw between the word "subscribe" and the word "pay"; but a more careful examination will shew, that it is the true effect and meaning of all these clauses. There are three sources of income by which the fund is to be created. Two of these spring from the civil service: viz. subscriptions and fines, which is the word used, for the payment of the half-value of the annuity. The clauses from 52. to 57. inclusive relate to the latter of these two sources of income. The word "equality" in the 57th paragraph has reference, therefore, exclusively to the equality of price to be paid for the annuity. So, also, the words "no more," in paragraph 57, have reference to the same point, viz. the amount to be paid for the annuity. This point is also made clear, by considering in what manner, and to what extent, the rules provide for the remaining sources of income, by which the fund is to be provided. This (which in these regulations is treated as the second source) is the contributions by the company.

Now by these regulations it is expressly provided that the company shall contribute such a sum, whatever it may be, in addition to the contributions of the subscribers, as will be sufficient to enable the fund to grant the annuities in question: but that is the effect of clause 61. The words are, that "the company shall contribute whatever sum may be required, in addition to the contributions of subscribers, to enable the fund to grant such number of annuities as may be accepted under the prescribed regulations, not exceeding nine per annum." Now the contributions of the civil servants consist of two distinct matters, namely, subscriptions and fines. If the contention of the plaintiff prevailed, it would be necessary for the company not only to contribute what might be required for the purpose here specified, but also what, in addition, might be required for the purpose of refunding to subscribers the excess of the sum standing to their credit above the half-value of their annuity. To effect, therefore, the objects of the plaintiff this clause 61. must be modified, and its present import wholly varied. The express constitution, therefore, of the scheme, as propounded in this letter, negatives the argument founded on the clauses relied upon by the plaintiff, and shews that these clauses must be intended to refer, and to be confined, to the case of the third source of income, viz. the case when the civil servant accepting the annuity has not standing to his credit, as a subscriber, as much as the half-value of the annuity he seeks to obtain. The fact is, that not only is perfect equality, in all cases, not contemplated by the scheme, but the directors point out, and the scheme itself shews, that equality is unattainable. It is prevented by the death, dismissal or resignation of a subscriber before obtaining his annuity; it is prevented by the circumstance that prior claims may exhaust the fund; all which is confirmatory of the observation, that perfect equality was not considered attainable, and that the equality spoken of in the clause in question refers exclusively to the payments to be made in respect of which the third source of income was derived.

This view of the case is confirmed by another circumstance, drawn from the whole of the papers taken together. If we refer to the basis on which the scheme is founded, we find that the contention of the plaintiff would frustrate or impede one of the principal objects it was intended to attain. This object is thus stated by the directors in the opening of their observations on the proposal from Calcutta:—It is in clause 33, already referred to as being that which refers to the "quicker movement." This principle is repeated again in other places. In paragraph 43. it is observed, "Those advantages should certainly be considered, because, in order that the fund may be beneficial to the service, it is important that all the annuities from it, as they accrue, should be accepted by old servants, so that the fund may not be instrumental to the retirement of young and active servants, and it cannot be expected that old servants in the possession, as they generally are, of lucrative offices, would be tempted to retire, if the annuity did not afford a material addition to such income as the party may possess." This is again referred to in paragraph 46:—"As the efficiency and utility of an annuity fund must materially depend upon the inducement afforded by it to old servants to retire, and as it cannot be expected that civil servants will retire to England without adequate provision"—and the same view seems to pervade the whole of the document on this subject. But if a refund of the excess of the sum standing to the credit of the civil servant in his subscription account above the half-value of the annuity at the date of his retirement were allowed, it is manifest that it might, and in many cases must, have an effect subversive of this very object; for as 6 per cent. was to be allowed by the company on the fund set apart for the payment of the annuities, and which fund consisted in part of the subscriptions of the civil servants, the effect is, that their subscriptions accumulate at compound interest at 6 per cent. per annum. If a civil servant received the offer of a retiring annuity, at the period when the sum standing to his credit equalled the full amount of the half-value of his annuity, or nearly so, he might well find it for his advantage to decline accepting this offer, as in every year the half-value of his annuity would diminish, and in the mean time the saving from his subscriptions would be accumulating at compound interest at 6 per cent. per annum; all of which would come back to him when, at some future time, he accepted the annuity. This would be the result if the plaintiff's view of these regulations were the correct one. It is true that the plaintiff does not, at the bar, claim the accumulations of his subscriptions at compound interest at 6 per cent., although he does so by his bill, and that he now only claims a refund of the actual excess paid by him since the time when his subscription fund amounted to the half-value of the annuity. Now it is manifest that this distinction is not maintainable, by any construction to be placed on any of the clauses of the scheme itself, and that if the plaintiff is entitled to any refund at all, he is entitled to the refund of the whole excess of his subscription-fund, as it stands to his credit in the books kept by the trustees and managers of the institution.

Then, again, the whole of the clauses which relate to the principal part of the scheme, and which contain the calculations on which it is founded, negative the view put forward by the plaintiff, both in express words, and in the general scope and spirit of them. Thus it is that in the calculations mentioned in the 62nd clause, and worked out in the 71st clause, the interest is calculated on the balance of the fund in the hands of the trustees; but if in any case there was to be a repayment of subscriptions, what is calculated as the balance would not have been the real balance of the fund, as a part would have been refunded to the civil servant, and accordingly, in that event, all the calculations on the scheme so established would have been erroneous, and a wholly distinct set of figures and calculations would have been necessary. The prospective calculations of the scheme carried on for twenty-four years, anticipate that the whole fund would be exhausted by the annuities accepted. So that if the working of the scheme had been precisely what was anticipated by the directors, and which was the point to which they endeavoured to approximate, there would not have been a penny available to provide for any such refund to any person whatsoever; and any refusal in any case would have created a failure of funds to meet the payment of the annuities. On the hypothesis on which the plaintiff's case is founded, viz., of perfect equality to all persons connected with the institution, although it would have been very difficult to arrive at that result precisely in all cases, yet a considerable approximation to it might have been made very easily by one or two simple additional regulations, if such equality had been the object; but on the assumption that this perfect equality to all subscribers was intended, and that the subscriber is entitled to the refund now contended for, nothing can be conceived more clumsy than the whole scheme, as it would then stand. If the civil servant is to be entitled to a refund, why not stop the subscription when his account equals the half-value of his annuity? and also, why not compel him to accept the annuity as soon as one can be offered to him? What possible explanation can be suggested for the East India Company taking the trouble to accumulate 1-25th part of a civil servant's income and emoluments at compound interest, at 6 per cent., to be repaid to him when he thought fit to retire and accept his annuity of 1,000*l.* per annum? Then, again, what possible explanation can be suggested for depriving of the whole excess of his subscriptions the estate of the civil servant who has notified his intention to retire and accept the annuity, but who dies the day before he retires, and yet paying that excess to the executors of the civil servant exactly similarly situated, but who happens to live two days longer? Why, also, should the civil servant, who has retired when he was entitled so to do under the 10th regulation, but without receiving any annuity, because the option of one had not then devolved upon him—why should he be entitled to receive back the excess of his subscriptions if he live long enough to obtain his annuity, but not if he die before the option of an annuity should devolve upon him?

It is needless to go on accumulating instances of the incongruity, and want of harmony, existing in all parts of the plan, on the hypothesis of the plaintiff's construction. They spring up at every turn. But, on the other hand, the plan, though not productive of equality in all cases, is perfectly consistent and harmonious, if the basis of it is supposed to be this, viz.: that all persons must be subscribers to it as long as they fill the character of civil servants; that if they die or are dismissed or retire from the service, not having resided in India twenty-two years, and not having been a member of the institution twenty-five years, they lose all their contributions and subscriptions, whatever may be the amount of them; that if they live to attain the annuity they get it for nothing, provided their subscriptions accumulated at compound interest at 6 per cent. equal or exceed half the value of their annuity, and if not, they have to pay the difference between their accumulated subscriptions and the half-value of their annuity; that these subscriptions and this payment of the half-value of the annuity, when it takes place, are to make up the sources of income of the fund; and that the East India Company provides what may be required to make up the annuities. This is plain and simple, and appears to be the scope of the whole scheme; and the regulations are well drawn to express these intentions. The arguments, however, which appear to flow from the paragraphs above referred to, and from the general scope and purpose of the scheme, are attempted to be refuted by the plaintiff, in the following manner:—It is argued, on his behalf, that this is a case of contract between the East India Company and each civil servant, and that it must be construed, therefore, according to the terms of the contract, and that the public letter to Bengal of December 1824, so far as it relates to this subject, consists of two branches: first, the clauses which constitute the contract, and then the clauses which describe how that contract is to be carried into effect. This distinction, it is urged, is clear, and recognized in all cases. As, for instance, when a vendor agrees to sell a message to a purchaser for a given sum, this constitutes the contract; but the necessity of making out and of accepting a good title, and of preparing and of executing the conveyance, are the means by which that contract is carried into effect, and which need not be expressed in the contract, but are necessarily incidental to it; and that still less can such clauses, if expressed, controul the effect of the contract, but that they are to be treated on the well-known rule, expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. This argument is applied to this document thus:—It is urged that the clauses in this letter, from 44 to 59, both inclusive, specify the terms of the contract, and that the clauses from 60 to 72, both inclusive, are merely the machinery by which the contract so expressed is to be carried into effect, and that therefore, no inference can fairly be drawn from them to prejudice or hinder conclusions which fairly result from the words used in the first clauses. But this distinction, though accurate in many cases, has not any application to this case. The contract is not contained in any of the earlier clauses, taken separately and conjointly, but it is a contract made up of all the clauses of the letter, and it can only be ascertained by taking them all together. It is not a contract to provide annuities for life to retiring civil servants at a particular price; but it is a contract to provide such annuities in a particular manner, and subject to certain specified conditions, all which conditions are essential and part of the contract. It is also not a separate contract between the East India Company and each one of its Bengal civil servants; but it is a contract between the East India Company and the whole body of their civil servants in Bengal, for the general benefit and advantage of that aggregate body taken collectively. The contract consists in mutual engagements to perform certain acts by the body of the civil servants of Bengal on the one side, and on the other side by the East India Company. The acts to be done by each party are specified in, and are to be collected from, all the clauses of this public letter, taken together with the regulations which are appended to it. The pecuniary part of it is not the only part of the contract; but, so far as that part is concerned, it seems to be distinctly to this effect, viz.: that in consideration of the civil servants subscribing 4 per cent. per annum out of their pay and emoluments as long as they are in the service, and in consideration of their paying what, if anything, may be required to make up the half-value of their respective annuities, to be calculated according to the tables specified, the East India Company will grant and pay nine annuities annually of 1,000*l.* each, for the respective lives of nine retiring civil servants; and this Court can no more diminish the amount to be paid by the civil servants than it can lessen the annuity to be granted by the company.

This is how the question stands upon the construction of the first class of documents, taken alone. Other considerations, however, have to be noticed. When the terms of a contract are plain, usage can little affect the construction to be placed upon it. When it is ambiguous, undoubtedly usage for a long time may influence the judgment of the Court, by shewing how it was understood by the original parties to it. If usage is to have any effect in this case, it is wholly against the plaintiff. From the time of the establishment of this scheme until the year 1835, that is, for ten years, no refund, such as that sought by the plaintiff, was ever made to any one; nor, indeed, does it ever appear to have been claimed. Still, however, the plan was not successful in accomplishing the object which influenced the East India Company in adopting it. The plan was based on the belief, that at least nine persons would be found, in each year, desirous to accept the proposed annuity on the terms so offered, and that accordingly nine annual vacancies in the civil service would by this means be produced. This expectation turned out to be delusive. Even in the absence of any refund the advantages offered were not sufficient to induce a sufficient number of civil servants to retire. Accordingly it so happened that for several years after the establishment of the annuity fund in 1825 nine annuities in each year were not accepted by the subscribers; the consequence of which was, that the annuity fund increased to a considerably larger extent than had been anticipated, and the "quicker movement" in the civil service, intended to be effected by the scheme, did not take place. A memorial was, in consequence, addressed by the civil servants to the directors, praying for some modification of the scheme. To this the East India Company returned an answer on the 27th of May 1835, in consequence of which additional regulations were proposed for the management of the fund by the civil servants of Bengal in 1836, and were sent for approval to the East India Company. They were approved by the directors in a letter, dated the 3rd of May 1837. The effect and general scope of these proposals was, that in future, at the close of every year, two-thirds of the unaccepted annuities were to be offered to subscribers in order of seniority on payment of one-fourth instead of one-half of the value of the annuity, and that in the event of the accumulated subscriptions, with interest, exceeding that fourth, the balance was to be returned to the subscriber. This arrangement was intended to be experimental, and it was proposed that it should last for three years, in order that its effect might be tried. By this plan the regulations expressly contemplate and enact, although only as a temporary and experimental measure, a refunding to the retiring civil servant of his subscriptions if they exceed the price at which the annuity is to be purchased which is fixed at one-fourth of its real value. It is not necessary to go very minutely into this scheme, which was adopted only as a temporary expedient, and was soon afterwards abandoned. But it is not suggested that any alteration should be made in the original scheme, by which the annuities are first offered to the subscribers at half-value, or that this principle of refunding is applicable only to that portion of the fund which is unapplied by reason of the whole of the nine annuities not having been accepted. Practically, however, with this alternative to fall back upon, it was evident that no one would accept the annuity on payment of half-value; and accordingly under the altered scheme six annuities, instead of nine, were granted in each year on payment of one-fourth instead of one-half of the value of the annuity; and in the payment of that one-fourth the amount standing to the credit of the subscriber was to be taken into account, and the balance, if any, in his favour was to be repaid to him. This plan lasted some years, and under it twenty-eight persons received from 1835 to 1842 annuities on these terms. This plan was soon objected to by some of the civil servants who were low on the list, unless it were made a perpetual arrangement, in which case the permanent contributions to be made by the East India Company must have been very materially increased. The result of this was that the new plan was abandoned, and the whole matter was discussed over again from 1838 to 1842 with a view to the permanent establishment of the institution. This discussion gave rise to that which has been termed the third class of documents. They add little light to the subject before the Court. By the 30th clause of the original scheme, any changes might be introduced into it, provided they were carried by a majority of three-fourths of the civil servants at Bengal, and were afterwards sanctioned by the directors of the East India Company. No point on the alterations has been made, and therefore, unless the construction contended for by the plaintiff is to be found in the original scheme, it does not now form any part of it. The short account of these last transactions is as follows. In January 1838 a memorial was sent by the civil servants to the directors, objecting to the refunding the excess of subscriptions as long as the price at which the annuity is to be purchased is to be at one-fourth of its value. On the 1st of September 1841 the Court of Directors sent a despatch to Bengal, in which, in the first place, they point out that the excess of the real balance of the fund over that which had been estimated as the probable balance when the institution was founded had amounted to 2,794,663 company's rupees, and that the half of that sum was 1,397,331 company's rupees; and the directors suggested that this half should be applied in reducing the amount to be paid by the retiring civil servant by way of what is called a fine for the purpose of obtaining his annuity. And, in the second place, they suggested with respect to the refunding to the retiring civil servant, that it would be desirable to confine this refund to the excess which may be standing to his account over and above the half-value of the annuity. This matter was discussed by the civil servants in Bengal in January 1842. Some modifications were introduced into the rules which were sanctioned by the directors, but a clause expressly enacting that the excess of subscriptions over and above the half-value of the annuity should be returned to the retiring civil servant was proposed and rejected by the civil servants at Bengal in consequence of its not having the requisite majority of three-fourths in favour of it. All these proceedings, which I have not thought it necessary to notice in detail, leave the matter very much where it stood before. The arrangement in 1835 was but temporary, and has been finally superseded. A new regulation, removing all doubt in the matter by the express enactment of it, has not been adopted. It cannot influence the decision of this Court on this question; but in considering the argument to be derived from usage, it is singular that when this regulation was proposed and discussed, and also during the previous discussion as to the modifications to be introduced into the scheme itself, it should never have occurred to any one, so far as appears from these documents, to suggest that the rules of the institution then in force contained the very provision which they were seeking to introduce into them, if in truth, with any shew of reason, any such provision could be discovered in the existing regulations; or, what is more material, any person could be found who believed that it had been intended to form a part of the original arrangement. This is how the matter stands on the evidence; what may have occurred at Madras or Bombay cannot affect the question. As to authority, there is little of moment, but what little there is, is unfavourable to the plaintiff. They consist of decisions of the Courts at Calcutta and at Madras. They can have no effect on this question, except so far as the Court may in the judgments then pronounced discover arguments which may assist it on the present occasion. At Calcutta the decision was adverse to the view of the plaintiff. At Madras the decisions were in accordance with his present contention. There is, however, a considerable distinction between the case at Calcutta and that which occurred at Madras. The case of Blunt v. Halliday, which occurred at Calcutta, was a decision in pari materid; and although it will not bind this Court, which is compelled to exercise its own independent judgment, it unavoidably has considerable effect on the judgment of this Court, when it finds that the three learned and eminent Judges who constituted the Court at Calcutta in 1852 have come to a conclusion unfavourable to the claim of a person similarly situated to the plaintiff. With respect to the two cases at Madras, viz., Davis v. the Trustees of the Madras Civil Service Annuity Fund, in August 1856, and Robertson v. the East India Company, in September 1857, Sir Christopher Rawlinson, in deciding these cases, does not in terms dissent from the decision in Blunt v. Halliday, but expressly founds his decision on the fact that a rule had been made and published in 1838, with the knowledge of the East India Company, expressly authorizing the refund which was claimed, and on the fact that the practice of refunding the excess of the subscriptions over and above the half-value of the annuity had prevailed uniformly in that Residency from 1834 down to 1851, without having been objected to. "How then," says Sir C. Rawlinson, referring to a rule passed by the civil servants in that Presidency abolishing the refund, and to which a retrospective effect was endeavoured to be given,—“how then is the plaintiff to be deprived of the benefit of his payments, made on the faith of an express rule and of an unvarying practice of more than twenty years in conformity with it, by the act of a majority, whose power so to bind him was not attempted to be shewn? and certainly no portion of the despatches or of the original regulations contained any provision for such a proceeding—one primd facie contrary to all the rules of equity and of good faith.” It is impossible to dispute that the strong inclination of Sir C. Rawlinson's argument and opinion on the question of construction of the original documents are in favour of the plaintiff; but this was by no means essential for his decision, nor is it in fact rested upon it.

This, then, is how the matter rests on authority. Taking the whole together, then, I find that on the face of the original document, the public letter to Bengal of the 8th of December 1824, and the regulations attached to it, the construction which it bears is unfavourable to the plaintiff; that the whole of the subsequent usage under this document is in accordance with this construction; that no alteration in conformity with the plaintiff's view has since been made in these regulations; and that the only case in which the question has come simply before the tribunals of the Courts in the East Indies, a decision has been pronounced, in accordance with that construction and with that usage, which negatives the case of the plaintiff. The bill, therefore, must be dismissed.

M.R. } In re THE LIVERPOOL BOROUGH
Nov. 20. } BANK, ex parte DURANTY.

Company—Winding-up—False Representations by Directors—Contributory.

If the directors of a banking company which is in difficulties, make a flourishing report to the shareholders and public of the financial condition of the company, and it induces a person to purchase shares in open market, or of third parties, and it turns out after he is registered in the books of the company that the report was altogether untrue and without foundation, and the company stops payment, still the purchaser is a shareholder and liable as a contributory.

The Liverpool Borough Bank was established on the 1st of July 1836; it stopped payment in October 1857, and was registered under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, on the 11th of November 1857. By the return then made, the name of Alexander Duranty appeared on the registered list as a holder of 151 shares. On the 12th of November 1857, resolutions were passed dissolving the company, and also to wind it up voluntarily under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, to which has since been added the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 60, and this winding-up was subsequently continued by an order of this Court. A call of 5*l.* per share was then made, amounting in this case to 755*l.* Mr. Duranty now sought to have his name removed from the list of contributories. From his affidavit it appeared that from 1850 he kept an account at the Liverpool Borough Bank; he also became acquainted with the published half-yearly reports of the directors which were circulated among the shareholders: they purported to shew a most flourishing business, which would yield a dividend of 7*l.* per cent., and at the same time retain a large reserve fund. In consequence of the report of the 30th of June 1857, setting out the financial affairs of the bank, and stating the dividend then, and thereafter likely, to be paid to the shareholders, Duranty, relying upon the truth and accuracy of the report, was induced, on the 19th of August and the 6th and 9th of October 1857, to purchase from different parties as an investment 100, 30 and 21 shares; but on the 27th of October 1857, shortly after he was registered as owner, the bank suspended payment. The affidavit also stated that he subsequently ascertained that the report was false and fraudulent; and that in a case of Scott v. Dixon (1), tried at the Liverpool Assizes, an action was brought against one of the directors, to recover not only the purchase-money but also the calls made by the liquidators, and that it had resulted in a verdict for the full amount of both, on the ground of fraud, which had been committed through the report.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Bardswell, for Mr. Duranty.—The fraud committed by the directors through the misrepresentation in the report had so vitiated the contracts for purchase, that neither the bank nor the liquidators as representing them, could recover anything for calls; on the contrary, the petitioner was entitled to recover the purchase-money, with interest, from the directors themselves.

The National Exchange Company of Glasgow v. Drew, 2 Macq. 103.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Giffard, for the official liquidators, were not called on.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The application is founded upon a misapprehension of the cases; they should be clearly understood. I will endeavour to make the grounds upon which I proceed plain. The rules affecting shareholders and contributories are not new: they are an application of existing rules of equity, where persons enter into contracts, or are induced so to do by the representations of others. In this case, the parties to the contract should be kept in mind. There may also be a third person, whose representations induced one of those persons to enter into the contract. The equitable distinctions which follow on false representations made by every one of those parties must be borne in mind. If one party to the contract makes a false representation, which induces another to enter into a contract, the Court sets that aside, and it becomes void; but if a third person says to A, Do you enter into a contract with B, it will be for your benefit, and makes false representations to induce him to enter into the contract, but without B. making or being privy to any false representations made by the third person, then the contract is valid. But the person who made the false representations is liable to an action to compel him to make good the damage sustained in consequence. That is really the key to the whole of these circumstances. There were formerly many cases in which persons were induced to become original shareholders in joint-stock companies, upon the false representations made by another shareholder, who told them that it was a thriving company, and by a series of false representations induced them to take shares, from which ultimately they desired to be relieved and not to be contributories, upon the ground that they had taken the shares, trusting to the false representations of a third person. This Court said, You did not take the shares from him, but from the directors; they made no false representation to you; you are a shareholder and a contributory, and your only remedy is an action against the man who induced you to take shares. But if a company, by means of its directors, through misrepresentation, induce other persons to become shareholders and obtain a contract from them, it is void, and the company cannot have any advantage from it. In The Deposit and General Life Assurance Company, ex parte Ayre, I held that, where directors, through the secretary, made the original representation to a stranger by which he was induced to subscribe for and take shares from the directors, it was a contract entered into by the directors for the company, and that the false representation avoided the contract. But here the contract is entered into with persons whom I assume to have been bonâ fide shareholders. Each contract was, in this case, between Mr. Duranty and the holder of a certain number of shares, who sold them to Mr. Duranty. If the shareholder had made any false representations,—if he had been cognizant of any false representations, on the strength of which Mr. Duranty bought the shares, and fostered and encouraged those false representations,—then Mr. Duranty, but only as against such shareholder, might set aside the contract and restore the shares, but the shares would still have been held of the company, and being bonâ fide shares they would have been restored to the person who attempted by false representations to sell them. But all the shareholders of the company subscribed, upon the strength of the number of shares taken. The effect, however, of acceding to this application would be, to destroy a certain number of shares; they would no longer exist; they could not be restored to the person who sold them, because, assuming they were not issued originally upon false representations, and that the vendor was a bonâ fide holder, he sold them bonâ fide to Mr. Duranty, who cannot set aside the sale. Had the directors made false representations which induced Mr. Duranty to buy these shares from them,—and it must be admitted that the report of the directors is the report of the company,—still, the observation which I made with respect to the agent of the company not being an agent for the purpose of committing a fraud applies. It does not make the company liable for an action for deceit by reason of their making that false representation; that may possibly be a case for damages against the directors individually, but they are agents of the company simply for the purpose of the contract, and, so far as the contract applies, they can bind the company; but if, by issuing a report, containing misrepresentations, which is in that sense the report of the company, they induce persons to enter into a contract with them, that contract may be set aside, but if it induces other parties to enter into contracts with third persons, the company does not become liable to an action for deceit, although they themselves, severally and individually, who are parties to making the representations, do become liable. That really is the distinction which prevails in these cases. The case of Scott v. Dixon proves this distinctly. It was an action brought, not against this company, but against an individual director, or, if you please, all the individual directors, for issuing a report by reason whereof the plaintiff was induced to buy shares bonâ fide from another shareholder, and in consequence of that to be subject to all the liabilities which attach on a shareholder; and accordingly, in the amount of damages he claims, there is estimated the amount of calls paid by him solely in his character of shareholder and contributory, because, having become a bond fide shareholder from another person by contract, he is obliged to make good the calls which, if he had not bought the shares, would have had to be made good by the person from whom he bought them. That is the measure and the extent of the damages, and consequently it is not necessary to wait for any other action upon the subject, for I assume that the action would apply exactly in the same way. But, assuming Scott v. Dixon to be law, he has his action for deceit, or his action for damages, against the person who made those representations, upon the faith of which he purchased and became a shareholder and liable to pay calls. Were this application granted, the consequence would be that every person who had sold shares from the time that the false representations were made would not be shareholders of the company, and the persons who had bought them would not be shareholders of the company, and if that had taken place to any very considerable extent, the few remaining shareholders would be utterly ruined, and probably the creditors of the company would be ruined also, and that contrary to the faith upon which the one took shares and the other advanced money to the company. It was with reference to that, and that alone, I made the observation I did with respect to its being a question in which creditors were materially concerned, but not more so than other contributories and shareholders in the company. Mr. Durranty has, therefore, made a mistake in this application, and he must remain a contributory. I shall allow the costs of counsel; and the official liquidators' costs must be paid out of the estate.

(1) A rule nisi for a new trial is pending.

Ward of Court—Marriage after Twenty-one—Settlement—Fund in Court—Jurisdiction.

A ward of Court married a fortnight after attaining twenty-one. Upon a joint petition of her husband and herself, asking for payment of a fund in court, part of her fortune, to her husband, the Court refused to accede to the prayer of the petition, though the wife attended and offered to consent; but a reference was directed to the chief clerk to approve of a settlement.

This was the petition of John Thomas Jackson, a miller, and Caroline his wife, asking for the sale and payment of the proceeds of two sums of 493*l.* 14*s.* consols and 96*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* reduced annuities, standing to the credit of this cause, to an account entitled "The separate account of the plaintiff, Caroline Biddles," and also of a small sum of cash, and any dividends which should accrue due prior to the sale.

It appeared that Caroline Biddles was a legatee under the will of Thomas Biddles.

This suit was instituted, by the mother of Caroline, against Edward Philip Jackson and George Jackson, the executors, and the daughter was made a ward of Court.

The funds were brought into court in pursuance of various orders made in the cause, and other funds remained to be brought in.

On the 10th of August 1858, Caroline Biddles attained her age of twenty-one years. On the 24th of the same month her marriage with the present petitioner was solemnized. She now appeared in court to consent to the prayer of the petition.

Mr. Dean, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS refused to make any other order than to refer it to the chief clerk to approve of a settlement.

Mr. Dean subsequently asked that the petition might be re-heard, as cases had been decided holding that no contempt had been committed, and the wife being of age, and willing now to consent to the disposition of the funds, the Court would not act in opposition to her wishes.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—If parties postpone their marriage until after a ward of Court has attained her age of twenty-one years, merely with a purpose of avoiding the jurisdiction of the Court, that I hold to be a contempt, and further argument upon this petition will avail nothing before me.

Mortgage — Priority — Subsequent Advances.

A. mortgaged to B. to secure present and future advances, and afterwards executed a similar mortgage of the same property to C. B. and C. had mutually notice of each other's deeds. B. made advances after the date of C.'s mortgage, and it was held, affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that C. was, in respect of his advances, entitled to priority over B, on account of such subsequent advances made by him.

The case of Gordon v. Graham (1) overruled.

This was an appeal, on the part of the defendants, from a decision of the Master of the Rolls; and the question was, whether the Commercial Bank of London, who were mortgagees prior to a mortgage to Mr. Peter Rolt, the plaintiff, of certain property of Charles John Mare, were entitled to priority over him in respect of advances made by them after notice of the plaintiff's mortgage, or whether the plaintiff's advances were to have the priority. The facts of the case, as far as necessary to be stated, were as follow:—

Mr. Mare was in extensive business as a ship-builder, at Blackwall. He had a banking account with the Commercial Bank of London, and also with private bankers, Messrs. Spooner, Attwood & Co. The Commercial Bank had advanced to Mr. Mare various sums of money on the security of certain promissory notes, made jointly by Mare and the plaintiff, his father-in-law, and also of certain bills of exchange, accepted by Mare, and indorsed by the plaintiff. These notes and bills were renewed from time to time, but were ultimately paid off by the plaintiff. On the 6th of January 1855 Mr. Mare executed a mortgage to the Palladium Company for the sum of 45,000*l.* On the 26th of January he executed a mortgage to the Commercial Bank, stating that it had been agreed, "in order to secure the sum and sums now due, and which shall from time to time become due from him, the said Charles John Mare, on the balance of such account, not exceeding at any one time the principal sum of 20,000*l.*, exclusive of any sum or sums to be paid for insurance and loss by fire, as hereinafter mentioned," that Mare should execute a mortgage in fee of certain property. And then there was a proviso for redemption, by which it was agreed "that if Mare, his executors, &c. should, on demand, pay to the public officers of the Commercial Bank all and every the sum and sums of money which then were, or at any time, or from time to time thereafter should become due from or by Mr. Mare to the Commercial Bank, on the balance of his account current with the bank, either for money paid or advanced or to be paid or advanced by the bank unto or on account of the said C. J. Mare, or what should be secured by any and every bond, bill of exchange, or promissory note, drawn, accepted, indorsed or made by C. J. Mare, upon, to or in favour of the Commercial Bank, then that the bank would re-convey." The plaintiff, Mr. Rolt, had notice of this mortgage prior to the execution of a mortgage to him by Mare on the 12th of February 1855. The plaintiff's mortgage recited, "that the plaintiff, at the solicitation and for the benefit and accommodation of the said C. J. Mare, has for some time past been in the habit of accepting, drawing and indorsing divers bills of exchange, and has also been liable to pay for and on account of the said C. J. Mare, divers sums of money, as the said C. J. Mare doth hereby admit and acknowledge, and the said Peter Rolt, at the like solicitation and request, has consented and agreed to afford the said C. J. Mare similar benefits for accommodation, upon having such security executed to him as hereinafter expressed." There was then a proviso for redemption, which proviso was unlimited, but the amount to be advanced and to be recovered upon the security was ascertained and limited—at least, the extreme limit of it was provided for by the ad valorem stamp being for 30,000*l.* This deed to the plaintiff contained a power of sale, and also a clause upon which considerable stress was laid, "That if the sums of 45,000*l.*" (which was the amount of the mortgage to the Palladium Office) "and 20,000*l.*" (the amount of the covering security to the defendants), "or any part thereof respectively, shall, during the continuance of this security, be paid off or otherwise satisfied, the amount thereof shall become extinguished in the said hereditaments and premises to the benefit of the said Peter Rolt, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and shall go to augment and enhance the value of his security." It was admitted, by the defendants' counsel, that the Commercial Bank had notice of the mortgage to the plaintiff before they made the advances to Mr. Mare on which the question turned; although this fact was denied in a qualified manner by the defendants' answer. These advances were made respectively as follows: 8,000*l.* on the 28th of July 1855, and 7,500*l.* on the 11th of September 1855. The defendants' counsel admitted that the first advance of 8,000*l.* was made by the bank without any specific authority from Mr. Rolt, but alleged that the advance was made under a general authority. For this advance, however, the bank did not rely solely, if at all, on their security of the 26th of January 1855, but upon other securities. With respect to the advance on the 11th of September 1855, it was contended, by the defendants' counsel, that it was made upon the authority of the plaintiff, and that he himself had the benefit of a considerable amount of the advance. The fact, however, appeared to be, that so far from sanctioning this advance, the plaintiff actually gave notice to the bank on the very day upon which the advance was made, that he would not be security for any further advances to Mr. Mare. It was suggested that the fact of giving that notice shewed an intermediate knowledge of all the transactions of Mr. Mare with the bank, which involved the plaintiff in those transactions. But, in explanation of this, it appeared that Mr. Rolt was aware that the wages of the workmen at Blackwall would become due on that day. He thought from his knowledge of the circumstances of Mr. Mare, that it was extremely probable he might apply to the bank for a further advance, and he took the precaution of sending to give them notice that he would not be security for any further advances to him. No part of the money advanced was, in fact, applied to the plaintiff's use. Mr. Mare's account was closed at the Commercial Bank and also at Spooner & Attwood's, and a fresh account was opened in the name of the plaintiff; but that account was entirely for Mr. Mare's benefit, was operated upon solely for the use of Mr. Mare, and was so known to be at both the banks. It was asserted, on the part of the defendants, that the evidence shewed that the plaintiff, Mr. Rolt, was carrying on the works at Blackwall in his own name, and that the payment of a portion of the 7,500*l.* into Spooner & Attwood's bank was received by him for his own benefit, for the purposes of the works, and that, therefore, he must be, at all events, chargeable; that he could not claim a priority in respect of that particular sum. But it was not satisfactorily shewn that the works at Blackwall were carried on in the plaintiff's name, but the sum paid into Spooner & Attwood's bank was actually applied for the purposes of Mr. Mare.

The Master of the Rolls having decreed in the plaintiff's favour, the defendants appealed.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Waller, and Mr. H. Smith appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Taylor were for the defendants.

Mr. R. Palmer was heard in reply.

Gordon v. Graham, 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 598; s. c. 7 Vin. Abr. 52, pl. 16.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the facts of the case as before set forth, said:—The case therefore simply resolves itself into this: a prior mortgage for present and future advances, a subsequent mortgage of the same description; both mortgagees have notice of the other's deed, and advances are made by the prior mortgagee after the date of the subsequent mortgage, and with full knowledge of it. Is the prior mortgagee entitled to priority for these advances over antecedent advances made by the subsequent mortgagee? It appears to me impossible to decide in favour of the subsequent mortgagee, without distinctly dissenting from the opinion of Lord Cowper in Gordon v. Graham, if not expressly overruling his decision. I have been unable by tracing this case to its final result in the registrar's books to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion respecting the mode in which Lord Cowper ultimately dealt with the advances made after notice of the subsequent mortgage. It is said in the report of the case both in Vin. Abr. and in Equity Cas. Abr. that upon the importunity of counsel, it was ordered that the Master should report what money was lent by the first mortgagee after he had notice of the second mortgage," which, as Lord St. Leonards observes in Shaw v. Neale, is inconsistent with the opinion he was at first supposed to express. The decree for the Master to report appears to me to bear out the statements in the reports, and to be completely irreconcilable with the strong opinion attributed to Lord Cowper; for although he certainly directed that the first mortgagee should be paid what was due to him for principal and interest, yet if he was of opinion, as he is reported to have been, that the first mortgagee was entitled to everything which he advanced, it appears to have been wholly unnecessary to have directed an inquiry, as he did, as to any monies advanced by Turner on the credit of the mortgage after the 25th of August 1713, upon which, if the Master found that there were any such subsequent advances, he was to state the same specially. The fate of this case of Gordon v. Graham has been singularly unfortunate. It has never been followed as an authority; it has frequently been questioned by text-writers, and whenever it has been cited in argument it has elicited some expression of disapprobation from the Judges. In the recent case of Shaw v. Neale the Master of the Rolls intimated his doubts of the soundness of the decision; and in the same case, in the House of Lords, all the remarks made upon it have a similar tendency, though it was unnecessary to determine whether it ought to be regarded as a binding authority. The case, therefore, has been repeatedly shaken by side winds, and must now have its foundation examined; for if the opinion of Lord Cowper is right, then the decision of the Master of the Rolls in this case was wrong. Now, the reason given by Lord Cowper for giving priority to advances made by the first mortgagee, after a second mortgage, though he had notice of it, is because it was the folly of the second mortgagee, with notice, to take such a security; but this is a two-edged reason which reaches to the first as well as to the second mortgagee, for it may as well be said to have been the folly of the first mortgagee to hazard further advances after notice of the subsequent incumbrance. Mr. Lloyd suggested that there might be a difference between the case of Gordon v. Graham and the present case, because in the case of Gordon v. Graham there was a sum actually advanced, and the security was taken for that sum and further advances, but that here nothing was due at the time of the mortgage, which was a covering security merely for advances in future. I confess I am unable to appreciate this difference. But then he insisted that instructions having been given to the same solicitor for the mortgage to the Commercial Bank and to the plaintiff, the two mortgages cannot be considered as one transaction; and that it would therefore be unreasonable to suppose that the effect of the first mortgage was to be immediately paralyzed by the second, when it was known that the very object of the first mortgage was to secure only future advances, and this was very strongly pressed upon me in the course of the argument by Mr. Taylor. There seems to me to be no ground for asserting that the two mortgages can be regarded in any sense as one transaction; but if they could, the first mortgagee knew that the second mortgage was created, and he knew (and upon that very considerable stress has very properly been laid) that it contained a power of sale, which, if it were exercised, would have prevented his tacking subsequent advances against a bonâ fide purchaser, and thus render his security for advances subsequent to the second mortgage extremely precarious. Nor would the case supposed by Mr. Lloyd of a second mortgage depriving the first mortgagee of the benefit of the security for future advances, necessarily arise, because advances might have been made by the first mortgagee before the execution of the second mortgage, even to the utmost limit of amount; and in the ordinary course of such a transaction it seems extremely probable that some advances should have been immediately made, which, of course, would have priority over a subsequent mortgage. If the case of Gordon v. Graham were to be followed as an authority, then the moment a covering security, as it has been called, for future advances was made, it would preclude the possibility of the mortgagor being able to raise money from any other person, because the claim of a second mortgagee under such circumstances would be indefinitely postponed, according to the fluctuating nature of the balance under the prior mortgage. For these reasons, I am not disposed to consider Gordon v. Graham as an authority by which I ought to be bound; but I am of opinion that in this case the plaintiff is entitled to priority for his advances made before the advances by the Commercial Bank with full knowledge of the plaintiff's security. I think, therefore, that the decree ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.	{	In re THE WELSH POTOSI MINING COMPANY, ex parte TOBIN.
Nov. 6.

Company—Winding up—Costs of Action by Creditor.

A creditor of a joint-stock company (limited) commenced an action against one of the shareholders. A petition for winding up was then presented, and notice given to the creditor of such petition, but the creditor continued proceedings in the action until the advertisement appeared for a creditors' representative:—Held, that the creditor was entitled to his costs of action up to the period of advertisement.

On the 27th of January 1858, an action was commenced, by Messrs. Tobin, gunpowder merchants, at Liverpool, against the Messrs. Lyell, who were shareholders in the Welsh Potosi Mining Company, to recover a sum of 214*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, alleged to be due to them, in respect of a debt contracted on account of the company. On the 12th of February the declaration was delivered in that action. On the 22nd of the same month, two pleas were put in to the action.

On the 4th of February, the Messrs. Lyell presented a petition to this Court, praying that the company might be wound up under the provisions of the Winding-up Acts, and an order was made accordingly. Notice of the petition was served upon all the creditors. On the 23rd of the same month, an advertisement appeared in the Gazette, in conformity with the 1st section of the Joint-Stock Companies Amendment Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78, calling upon the creditors of the company to appoint a creditors' representative. The winding-up order was prosecuted in the Judge's chambers. The action at law being stayed by the advertisement for a creditors' representative, an affidavit of debt was brought in on behalf of the Messrs. Tobin. On the 19th of April, the chief clerk admitted proof of the debt, but disallowed the claim made by them for costs in the action, amounting to 12*l.*, incurred prior to the date of the advertisement. The case was adjourned into court, upon the question whether the Messrs. Tobin were entitled to such costs.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Baggallay, for the Messrs. Tobin, contended that they were entitled to their costs of the action. They were perfectly justified in commencing proceedings for the recovery of their debt before the winding-up order had been applied for; and though by the 7th section of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78, they were estopped from proceeding in their action, when the advertisement appeared for a creditors' representative, still they were entitled to their costs up to that period. This case was analogous to a creditors' suit, where the decree put an end to all actions at law; but then the creditors who had brought actions were entitled to their costs. It was true, this was not the case in bankruptcy; but the reason of that was, that the creditor had then the option of continuing his action or not, as he thought most for his own interest. Under the act of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78, the creditor had no such option, and ought to be allowed his costs.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Giffard, for the official manager, submitted that the Messrs. Tobin had, in this case, put the company to unnecessary expense, for they had proceeded with the action after notice had been given to all the creditors that a petition for winding up had been presented. There had been many other actions commenced by creditors, and no fewer than 150 writs had been issued by various creditors against the different shareholders, but the other actions had been stayed upon notice of the petition: there were assets sufficient in this case to pay all the creditors in full. It was true, that a creditor in bankruptcy might continue his action pending the proceedings, but not after the certificate had been obtained. This Court had also jurisdiction, under the 7th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78, to allow a creditor to continue his action; but no such permission was applied for in this case. They cited the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, s. 181, and Ex parte Bell (1).

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — In the abstract, the matter stands thus: by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78. s. 7, where there is no bankruptcy, after the advertisement for creditors to appoint a representative, no such action as mentioned in the 73rd section of the act of 1848 is to be prosecuted, except by leave of the Judge or Master, so that the advertisement for a representative to protect the rights of creditors operates as an injunction. Now, where a creditor has bond fide brought an action, either against a company or any member of it, in order to recover a debt which afterwards turns out to be really due, it is clear, in the abstract, that in moral justice, he ought not to be stopped from doing so, except upon the terms of having his costs up to the time of issuing the advertisement, provided he is an honest creditor. That abstract justice is recognized in an administration suit, where the decree, under a proceeding of the Court of Chancery, and not an act of parliament, operates as an injunction as against all creditors; but they are allowed their costs up to the date of the decree, and it is impossible not to see that justice requires that a man who has been fairly proceeding to recover his rights ought not to be suddenly and peremptorily stopped, except on being recouped his expenses. Unless there is anything special in this particular case, that must be the creditor's right here, and he must be allowed either to prosecute his action and recover all he can, or to prove for his costs as well as his debt. It will be for every one's benefit (the debt not being disputed) that no further costs should be incurred, in other words, that the action should not go on; but leave to go on with the action cannot fairly be refused, except on the terms of allowing proof of the costs, in addition to the debt. It does not appear to me, upon the facts of this case, that any improper expenses have been incurred, for it was not Messrs. Tobin's fault that a number of other creditors were proceeding at the same time, which rendered so many writs necessary. The action was brought before any notice was given of an intention to present a winding-up petition, and when it was presented, the creditor was not only not bound to stop, but he might have lost by so doing, for the petition might never have been prosecuted, or it might have failed, more particularly considering the peculiar position of this company, with a limited liability. The Messrs. Tobin are, therefore, entitled to the costs of the action up to the time of the advertisement, to be taxed in the usual way.

WOOD, V.C. }
Nov. 15, 18, 23. } NEALE v. DAY.

Voluntary Settlement—Goodwill of an Attorney's Business—Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5.

An attorney being in insolvent circumstances, assigned the goodwill of his business in consideration of a sum of money paid down and an annuity secured by bond to be paid to his wife for life, with remainder to himself for life:—Held, that the settlement of the annuity was void as against creditors.

previously thereto, the defendant, E. A. Day carried on business as a solicitor, in the Temple, and being somewhat straitened in his pecuniary affairs, applied to the defendant Westoby for an advance of money. In consideration of this advance, Day granted to Westoby an annuity of 360*l.* for his (Day's) life, and gave him a bond in the penal sum of 6,000*l.*, dated the 6th of May 1852, to secure the annual payments. By deed, dated the 26th of June 1852, Westoby assigned the annuity to one Studley, who died in November 1853, having appointed the plaintiffs his executors.

In November 1852, Westoby brought an action against Day, to recover certain arrears of the annuity, and in March 1853, obtained a judgment for 174*l.* 4*s.*, which was registered.

Other actions were brought against Day for further payments of the annuity, and judgment was, in December 1855, entered up against him for 611*l.* 12*s.*

No payment had been made in respect of the annuity since December 1855, and there was now due in respect thereof 1,165*l.* for principal, with an arrear of interest, besides what was due on the judgment.

In May 1856 Day disposed of his business in the Temple to W. W. Wright, in consideration of 1,800*l.*, or thereabouts, and also an annuity of 100*l.*, which was secured by bond, to be paid to Day's wife, for her life, with remainder to Day himself, for his life.

The bill was filed against Day and his wife, W. W. Wright, W. K. Wright, the obligee named in W. W. Wright's bond, and against Westoby, praying that, as against the plaintiffs, and if necessary, all other the creditors of Day, the settlement of the annuity so secured by the bond, might be declared to be fraudulent and void, and that the defendant W. K. Wright might be declared a trustee thereof for securing the same for the plaintiffs and the other creditors of the defendant Day; and also praying that W. K. Wright might be ordered to pay into court the annuity and the arrears thereof when due.

The defendant Day admitted, by his answer, that at the time of the assignment of his business to W. W. Wright he was greatly embarrassed in his circumstances and unable to meet his engagements.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Whitbread, for the plaintiffs, contended that the case was identical with French v. French (1), and the settlement of the annuity, therefore, was voluntary and void under the 13 Eliz. c. 5. They cited also Barrack v. M'Culloch (2).

Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Chapman Barber, for the defendants Day and wife, took a distinction between this case and French v. French, on the ground that the goodwill of the business of a solicitor, which was the consideration for the annuity, was not assets available for creditors.

Mr. C. Hall, for W. W. Wright.

Mr. G. L. Russell, for W. K. Wright.

Mr. Daniel, in reply.

Nov. 18.—Wood, V.C. (after stating the facts of the case).—The question is, whether the settlement of the annuity, secured by the bond of May 1856, is void as against judgment creditors, in respect of its being, under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, an attempt to hinder creditors. The bill has been filed on the authority of French v. French, and it seems to me impossible to distinguish that case from this. In that case a person made over his business, stock-in-trade and fixtures, in consideration of a sum of money paid down and an annuity to be paid to himself during the joint lives of himself and the purchaser, and afterwards a smaller annuity to his wife, in case she survived him, with power to himself to dispose of his wife's annuity; and by one of the exhibits it appeared that the annuities were granted for the name and goodwill of the business, and were to be collaterally secured by the policies of assurance; and the Lord Chancellor deals thus with the case. In his judgment he says, "I consider that annuity so payable to the widow just in the same light as if it were taken and applied to his own purposes and abstracted from his creditors, and, in my opinion, it amounts to a voluntary settlement in favour of his wife."

With regard to the older authorities, there are several in the books, by which it appears that where property has been voluntarily assigned, which could not have been reached by the creditors, it was considered not to be within the meaning of the statute, and on that ground a purchase in the name of a wife or child was considered not to be within the statute, inasmuch as the settlor might have given them the money; and in commenting upon those authorities, Lord St. Leonards remarks (3), "It has been strenuously argued that a purchase is not within the operation of the statute of the 13 Eliz. c. 5; for as the purchaser may give the money to the object of his bounty to purchase the estate for himself, he may, by the same reason direct a conveyance to be made to him; and this seems to be the better opinion where the case is clear of actual fraud." It appears to me, however, in the first place, that French v. French is precisely the case before me, and, therefore, conclusive of the question; and, in the next place, if that case were out of the way, it appears to me that the real test is, whether or not a fraud upon the creditors was intended in the transaction. In this case it is in effect a contract by which the debtor is making sale of his property by means of a covenant that he will abstain from carrying on business, and taking a settlement of the purchase-money upon his wife for life, for her separate use, with the immediate remainder to himself for life; the whole object plainly being to obtain the benefit of the entire property for his own use and advantage. Even upon the older authorities alone, it is very questionable whether such a transaction would not be a fraud within the direct purview of the statute; but independently of that, the case of French v. French is an authority precisely in point, and I must follow it.

Nov. 23.—The case being in the paper this day to be spoken to on the minutes, the following decree was made:—Declare that the provision made in the condition of the bond of the defendant W. W. Wright, for payment of an annuity of 100*l.* per annum to the defendant H. S. Day, the wife of the defendant E. A. Day, is fraudulent and void as against the plaintiffs, as judgment creditors of the defendant E. A. Day, and that as between the plaintiffs and the same defendants, the said annuity ought, during the life of the said H. S. Day, to be paid to the plaintiffs until satisfaction of the judgment, interest and costs. Direct the defendant E. A. Day to deliver up the bond to W. K. Wright, the obligee thereof, as trustee for the plaintiffs, until such satisfaction of their judgment, interest and costs; and let the defendant W. K. Wright deposit the same with the clerk of records and writs; and on his so depositing the same, tax his costs as between party and party, and let the same be paid by the plaintiffs without prejudice to the said defendant's retaining his extra costs as between solicitor and client, out of any money to be recovered on the bond; and tax the defendant W. W. Wright his costs of the suit, to be paid by the plaintiffs. Tax the plaintiffs' costs; order the defendant Day to pay the plaintiffs their costs, and also the costs which shall be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants W. K. Wright and W. W. Wright; and in default of his so paying the same, the plaintiffs are to be at liberty to add such costs to their judgment debt. Liberty to the plaintiffs to apply at chambers with respect to putting the bond in suit; and also to the defendant W. K. Wright to apply as to extra costs.

Nov. 3. } JONES v. NOYES AND ALLEN.

Lunatic—Debt due to Committee—Application of Purchase-money—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104.

A committee of a lunatic has no special lien upon the estate, after the death of the lunatic, for money expended by him on his behalf, and a purchaser having notice of the claim of the committee is no more bound to see to the application of the purchase-money than if he bought with notice of simple contract debts.

The bill, in this case, stated that, by the settlement made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Battaglia, dated in 1815, certain real estates were conveyed to trustees, of whom the defendant Noyes was one, upon certain trusts, which subsequently failed, with an ultimate trust to convey the same to the use of Mrs. Battaglia, in fee. In 1848 Mrs. Battaglia, who had then become absolutely entitled under the ultimate trust, was found lunatic by inquisition, and the plaintiff was appointed committee of her estate. In 1851, having survived her husband, she died, without issue, illegitimate, and intestate, and thereupon the defendant Noyes, the surviving trustee, entered into possession of the real estates, and shortly afterwards sold them to the defendant Allen, applying the purchase-money to his own use.

The personal estate of Mrs. Battaglia was insufficient for her debts, and the plaintiff having been sued for, and compelled to pay a sum of 130*l.*, for costs incurred in the matter of the lunacy, now filed his bill against Noyes and Allen, stating that at and previously to the time of the said sale the defendant Allen had distinct notice of the proceedings in the said lunacy, and that the final accounts of the plaintiff, as such committee, had not been passed, and that monies were due from the lunatic's estate to the plaintiff as such committee, and that the defendant Noyes took the real estate, subject to what was so due from the lunatic's estate, and that it was the intention of the defendant Noyes to appropriate the purchase-money to his own use; also, that on the occasion of such sale an arrangement, by way of indemnity, was entered into between the defendants Noyes and Allen, to protect Allen against any claim to be thereafter made by the plaintiff, in respect of what might be due to him from the estate of Mrs. Battaglia; and the bill prayed that the 130*l.* might be declared to be a charge on the real estate in the hands of Allen. To this bill the defendant Allen put in a plea, denying that at the times of the sale and conveying to him, he had any notice that it was the intention of Noyes to appropriate the purchase-money to his own use, except what might remain after satisfaction of such claims as the real estate was subject to, and averring that no arrangement was made between him and Noyes to protect him against any claim of the plaintiff.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Phear, for the defendant Allen, contended that though the estate might be assets in the hands of Noyes for the payment of debts, the claim of the committee was not a specific charge upon the estate, and the purchaser was not bound to see to the application of the money.

Sugd. Vend. and Pur. 11th ed. 834.

Mr. C. M. Roupell (with Mr. Rolt), contra, contended that the claim of the committee being similar in its effect to a lis pendens, of which the purchaser had notice, he stood in a higher position than an ordinary creditor—Beale v. Symonds (1).

Wood, V.C. (without calling for a reply) said, that clearly an ordinary creditor would have no charge upon the real estate of a deceased debtor, and a purchaser from his heir or devisee would not be bound to see to the application of the purchase-money. In this case Noyes was in the same position as the heir or devisee of a deceased debtor, and the only question was, whether the creditor, having been the committee of the lunatic's estate, had any higher rights than an ordinary simple contract creditor. His Honour had come to the conclusion, that he had not. There was no lien upon the estate, for the grant to the committee was only during the lunacy, and his interest ceased upon the death of the lunatic; and the knowledge which the defendant Allen had of the claims of the committee could not affect him any more than the knowledge that the lunatic had died indebted to her butcher or baker, or any other simple contract creditor. The plaintiff's remedy was clearly against Noyes alone; and the plea must, therefore, be allowed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
 Nov. 8. } HEWITT v. NANSON.

Mortgage—Foreclosure Suit—Conduct of Sale.

A second mortgagee is entitled under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, to apply in a foreclosure suit for the conduct of the sale of the estate; but the Court will exercise a discretion, and will refuse such application, upon being satisfied that expense will be saved by giving the conduct of the sale to the first mortgagee.

Certain property was mortgaged in fee by a testator to Elizabeth Nanson. The testator died, having devised the equity of redemption in the estate to his four daughters, as tenants in common. One of the daughters executed a mortgage of her fourth to Elizabeth Nanson, by way of further charge. Subsequently, another of the testator's daughters mortgaged her fourth share in the estate to the plaintiff Hewitt. Elizabeth Nanson died, and this suit was instituted, by the plaintiff, against her representative and against the four daughters of the testator for a foreclosure, and for a sale of the property, the plaintiff asking that he might have the conduct of the sale.

Mr. Bagshawe, jun. appeared for the plaintiff, and submitted that he was entitled to apply for a sale of the mortgaged estate under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 48, and that the conduct of the sale ought to be given to him.

Mr. Greene and Mr. T. D. Salmon, for the defendant Nanson, said that no objection would be raised to the sale, provided the conduct of it were given to the defendant. The title-deeds were in his possession, and, therefore, the title could be made out at less expense by him than by the plaintiff. They cited Hurst v. Hurst (1).

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Bedwell appeared for the daughters of the testator.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a case in which, prima facie, it will be for the benefit of all parties that a sale should take place, and the only question, therefore, is, who ought to have the conduct of the sale? Now, the plaintiff, although he is only second mortgagee, and then only of a fourth part of the estate, is nevertheless entitled to apply for a sale, under the act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86; but, by the 48th section of that act, the Court is empowered to exercise a discretion for the purpose of doing justice between the parties. Now, it appears that the defendant Nanson, who was the first mortgagee, has got all the title-deeds and papers relating to the property, and it is stated that he would be able to prepare the title and give the requisite information much more easily and at less expense than the plaintiff; consequently, I think, that justice and convenience would be best consulted by the conduct of the sale being given to the first mortgagee.

(1) 16 Beav. 372; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 538.

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

 Nov. 9. } EDWARDS v. MARTIN.

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Decree.

A suit having been instituted by a first mortgagee to redeem or foreclose several subsequent incumbrances, the Court made a special decree, fixing a day for any of the subsequent incumbrancers to redeem or be foreclosed.

By a mortgage, dated the 22nd of September 1852, certain property, called the Marlborough Hill Gardens, was mortgaged by William White to John Edwards, for the purpose of securing the sum of 2,500*l.*, with a proviso for redemption, on payment of the 2,500*l.* and interest, and all sums which should in the mean time be advanced. On the 20th of April 1854, William White mortgaged a portion of the property comprised in the previous mortgage to Edward Martin and Octavius Wood, for securing a sum of 300*l.* On the 14th of June 1854, William White mortgaged other portions of the property comprised in the first mortgage, to John Culverhouse, to secure other sums of money therein mentioned. On the 13th of September 1855, William White mortgaged certain other property in the Finchley Road to the first mortgagee John Edwards, as an additional security for the money already advanced by him, and for what might thereafter be advanced, not exceeding in the whole 800*l*. William White subsequently executed successive mortgages of the Finchley Road property to four other persons, named Samuel Tildesly, John Weston, Edward Spiller and Edward Simms, to secure the several sums mentioned in such mortgages. In September 1855, William White became a bankrupt, and the bill in this case was filed by John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, as the representatives of John Edwards, the first mortgagee, against the subsequent incumbrancers, for an account of what was due in respect of the mortgages of the 22nd of September 1852 and the 13th of September 1855, and for redemption or foreclosure.

The usual decree having been made at the hearing, the chief clerk made his certificate on the 7th of June 1858; and the case now came on upon a discussion as to the form of decree to be adopted.

Mr. Baily and Mr. R. W. Moore appeared for the plaintiffs; and—

Mr. George Lake Russell and Mr. Collins, for the defendants. They cited—

Seton on Decrees, last edit. 217.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., after consulting with the registrar, directed the usual accounts, and made a decree in the following terms:—"And let, upon the defendants Edward Martin, Octavius Wood, John Culverhouse, Samuel Tildesly, John Weston, Edward Spiller and Edward Simms, or any or either of them, paying unto the said plaintiffs, John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, what shall be certified to be the amount so remaining due to them, within six months after the chief clerk of the Judge to whose court this cause is attached shall have made his certificate, at such time and place as shall be thereby appointed, the said plaintiffs, John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, convey the said premises comprised in the said mortgage securities, dated respectively the 22nd of September 1852 and the 13th of September 1855, free and clear of and from all incumbrances done by them or by the said John Edwards, and deliver up all deeds and writings in their or either of their custody or power relating thereto upon oath, to the said defendants or to such of them as shall so redeem the said plaintiffs, John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards; such conveyance to be settled by the said Judge, in case the parties differ about the same: and let, in case the said defendants Edward Martin, Octavius Wood, John Culverhouse, Samuel Tildesly, John Weston, Edward Spiller and Edward Simms, or any or either of them shall so redeem the said plaintiffs John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, the said defendants or defendant so redeeming the said plaintiffs, be at liberty to apply to this Court as they or he may be advised; and on such application it is not to be incumbent on the defendants or defendant so applying, to give the said plaintiffs, John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, notice thereof: but let, in default of the said defendants or any or either of them so redeeming the said plaintiffs, John Edwards and George Thomas Edwards, by the time aforesaid, the said defendants Edward Martin, Octavius Wood, John Culverhouse, Samuel Tildesly, John Weston, Edward Spiller and Edward Simms, from thenceforth stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, interest and equity of redemption of, in and to the mortgaged premises comprised in the said indentures, dated respectively the 22nd of September 1852 and the 13th of September 1853; and in taking the said accounts all just allowances are to be made."

In re THE NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM DISTRICT BANKING COMPANY, ex parte BIGGE.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Liability of Shareholders—Misrepresentation of Directors.

A. B. was tenant for life of certain shares in a banking company, under a will of which his uncle was executor. At the request of A. B., his uncle, who was a director of the company, transferred these shares into his name for a nominal consideration, in order to qualify him to be a director. A. B.

became a director, and the company failed, and was ordered to be wound up. A. B. objected to his name being placed on the list of contributories, on the ground that, prior to his taking the shares, the directors had published fraudulent reports of the affairs of the company, and his uncle, being a director, must have known that they were fraudulent; and also that, being only tenant for life of the shares, it was a breach of trust on the part of his uncle to transfer the shares into his name, and that the directors must have been aware of the fact; and therefore that the transaction was a nullity:—Held, that A. B. must be placed on the list of contributories.

This case came on upon an adjourned summons, for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the Court, as to whether Charles Selby Bigge had been rightly placed upon the list of contributories, in the winding up of the Northumberland and Durham District Banking Company.

The facts were as follows:—Charles Selby Bigge attained the age of twenty-one years on the 21st of July 1855, two months after he had left college. He went to reside at Linden, and shortly afterwards, upon the death of his grandfather, Charles W. Bigge, he became entitled under his will to a large amount of property as tenant for life, and part of this property consisted of shares in the Northumberland and Durham District Banking Company. In the month of September 1856 it was suggested to Charles Selby Bigge, by some of his family, that it would be a desirable thing for him to become a director of the above bank, for the purpose of giving him employment; whereupon he applied to his uncle, Matthew Robert Bigge, who was the executor under his grandfather's will, and who was himself a director of the bank, to ascertain whether his wishes could be carried into effect. He was then informed by his uncle, that it would be necessary, in order to qualify him for becoming a director under the banking company's deed, that he should be the holder of at least fifty shares, and an arrangement was thereupon come to by which, in September 1856, the uncle, for the nominal consideration of 5s., transferred sixty of the bank shares standing in the name of the grandfather into the name of Charles Selby Bigge. It was understood that this transfer was made for the sole purpose of qualifying Charles Selby Bigge to become a director, and he was accordingly appointed a director; but the dividends upon the shares were not paid to him, but were received by Matthew Robert Bigge, as such executor of his grandfather.

The company was ordered to be wound up in April 1858, and Charles Selby Bigge was placed upon the list of contributories in respect of the said sixty shares.

There was evidence to shew, that previously to Charles Selby Bigge taking these shares, two reports, with accompanying accounts, had been issued by the directors of the company, which contained false representations as to the position of the bank, and a report to that effect had been made by the official liquidator, who stated that the reports and accounts did not represent the true state of the affairs of the bank at the respective dates of such reports and accounts, the bank having to the best of his belief been, at the dates of such reports and accounts, in a state of insolvency.

An affidavit by Charles Selby Bigge contained a statement of the circumstances under which he was induced to take the shares.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Karslake appeared in support of the application to remove Mr. Bigge's name from the list of contributories, and contended that he was not liable on two grounds: first, that there were false and fraudulent representations made by the directors, in their reports, as to the condition of this company before he became a director, and that his uncle, who was the person who transferred the shares to him, was himself a director, and must have known that at that time the company, instead of being in the flourishing condition set forth in the reports, was in fact insolvent. In support of this argument they cited—

In re the Royal British Bank, ex parte Brockwell, 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 855.

In re the Deposit and General Life Assurance Company, ex parte Ayre, 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 579.

The second ground was, that although there had been a transfer of the sixty shares to Charles Selby Bigge, that transfer was only nominal and apparent, for the purpose of qualifying him to be a director, and that in fact his uncle, Matthew R. Bigge, had no right to transfer the shares to him, as he was only entitled to them as tenant for life. Consequently it was a breach of trust on the part of his uncle, and the directors of the company must have been aware of the fact, since the shares up to this time had been standing in the name of the executors of his grandfather, and the transfer to him was made for the nominal consideration of 5s. only. The whole transaction was therefore a nullity.

Mr. G. M. Giffard, for the official manager, submitted that, whatever misrepresentations might have been made to C. S. Bigge by his uncle Matthew R. Bigge, the directors had nothing to do with them. The reports and accounts put forth by the directors were not proved to have misled Mr. Bigge in his determination as to taking the shares, and, at any rate, this could not affect the question between Mr. Bigge and the other shareholders. The cases referred to had gone upon an express misrepresentation by the directors, which had induced particular individuals to take shares. Then, as to the transfer of the shares: there could be no fraud on the part of the directors, as it was not their business to inquire into the reasons for any shares being passed from one person to another. The transfer was evidently made at the express desire of C. S. Bigge, for the purpose of qualifying him to become a director, and if there were any fraud in the matter, as between Matthew R. Bigge and C. S. Bigge, the latter was a party to it, and could not now complain of the directors.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I am sorry for the position of this gentleman. He is a young man, but when this transaction took place he was not so recently of age as has been assumed. Being possessed of considerable property, or rather being tenant for life of the property, and wishing to have some occupation, he was desirous of becoming a director of this company. He thought it would give him occupation, and his uncle, Mr. Matthew Robert Bigge, the executor of his grandfather, from whom the property was derived, thought it would be a desirable thing. He says his mother and brother discussed the matter of his being a director, as he was desirous of having something to do. He says he attained the age of twenty-one on the 21st of July 1855, and up to the month of May 1855 he pursued his studies at Christ Church, Oxford, and had no knowledge whatever of business. In July 1855 he went to reside at Linden; the place of which he is tenant for life. About September 1856—that is, not a month or two, but one year and five months after he left college, and one year and two months after he attained twenty-one—it was suggested to him that he should become a director. It was not suggested by the directors of the company or the shareholders of the company: they did not want him as a director; but some of his own family suggested to him, Why should you not become a director of this company? He says, "At this time I was in the habit of seeing frequently Mr. Matthew Bigge, who resided at Oakwood." But he does not say it was his uncle, Mr. Matthew Bigge, who suggested the expediency of his becoming a director. Then he says, "Linden is about two hours' ride by road and railway from Newcastle. It was from Mr. Matthew Bigge that I learned it would be necessary that I should have a certain number of shares transferred into my name before I could be qualified to be appointed a director." Mr. Matthew Bigge, not appearing to be the person who suggested his becoming, or urged him to become, a director, had told him what was perfectly true, that it was necessary for him to hold certain shares; and this he found to be quite accurate according to the terms of the deed of the company. The 45th section of the deed says, "That no person shall be eligible for or be elected as a director of this company who shall not possess in his own right, at the fewest, fifty shares therein at the time of his election, or who shall become a bankrupt." Mr. Matthew Bigge gave him the information, "You must be the owner of fifty shares at least before you can become a director." "Mr. Matthew Bigge," he says, "offered to transfer into my name the requisite number of shares, and I was informed by him that there was every prospect of my being elected by the directors upon the first vacancy which might occur. Nothing that I heard or was informed of at the time led me to believe or suspect that the affairs of the bank were not in the satisfactory state in which they were publicly represented to be, and which the dividends paid upon the shares would lead any one to suppose, or even to entertain any doubt on the subject." I confess, in that state of things I commiserate this gentleman. He is a young man who, wishing to have occupation, desires by the advice of some friend or other to be appointed a director of this company. In order to do it he is told, and truly, "You cannot do it unless you hold fifty shares." He said, "I had no reason to doubt this was a good company, and therefore I was desirous of becoming a director, and my uncle, Mr. Matthew Bigge, who was himself a director, said, 'I would transfer fifty or sixty shares to you.'" There are many persons who have been fixed on the list of contributories of this company for whom I confess I entertain more commiseration than I do for Mr. Bigge, but it is not on the ground of commiseration that I can discharge him from any liability which he has incurred. The grounds, then, on which, after he had these shares transferred to him, and after he had been, upon the faith of his possessing these shares in his own right, according to the language of that deed, appointed a director, he claims to be discharged from liability are these: first of all, he says there were false, and, in that sense, fraudulent, representations made by the directors as to the condition of this company before I became a director. Two reports are referred to particularly as having been made, containing those false representations; and he says, "My uncle, Mr. Matthew Bigge, who was the person who transferred those sixty shares to me, was himself a director of the company." He was therefore one of the body of persons from whom the false representations emanated. That is one ground, and it is founded upon the false and fraudulent representations made by the company; and Brockwell's case, and Ayre's case decided on the same ground as Brockwell's case, have been referred to on this point. The other ground upon which Mr. Bigge considers he ought to be discharged is this—he says that, "although there was this transfer by a deed of these shares to me, and although I was apparently the registered shareholder, and upon the faith of being such shareholder was appointed a director, in point of truth there was no reality in all this, because these shares which my uncle transferred to me were the property of my grandfather, under whose will I was not absolutely entitled to these shares; I was only tenant for life of the property of which these shares formed a part, and my uncle, who transferred them to me, was the executor of my grandfather, and the only executor who had proved his will; it was a breach of trust in him to transfer these shares to me. I, it is true, knew perfectly well what was being done, and I concurred in it, and was desirous of having it done, and it was done in order to forward my wish of being a director; but it was a breach of trust—not indeed a breach of trust against me, but a breach of trust against somebody else interested in the testator's property; my uncle, of course, knew it was a breach of trust; and, moreover, the directors acting for the shareholders must have known it was a breach of trust." Why? "Because," he goes on to say, "they knew that, up to the time of the transfer, the shares stood in the name of the executors; they knew the transfer was made to me not for a full pecuniary consideration, but for the nominal consideration of 5s.; they also knew that after the transfer, instead of the dividends of the shares coming to me, they were placed to the credit of the executors of my grandfather, just as was the case before the transfer; and therefore the whole thing is such a nullity that not only as between me and my uncle, but as between me and the shareholders, I have a right to say that I am not liable to them as a brother shareholder." Now those are the two grounds on which Mr. Bigge relies; and I should observe, those two grounds are perfectly independent. On the first ground, he has a right, of course, to the consideration of the ingredient that his uncle was one of the directors. He is entitled to that; but the two grounds are as distinct as two grounds can be. Now, let me consider the first ground, that is, of representations made to the public by the directors. In the first place, the evidence as to misrepresentation is extremely scanty; it amounts to this:—It is the evidence of Mr. Coleman, who is perfectly competent, because he is one of the official liquidators, a very experienced and competent accountant, and perfectly able to judge of the whole matter. He says he has investigated the whole thing, and he has stated, no doubt, the truth, and all that could be fairly stated on either side, as much for Mr. Bigge as for the shareholders generally. He refers to the two reports which are alleged to contain these misrepresentations, and they are followed by certain accounts; and he adds, that from the investigation and the inquiries he has made, those reports and accounts “do not represent the true state of the affairs of the bank at the respective dates of such reports and accounts, the bank having, to the best of my belief, been at the dates of such reports and accounts in a state of insolvency.” Therefore, there is no doubt those accounts did not represent the true state of things, because the bank was then insolvent, and those accounts did not represent them as being insolvent. On the contrary, they represented that for the periods to which those accounts related there had been profits made, enabling them to pay a dividend of 7½ per cent. upon the profit. There is no doubt that was a misrepresentation; but was it such a misrepresentation as in Brockwell's case (the case of the Royal British Bank), which amounted to actual intentional fraud on the part of the directors putting forward that representation? In the case of Brockwell that was so; but in that case there were ingredients which do not occur here. This case has not any of the ingredients upon which Brockwell's case and Ayre's case were decided. In Brockwell's case we have this: that there were representations put forth by the company,—that is, by the directors acting for the company and the authorized body; and therefore their acts were treated as the acts of the company—for the express purpose of inducing persons to take shares, newly created, from the company itself. Those persons took up shares, newly created under the authority of an act of parliament which the directors had obtained for the purpose, and all the dealings which were brought about by means of these representations were dealings between the company and the persons sought afterwards to be put upon the list. In that case it was proved that the shareholder had entered into the taking of these shares because he had himself read and relied upon and trusted to those representations, which turned out to be false. Now, not one of those ingredients exist in the present case. There is the ingredient of misrepresentation, and I would even assume, for the purpose of the argument, that there was misrepresentation amounting to fraud, although that is not established. But, supposing it to be a fraud, it is a fraud which does not induce any individual to deal with the company as a body guilty of that fraud and making those misrepresentations; and the fact that Mr. Matthew Bigge was one of the directors could never have the effect of making all the directors parties to the transaction between Mr. Matthew Bigge and Mr. C. S. Bigge, so as to vitiate the transaction between those two. Moreover, Mr. C. S. Bigge does not pretend to say that he was led to take these shares by these representations. On the contrary, he says this: “I wanted to be a director of this company; my object was to be a director. When told that I must take shares in order to be a director, then, of course, I desired to have shares; and then, and only then, my uncle offered to transfer the shares to me.” But what does he say as to being misled by misrepresentation? He does not say that he read one syllable of either of these reports, or that anybody told him what the reports contained; but what he says is this: “I am not sure, but I believe I saw them.” He does not say he ever read them, or that he was induced to suppose there was a single word of truth in what he saw; still less does he say that because of those representations he was induced to enter into this transaction. In order to bring this transaction within Brockwell's case, it must be shewn to have been a transaction between Mr. C. S. Bigge and the company, who again must be shewn to have been guilty of this fraudulent misrepresentation. So that except as to this alleged fraudulent misrepresentation—misrepresentation there undoubtedly was, though I do not think it was fraudulent—all the other ingredients in Brockwell's case are wanting in the present. Therefore, it does not appear to me, on that ground, that I can dismiss Mr. Bigge from the liability that he has incurred.

Now with regard to the other ground, which appears, if possible, less favourable than the former. If the transaction was a breach of trust, does it lie in the mouth of Mr. C. S. Bigge to complain of that breach of trust when he was himself a party to it? Further, what is there to lead me to the conclusion that the directors, as a body, even if that were important, knew of any breach of trust? It was argued, that inasmuch as they knew that Mr. Matthew Bigge was an executor, they were put upon their guard, according to some of the authorities, and that therefore they could not properly allow this transaction. But, it must be recollected that the authorities which are referred to, are these: If a man is dealing with an executor, that is, entering into any bargain of purchase or sale, or any other transaction, he is bound to take notice that that man is acting as an executor. How does that apply to the directors of a company who are merely acting for the purpose of seeing that a transfer from A. to B. is regularly effected on the part of their office? What business have they with the question whether the person who proposes to make the transfer is an executor or not? That is an affair between the transferor and the transferee; the directors have nothing to do with the question. Their function is to see that the thing is regularly done, and is done according to the requisitions of the deed, if the deed require any particular forms, or ceremonies, or acts to be performed or done. Well, then, Mr. C. S. Bigge chose to take from the executor a transfer of these shares. He, by taking that transfer, and by being put upon the register, and upon the faith of those acts, was made a director; and if there be any breach of trust he himself was a party to it. One thing, at least, I cannot understand. I cannot understand how Mr. Bigge can say, "I knew that this was all a sham. I knew that I was bound to hold in my own right fifty shares in order to be a director; I was a participator in this sham, which made it apparent that I held these shares, when in reality I had not a single share." I confess I cannot concur in the view that has been taken on the part of Mr. C. S. Bigge, and it appears to me, therefore, that he must be put on the list of contributories for the sixty shares.

Trustee Acts—Jurisdiction—Person of Unsound Mind not found so by Inquisition—Statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82. relating to the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

The Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster has not any jurisdiction to appoint a new trustee in the place of a trustee of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. Such jurisdiction is given by the legislature (by the Trustee Acts) to the Lord Chancellor, or other persons intrusted with the care of lunatics, and not to the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Smale stated that, at the request of his Worship, the Vice Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. W. M. James), he was instructed to mention to and obtain the opinion of the Lords Justices, upon the question how far the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster had jurisdiction to appoint a new trustee, in the place of a trustee who was of unsound mind not found a lunatic by inquisition.

A petition had been presented, in the above-named court, stating that Thomas Barton Ormerod, one of the trustees under a will, was of unsound mind, and incapable of acting in the execution of the trusts of it, and was detained in a private lunatic asylum at Clifton, near Manchester, under a medical certificate of unsoundness of mind, but had not been found of unsound mind by inquisition. The petition prayed that Thomas Barton Jervis might be appointed a new trustee in the place of Thomas Barton Ormerod (the person of unsound mind), in addition to the two remaining trustees; and that the estate, subject to the trusts of the will, might be vested in him jointly with the two remaining trustees accordingly.

Nov. 22.—LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The question in this case is, whether the Duchy Court of Lancaster (1) has, as to lands and personal estate within its jurisdiction, power under the Trustee Acts to appoint a new trustee in the place of a trustee of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. We think that the Duchy Court of Lancaster cannot now safely be held to have any such power. By the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82. s. 11. the Duchy Court has, indeed, as to lands and personal estate within its jurisdiction, all the powers under the Trustee Acts which by these acts are given to the Court of Chancery in England; but we consider that, whatever the decision might have been in the absence of authority, it is now settled by the decided cases that the power to appoint new trustees in the place of trustees of unsound mind not so found by inquisition is, by the Trustee Acts, given, not to the Court of Chancery, but to the Lord Chancellor, or other persons intrusted with the care of lunatics. The point came before both the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor, in a case, In re Hall's Trusts, on the 16th of July 1856. The Master of the Rolls had declined to make the order, and it was made by the Lord Chancellor on the petition being amended and addressed to him. Again, Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in Re the Good Intent Benefit Society (2), after looking into the acts, expressed his opinion that he had no jurisdiction in such cases; and again, in Re Piggott, on the 4th of March 1858, Vice Chancellor Wood having intimated that it would be more safe that the order should be made by the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices, the matter was mentioned to the full Court, and the order made by that Court, with an opinion expressed, that the jurisdiction had always been considered to be in the Lord Chancellor. We understand that since the decision in the last case the practice has been considered to be settled, and the Vice Chancellors have declined to make such orders, referring the parties to the Lords Justices. We think that these authorities, and the course of practice, decide this question; and it is also worthy of remark that, before the passing of the Trustee Acts now in force, it had been held, that under the existing acts, which, however, were different in language, the Vice Chancellor had not even the power, in the case of a lunatic trustee, to make the common order for inquiry—In re Shorrocks (3).

(1) It seems incorrect so to designate the Court. It should be "The Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster." The Duchy Court is one of common-law jurisdiction.

Dec. 10.—Mr. Smale, this day, appeared in support of the petition which had been presented to this Court, and the order was made according to the prayer.

STUART, V.C. } THE COLLINS COMPANY v.
June 28, 29. } REEVES.

Special Injunction — Trade Marks — Alien Company, Right of, to sue.

The bill was filed, by an American trading company, incorporated by the law of the State of Connecticut, in the United States of America, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, a manufacturer, of Birmingham, from continuing the fraudulent use, as alleged, of the trade marks of the plaintiffs, and for an account of the profits made by him from such use. The defendant, by his answer, admitted the user of the trade marks complained of, but by way of rebuttal of the charge of fraud, stated that in so using the said trade marks he had only followed a custom prevalent at Birmingham for manufacturers of goods of the kind sold by the plaintiffs, to affix on the goods ordered by merchants a particular trade mark, relying on the respectability of the merchant, when known to them, for the fact that those merchants had authority to act as agents of, or by way of licence from, the person entitled to the exclusive use of the trade marks; and, further, that he had been informed that the plaintiffs themselves had ordered goods to be manufactured at Birmingham, with their own trade mark upon them, for the purpose of sale in foreign countries. These statements of the defendant were left uncontradicted by the plaintiffs. The Court, upon motion for decree, ordered that an interim injunction, which the defendant had previously submitted to, should be continued for a year, with liberty to the plaintiffs to bring an action within that time to try their right at law; and in case of their not proceeding at law and to trial within that time, then that their bill should thereupon stand dismissed, with costs.

The Collins Company, of Collinsville, in the county of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, in the United States of North America, edge tool-manufacturers, filed the bill in this suit against the defendant Reeves, stating the following case as a ground for the relief prayed by them of the Court. The plaintiffs were, by virtue of a resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut in May 1834, and afterwards modified by another resolution passed by the same Assembly in 1843, duly constituted according to the law of that State a corporate body, by the name of the Collins Company, to be located in the town of Canton, in the county of Hartford, for the purpose of manufacturing edge tools in the most advantageous manner, and with full power to manufacture iron and steel and other metals, and by that name they and their assigns and successors were authorized and empowered to sue and be sued in any court of record or elsewhere. The company had ever since continued, pursuant to the charter thus granted to them, and according to the law of the State of Connecticut, to carry on their business as a body corporate, under the name of the Collins Company, of Collinsville. Their business consisted principally in the manufacture of edge tools to be used by persons employed in felling and fashioning timber, of tools called "Matchets," to be used for cutting sugar-canes, and of pickaxes to be used at the diggings in Australia and California.

As manufacturers of these articles, they had acquired a high reputation in the markets of various parts of the world, and especially in the markets of America, Cuba and Australia. For the purpose of distinguishing their manufactures, the company had been in the habit of causing to be stamped or engraved on the articles manufactured by them the words "Collins & Co., Hartford, cast steel, warranted," and had also been in the habit of causing to be pasted or fixed upon such articles printed labels containing the following words:—

"Look for the stamp, Hartford, if you want the genuine Collins & Co. Sam. W. Collins."

The labels thus used by them were all in the same form, with white letters printed on a black ground, the words "Sam. W. Collins" being in written characters and forming a fac-simile of the signature of Samuel Wilkinson Collins, the manager of the company, and all the other words being in Roman capital letters. These labels and stamps had always been affixed to goods manufactured by the company before they left the manufacturing premises of the company.

The company claimed, under these circumstances, to have acquired the exclusive right to the said mark and to the said labels. The company, having had it intimated to them that a great variety of tools of similar manufacture with their own, but of inferior price and quality, had been imported into America, Cuba, Australia and other places, with marks and labels thereon similar to those upon the tools of the company, discovered for the first time, in 1857, that the defendant had been long fraudulently using and imitating the said trade marks and labels, by stamping and affixing them to goods manufactured and sold by the defendant, which goods in form and appearance closely resembled the tools manufactured by the plaintiffs, but were of an inferior quality and price.

The bill charged that the defendant had in his possession stamps having the words "Collins & Co., Hartford, cast-steel, warranted," or some other words or marks, only colourably differing from the marks used by the Collins Company; and that he had caused to be printed very large quantities of labels, which were fac-similes of, or which only colourably differed from, the labels used by the said company; and that such stamps and labels the defendant used for the purpose of stamping and labelling the inferior goods manufactured and sold by himself, being fraudulent imitations of the goods manufactured by the plaintiffs. The bill, after charging that, by the use as above-mentioned of the plaintiffs' trade marks, the defendant had realized large profits for himself, and caused great loss to the company, prayed that an account might be taken of the profits made by the defendant on tools manufactured by him having the marks or labels of the company; that the defendant might be decreed to pay to the company the full amount of such profits, and to deliver up all tools in his possession having such marks or labels, and also all stamps, blocks, plates and labels; that an injunction might be issued to restrain the defendant from using the marks and labels of the company; and that the defendant might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

The defendant, in his answer, filed in August 1857, stated that it had long been the custom of foreign manufacturers to order, through merchants or agents in this country, goods similar to their own manufacture in all respects, except, perhaps, the quality, which would often be better, to be both manufactured for them at Birmingham and stamped with their own name or mark by manufacturers in this country; and it had for many years been his habit to receive orders from English merchants for the manufacture of wholesale quantities of goods of the particular sorts or patterns furnished to him by them, and to be stamped or marked with a particular name or label, also furnished to him by them; and he had executed many such orders given to him by English merchants, with different foreign names stamped upon or labelled to the goods, according to the order given; and he had executed similar orders with different English names stamped upon or labelled to the goods, according to the orders given to him by English merchants; for he believed it was not an uncommon practice, even for English manufacturers through English merchants, or other agents, to give orders for some of their own goods to be both manufactured and stamped with their own names or marks by other manufacturers, when, through press of business or other circumstances, they were unable to manufacture their own goods themselves, or a sufficient quantity of them to meet the demand. In every such case of receiving and executing an order for the manufacture of goods with a particular name or mark stamped upon or affixed to them, apparently not that of the English merchant giving the order, he had always looked to the respectability of the merchant giving the order as a sufficient guarantee that he was acting as the agent of the party whose name or mark or label he directed to be so used, or that he had full authority to give the particular order; and had generally, if not always, upon the first occasion of taking such an order, required the merchant, if he had not before transacted business with him, to give him, in writing, his name and address, and his direction to execute the particular order. The defendant admitted that it was not his custom in such cases to insist upon the merchant shewing him some particular and specific evidence of the authority under which he assumed to act, since to have done so would, he conceived and submitted, be deemed to convey an uncalled-for impertinent suspicion of the respectability and bona fides of the merchant giving the order, and to be altogether contrary to the usages of commerce; and more particularly so in cases where he had been previously well acquainted with the merchants giving the orders and knew of their respectability. However, although he did not at the time of receiving and executing such orders, for the reason aforesaid, insist upon the production of such evidence, he had in numerous cases, after such orders so given by English merchants had been executed by him, received proof or assurance, either direct or by implication, from the parties themselves, whose names were placed upon the goods, that the orders were given for them, or with their sanction. The defendant further stated, that until the case of the plaintiffs, he had never known or experienced, in the whole course of his trade, an instance of orders being given by English merchants without their having the sanction and authority of the parties whose names they assumed to use; that he did not know of the existence of the Collins Company before 1849, when the first pattern of a matchet was sent to him by some merchants of Birmingham, with whom he had previously transacted business to a large extent, and of whose respectability he was well assured, which had on it the name or mark or label of the Collins Company, and he was ordered by those merchants to manufacture a quantity of matchets for them according to such pattern, and with the same name or mark and label upon it, according to such pattern; and he had since that period manufactured for them and other merchants of respectability quantities of matchets of the same pattern, and with the same name or mark upon them, in pursuance of orders received from them in the ordinary course of his trade, and according to his ordinary practice of receiving and executing orders from merchants as aforesaid, and in the belief and upon the assumption, justified by the circumstances before stated, that the merchant giving such orders had authority to give the same. He had no actual knowledge that the said Collins Company were really manufacturers, or were an existing company, until the recent institution of proceedings against him and others in this court. For anything he before knew to the contrary, the words "Collins & Co., Hartford, cast-steel, warranted," or "Hartford cast-steel warranted," might have been used to denote a particular make or pattern of article, or a particular quality of article, and not to denote that the article was manufactured by a particular company. In every instance in which he had manufactured matchets with the name and label of the said Collins Company upon them (and he had never manufactured any articles, except matchets with their name or label upon them), he had received orders from English merchants for such manufacture, and in no single instance had ever manufactured them without such orders or order. And such orders he considered or believed at the time to be perfectly authorized, and to be either for the use, or to be given with the sanction, of some firm of that name, the same as in the numerous other cases in which, as before stated, he had been in the habit of receiving orders from English merchants for the manufacture of goods with foreign names placed upon them, and in which he had always believed, as indeed the fact was, that the foreign names directed to be placed on the goods to be manufactured by him were the names of foreign firms, who chose to have their names placed on the goods they sold, and who gave orders to English merchants accordingly; who, in their turn, gave the orders to the manufacturer. The defendant denied that he ever did in any single instance mark an article with the name of the Collins Company, unless by the positive order of the merchant who ordered the goods in the usual course of trade; and stated that he always required such order to be in writing, when it was the first order of the kind from a merchant with whom he had not before transacted business.

The defendant further stated, that the name and labels of the said company and punches for stamping the name upon the goods had been supplied to him in every instance in which he had manufactured goods bearing the name and labels, by the parties who ordered the goods of him; and that he had never supplied a single article bearing any name, unless he had previously been furnished therewith by the person who ordered the goods of him, and who had in every case sent him a pattern of the particular article to be manufactured, and of the labels to be affixed thereto. He had nothing whatever to do with the sending of such goods abroad; and he said that he had been informed that the Collins Company had themselves been in the habit of ordering matchets and edge tools to be made by English manufacturers, with the name of the said company upon them for the purpose of sale in foreign countries; and that it was frequently the practice of foreigners to employ several separate firms or persons, merchants in this country, as their agents, to order their goods to be manufactured by one or more manufacturers in this country.

After the bill was filed the defendant had, by his solicitor, offered to abstain from further use of the marks and labels of the plaintiffs, and expressed his willingness to settle the suit upon being reasonably satisfied that the plaintiffs were entitled to the rights claimed by their bill.

The plaintiffs, however, through their solicitor, declined to settle the suit until they should have had the fullest discovery, &c. relating to the goods manufactured and sold by the defendant in the manner they complained of, and an account of the profits made by the sale of such goods.

In July 1857 the plaintiffs applied to the Court for an injunction to restrain the further use by the defendant of the marks and labels, and an order for an interim injunction was thereupon made, no opposition being offered by the defendant.

The cause now came on for hearing, upon motion for decree for a perpetual injunction, and for an account in the terms of the prayer of the bill.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Eddis, in support of the motion, contended that, inasmuch as the trade marks of the plaintiffs were here admitted by the defendant to have been used by him, the Court would presume fraud, and at once make the injunction perpetual and decree an account, without putting the plaintiffs to establish their title at law—Southern v. How (1), The Collins Company v. Brown (2), Sykes v. Sykes (3), and Rodgers v. Nowill (4). Besides, there was a title to trade marks independently of fraud; and, the injunction having been already granted, it was now too late to direct an action.

Mr. Malins and Mr. J. T. Humphry, for the defendant, were not called upon.

STUART, V.C. said, that the plaintiffs, if they had an exclusive right to the use of the trade marks in question, were entitled to the protection of this Court in the enjoyment of such use. Though they were aliens, they were entitled to sue in this court against any fraudulent invasion of their right, and that notwithstanding the tools stamped with the marks, the fraudulent use of which was complained of, were not usually sold by them in this country. Wood, V.C. had so decided in The Collins Company v. Brown. In the case before the Court, the user complained of by the plaintiffs was admitted by the defendant, who in explanation thereof had alleged circumstances entirely novel, and which, so far as appeared, had never appeared in any known case in which an injunction had been granted. One of the circumstances thus alleged was, that it was the custom at Birmingham for manufacturers of goods of this kind to affix on the goods ordered by merchants a particular trade mark, the manufacturers relying on the respectability of the merchants, if known to them, for the fact that these merchants had either authority to act as agents of, or else by way of licence from, the person entitled to the exclusive use of the trade mark. The truth of that allegation must be assumed, for no evidence had been adduced to contradict it. The defendant said, that in accordance with that custom, he had acted in this case, but that as soon as he had notice of the bill in this suit, he discontinued the use of the trade mark complained of by the plaintiffs, and had, moreover, upon the former motion, agreed to be bound by an injunction of this Court. The plaintiffs, however, insisted upon their right to an account of profits, without any trial at law upon the question, how far their alleged legal right might be affected by the facts stated in the defendant's answer. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, on being asked for an authority in which such a course had been pursued, had been unable to refer to one. That such a course would be improper, was apparent from an observation of Lord Cottenham, in Motley v. Downman (5), in the following terms:—

“The Court, when it interferes in cases of this sort, is exercising a jurisdiction over legal rights; and although, sometimes, in a very strong case it interferes in the first instance by injunction, yet in a general way it puts the party upon asserting his right, by trying it in an action at law. If it does not do that, it permits the plaintiff, notwithstanding the suit in equity, to bring an action. In both cases, the Court is only acting in aid of, and is only ancillary to, the legal right. I can hardly conceive a case in which the Court will at once interfere by injunction, and prevent a defendant from disputing the plaintiff's legal title." In conformity with the law, as thus stated, he (the Vice Chancellor) felt bound to act. The propriety of that course was, he thought, confirmed in this particular case by the facts, that the plaintiffs had not attempted to deny the existence of the general custom, averred by the answer, and that they, claiming title as they did as a corporate body, to manufacture goods of a particular description in the United States, had not scrupled themselves to send out to the world goods manufactured in England, stamped with their own American trade mark—for that this was the fact must be presumed against them, it being averred in the answer, and nowhere contradicted. The present case differed from Sykes v. Sykes, which had been relied on, in this, that here there were circumstances rebutting the presumption of fraud arising from the use by one person of the trade marks of another, whereas in that case no such circumstances were proved. In the view that, inasmuch as the injunction had been already granted, it was now too late to direct a trial at law, he did not concur. His Honour then made an order to the following effect:—The defendant submitting to the injunction, let it be continued until further order; and order that the bill be retained for a year, with liberty to the plaintiffs to bring an action within that time to try their right at law, and with liberty to apply. In case the plaintiffs shall not proceed at law, or not proceed to trial within that time, then their bill is to stand dismissed, with costs; but in case the plaintiffs shall proceed at law and to trial within that time, then the consideration of the costs of this suit and all further directions are to be reserved until after such trial (6).

(6) Notice of appeal was afterwards served upon the defendant, but before it came on to be heard before the Lords Justices, a compromise was agreed to between the parties.

Annuity—Perpetual Rent-Charge—Construction of Will.

*A testator gave an annuity, or clear yearly rent-charge, of 300*l.* to his niece A. Chanc. 769, declaring that an annuity of 300*l.* given by the will of William Hinton was a perpetual annuity. The bequests, upon which the question arose, were in the following terms:—

"I give and bequeath to my niece Ann Baker, now living with me, an annuity or clear yearly rent-charge or sum of 300*l.* of lawful money, current in Great Britain, to be paid to her by four equal quarterly payments in the year (that is to say), the 25th of March, the 24th of June, the 29th of September, and the 25th of December, in each and every year, by even and equal portions, for and during the term of her natural life; and I do hereby will and direct that the said annuity, yearly rent-charge, or sum of 300*l.* shall be paid by the proportions aforesaid into the proper hands of the said Ann Baker, for her own sole and separate use and benefit during her life; and from and after the decease of her my said niece, Ann Baker, I give and bequeath the said annuity, yearly rent-charge or sum of 300*l.* unto all and every the children (if any) of my said niece, lawfully to be begotten, if more than one share and share alike, and if but one, then to such only child, to be paid and applied for and towards the support, maintenance and education of such child or children, by equal quarterly payments, on the days and times and in manner aforesaid, until such only child, or the youngest of such children, shall attain the age of twenty-one; and when and as soon as such only child, or youngest of such children, shall have fully attained the age of twenty-one years, I direct that the said annuity of 300*l.* shall be absolutely sold and disposed of by such child or children of her my said niece, Ann Baker, and that the money to arise and be produced by and from such sale shall go to and be equally divided among such children, if more than one, share and share alike; and if but one, to such only child."

The testator afterwards gave an annuity of 20*l.* to his kinsman, Thomas Eyre Hinton, for the term of his natural life; and then he proceeded thus:—

"I do hereby charge, and make chargeable, all and singular my freehold estates situate in the Isle of Wight, and the counties of Southampton and Wilts, or elsewhere in England, with the payment of the said several annuities or yearly rent-charges of 300*l.* and 20*l.* accordingly, and subject to and charged and chargeable with the payment of the said several annuities as aforesaid, I give and devise unto my good friend, James Harvey, of Whitecroft, in the Isle of Wight aforesaid, yeoman, all and singular my freehold estates called Marvell and Blackwater, and all my tithes and hereditaments situate in the Isle of Wight aforesaid, and also all and singular my freehold estates situate in the said counties of Southampton and Wilts, and all other my freehold messuages, lands, tenements, tithes, hereditaments and real estates whatsoever and wheresoever, and to which I may be entitled either in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy with their and every of their rights, members and appurtenances, to hold the same, and every part and parcel thereof, with their and every of their rights members, and appurtenances (subject as aforesaid), unto and to the use of the said James Harvey, his heirs and assigns for ever." And the testator appointed James Harvey his sole executor.

Mr. Selwyn appeared for the defendants in the same interest.

Sir R. Bethell, Mr. Giffard, and Mr. Karlake, for the appellant, the owner of the estate sought to be charged.—The testator had charged upon the estate that only which he had previously given, referring to it as "the said annuity," and consequently, the previous part of the will must be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining what the gift is. The Master of the Rolls, however, had invented the will, and sought for the description of the gift where the estate was charged. The word "annuity" meant sometimes the sum and at other times the right or interest in the money. This distinction had been disregarded by the Master of the Rolls. In Co. Lit. 144, b, it is said, "An annuity is a yearly payment of a certain sum of money granted to another in fee, for life or years, charging the person of the grantor only." "But if a rent-charge be granted to a man and his heirs, he shall not have a writ of annuity against the heir of the grantor, albeit he hath assets, unless the grant be for him and his heirs." Again, in Co. Lit. 2, a, "So it is if an annuity is granted to a man and his heirs, it is a fee simple, personal; et sic de similibus." In Savery v. Dyer (1), Lord Hardwicke said,

(1) 1 Ambl. 140.

perty, or of the property to produce an annuity, but the creation of an annuity de novo with a charge of it upon real property. Now, the principles which may be considered to be applicable to a case of this description carry us a very little way towards a decision of the present question, because although it was said by Lord Hardwicke, in Savery v. Dyer, that where an annuity not existing before is created by will de novo and given to A, he shall have it only for life; and it was held, by Lord Cottenham, in the case of Blewitt v. Roberts, that where an annuity was given to one for life, and after her death to be equally divided among six persons, or the survivors or survivor of them, they had the annuity only for life; and it was taken for granted by the Master of the Rolls, in Potter v. Baker, that if an annuity is given to one for life, and after his death to another simply, the latter would not take an absolute interest, yet it appears from several authorities that the intention to give what is called a perpetual annuity may be collected from the will without any express declaration to this effect. This leaves the question open in many cases to infer the intention of the testator from the language used, on which differences of construction will almost inevitably arise, leading to perplexing uncertainty; and it not unfrequently happens that different minds are led to opposite conclusions, and sometimes to the same end, though by different ways and upon entirely different grounds. The Master of the Rolls seems to have been influenced in his judgment that the annuity is perpetual, principally by the circumstance of the testator having given his estate subject to and charged with the payment of the annuity to James Harvey in fee. That, his Honour says, is the gift which is the limitation of an annuity or rent-charge. I am unable, however, from the mere charge of an annuity on property devised in fee simple, to collect an intention that the duration of the annuity should correspond with the limits of the estate charged. The annuity is created de novo, and its extent must be determined by the words creating it, not by the estate on which it is charged, which is equally susceptible of a charge of an annuity for years, for life or in fee, and in this very case is subjected to the charge of an annuity which is given expressly for life. It is unnecessary for me to revert to the different parts of his Honour's judgment brought to my notice in the course of the argument, because, agreeing with him as I do, that this is a perpetual annuity, though on somewhat different grounds, it is sufficient to explain the reasons which have led my mind to the conclusion at which it has arrived. It does not appear to me that much aid can be derived for the argument in favour of the perpetuity of the charge from Whiskon and Cleyton's case and Jennor and Hardie's case in Leonard, because though it was held in those cases that the words, "I will that my land shall be at the disposition of A. B.," gave him a fee simple, and here the annuity is directed to be absolutely sold and disposed of by the child or children of Ann Baker; yet to give the same effect to those words as applicable to the annuity, as it was decided they had with respect to land, is to assume the whole question, that the annuity was in fee. Where the lands are to be at the disposition of any person, the subject-matter having perpetual continuance, and there being no qualification or limitation, the whole must necessarily be comprehended, but to direct that an annuity shall be sold and disposed of might be equally well applied to an annuity for life as to an annuity in fee. The question in this case is, not whether such a clause carries the entire interest, but what is the entire interest? or, in other words, what is the duration of the annuity which is thus to be disposed of? This being the question, it must be determined entirely by the intention of the testator, to be collected from the language of the will. He begins, in the first place, by creating an annuity of 300*l.*, which he gives to Ann Baker for her life. Now, does that annuity, so created, terminate with the life of Ann Baker? or, to use the words of Lord Cottenham in Stokes v. Heron, does the testator deal with it as being in existence and operative beyond her life? He proceeds to give and bequeath, "from and after the decease of my niece Ann Baker, the said annuity or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*" Stress was properly laid in the argument upon the words "the said annuity," because, assuming that Lord Truro is right in saying that the words "same annuity" may mean no more than the same annual sum, or an annual sum of the same amount,—although Hedges v. Harpur (5), to which he refers for the suggestion, does not countenance it,—yet on a question whether a similar sum given by way of annuity is newly created, or is the same annuity previously given to another person for life, the use of the word of reference, "said," cannot be disregarded as wholly immaterial to the determination. I am satisfied that in giving "the said annuity" or rent-charge of 300*l.* to the children of Ann Baker, the testator was dealing with the annuity which he had previously limited for life, and continuing it by a further limitation. In pursuance of this intention, he gives it "to all and every the children, if any, of my said niece, lawfully to be begotten, if more than one, share and share alike, and if but one then to such only child." If the will had stopped there, I think there would have been no doubt that the children would have taken only a life interest, as the bequest would have been very nearly similar to the first gift in Blewitt v. Roberts; but there being no words of survivorship each child would have had his share only of the 300*l.* annuity,—only for his own life. If the limitation had been, as in Blewitt v. Roberts, to be equally divided between the children or the survivors or survivor, then I apprehend that the annuity in its entirety would subsist until the death of the survivor, and when any of the lives dropped it would become divisible among a smaller number of persons. But, in this case, if the annuity of 300*l.* continued only during the joint lives of the children, there being no survivorship, each child would have his share of the annuity for his own life, and upon his death that share, or, in other words, his separate annuity, would have come to an end. It is this circumstance, coupled with the words of the will, which has led me to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the testator that the annuity should be merely for life. The testator, having given an annuity to the children of Ann Baker, in the words I have read, directs it to be paid and applied for and towards the support, maintenance and education of such child or children, by equal quarterly payments, on the days and times and in manner aforesaid, until such only child, or the youngest of such children, shall attain the age of twenty-one years; and when and as soon as such only child or the youngest of such children shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, "then I direct the said annuity or yearly sum of 300*l.* shall be absolutely sold and disposed of." Now suppose, what is by no means an improbable supposition, nor unlikely to have been in the contemplation of the testator, that one of the children, or more than one, had died before the youngest child had attained twenty-one, as his share of the annuity would have fallen, there would have been no annuity of 300*l.* in existence at the time when the sale is directed to take place, but an annuity, if it is to be taken in the aggregate, diminished by the portion of it which had ceased by the death of the child or children; yet the sale is to be not of any reduced annuity, but of the said annuity of 300*l.*, referring to it as something which had been already the subject of disposition, and which was to be sold in its integrity when the prescribed period arrived. It would certainly appear a strange thing, though not altogether unaccountable, that the testator should first have given an annuity merely for life, and then have directed that life annuity to be sold; but it seems still more extraordinary that, even supposing all the children had lived until the period of sale, so as to leave the aggregate annuity of 300*l.* divisible amongst them all, the sale must have been not of an annuity of 300*l.* as the testator directed, but of so many annuities as there were lives, the annuities being of different values, according to the probable duration of those lives, depending not only on the respective ages, but also on the strength or weakness of their constitution. The language of the will as to the charge of the annuity on the estate appears to me also in favour of the view I have taken, and to assist the construction which I have adopted. The testator expressly charges his freehold estates with the payment of the said several annuities or yearly rent-charges of 300*l.* and 20*l.* The charge is not only of one entire annuity, but of an annuity of a certain and unvarying amount; but if the annuity is merely for the lives of the children, then it would not be a charge of one annuity only, but of several annuities, not of one fixed and certain amount, but of an amount diminishing gradually as each life dropped, until at last the remaining portion of the charge would terminate by the death of the survivor. Anything more contrary to the apparent intention of the testator can hardly be imagined. He creates an annuity of 300*l.* He disposes of that annuity for life. He gives the said annuity of 300*l.* to the children of the person who has enjoyed it for life; he directs equal shares of the said annuity to be applied to the support, maintenance and education of the children; and when the youngest child attains twenty-one he directs the said annuity to be absolutely sold and disposed of, and charges all his freehold estates with the said annuity of 300*l.* Every part of the will appears to me to militate strongly against the construction that life interests merely in the annuity were given to the children. The difficulties in the way of such a construction have been pointed out, and all the inconveniences and absurdities which would follow from adopting it. But if such an intention had been expressed, or were reasonably to be collected from the words of the will, it would not be for the Court to speculate upon the motives of the testator, or to substitute for his express disposition of his property something which I might consider more reasonable; but I found myself entirely on the language of the will, which in its plain and ordinary meaning presents a natural construction apparently consistent with the intention of the testator, and enabling it to be carried into effect without inconvenience, complication or difficulty. I am of the same opinion with the Master of the Rolls, that the annuity of 300*l.* given by the will of William Hinton was a perpetual annuity; and I affirm the decree and dismiss the appeal, with costs.

M.R. { JONES v. THE CONSOLIDATED
Nov. 11. { INVESTMENT AND ASSUR-ANCE COMPANY.

Insurance on Lives—Assignment of Policy—Current Account—Suicide.

A policy of assurance on the life of E. W. was subject to a condition avoiding it on suicide, but provided that in case the policy should have been assigned to other parties for a valuable consideration six calendar months before the death of the assured, it should remain in force to the extent of the beneficial interest therein of the party to whom it should have been assigned. E. W. deposited the policy with the plaintiff. The policy was accompanied by a letter, stating that it was to be held "as security, in case of death or otherwise, for any notes of hand or bills of exchange you may have cashed for me." From that time a current account existed between the parties; the plaintiff cashed or discounted for E. W. divers bills of exchange, and frequently took renewals of them as they came due. E. W. afterwards shot himself. At that time a sum of money was due to the plaintiff by E. W. on several outstanding bills of exchange, &c. exceeding the amount payable on the policy; but none of them bore date much more than two months before the death of E. W. Upon a bill to obtain payment of the sums insured,—Held, that the policy was duly assigned; that the security continued from the date of the deposit, notwithstanding the consideration for it was fluctuating; that the payment or withdrawal of the earlier bills did not necessitate a fresh deposit; and that it was, and was intended to be, a security for what was due on the current account at the death of E. W. or otherwise.

The Consolidated Investment and Assurance Company was incorporated in pursuance of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. By a policy, dated the 9th of March 1850, the company assured the life of Edward Woolcott, a builder, in the sum of 600*l.* One of the conditions indorsed on the policy was as follows:—

"The policy of a person assuring his own life will become void if he dies by his own hand, or by the hand of justice, or in consequence of a duel; but in case of death, not felo de se, the board of directors may pay to the executors of the assured a sum not exceeding the value of the policy on the day previous to the death; but should such policies have been assigned to other parties for a valuable consideration six calendar months before the death of the assured, they remain in force to the extent of the beneficial interest therein of the parties to whom they shall have been so assigned."

In June 1854 there was a current account between E. Woolcott and the plaintiff for monies advanced on divers bills of exchange and promissory notes, which were either indorsed to, or drawn by and accepted in favour of the plaintiff. These were frequently renewed at maturity; and E. Woolcott delivered the policy of assurance on his life to the plaintiff, and subsequently wrote the following letter:—

"To Mr. Joseph Jones, 7, Henry Street, Foundling.

"7, Hereford Street, June 29, 1854.

"Sir, I hereby authorize and empower you to hold the policy of insurance you hold upon my life for 600*l.* as security, in case of death or otherwise, for any notes of hand or bills of exchange you may have cashed for me. The policy of insurance alluded to is effected with the Consolidated Assurance Office, 45, Cheapside.

"I am, &c. Edward Woolcott."

These dealings were continued up to the death of E. Woolcott. The plaintiff paid several of the premiums for keeping the policy on foot, and took successive renewals of several of the bills and notes.

On the 10th of November 1857 E. Woolcott shot himself, and died wholly insolvent; and upon an inquisition held the jury found that at the time of shooting himself he was of unsound mind.

A sum far exceeding the amount payable on the policy was then due to the plaintiff. He accordingly gave notice to the company of the death of E. Woolcott, and claimed payment of the sum assured, at the same time offering to produce the policy, the cheques for the premiums paid, the letter of the 29th of June 1854, and, if required, to administer to his estate. He also offered to vouch the account between himself and the deceased, which was as follows:—

None of these bills bore date earlier than the 23rd of August 1857.

Note.—The debts marked with an asterisk were paid before the bill was filed.

On the 15th of January 1858 the solicitors of the company wrote, saying that they would submit the case to the board; and stated that the probable objections would be—First, that there was no assignment of the policy; secondly, that the letter only covered the personal accommodation of E. Woolcott, and had nothing to do with Sandars & Woolcott's unpaid cheques or dishonoured acceptances.

On the 2nd of March 1858 they again wrote:—

"Looking at the terms of the letter of the 29th of June 1854—First, it is open to doubt if it intended to relate to any bills beyond such as had been then cashed for Mr. Woolcott: 'you may have cashed for me' are the words; secondly, in the next place, as we have already stated, it is not an assignment under the condition indorsed on the policy; thirdly, nor, if treated as an assignment, does it appear to come within the condition, as it is not 'for valuable consideration'; fourthly, nor can it be contended, as we think, that advances to Sandars & Woolcott are advances to E. Woolcott."

They then proposed to allow the policy to stand as security for such sums as Mr.

Jones might have advanced to Mr. Woolcott, and said:—

“This (if the 100*l.* due on the 19th of October 1857 is paid) will be only the 30*l.* bill, dated the 11th of September 1857. If it can be proved that the premiums mentioned by you were paid by Mr. Jones, and not charged to Mr. Woolcott in subsequent accounts, the company will allow them, or such part of them as were actually paid by Mr. Jones, and not repaid in subsequent accounts, to be added to the claim.”

On the 23rd of March the plaintiff declined the proposal. He subsequently filed this bill, charging that the aid of the Court was necessary to obtain payment of the policy; that the letter and deposit extended to bills and notes, including cheques thereafter to be cashed as well as those already cashed by the plaintiff; and that in either case the sums due, besides the interest and sums paid for premiums, exceeded the amount of the policy; that it was assigned for a valuable consideration; and that the bills were cashed, at the request of E. Woolcott, for monies advanced to or due by him separately from Mr. Sandars, his partner. The bill then prayed for a declaration that the policy was assigned, within the meaning of the condition, for a valuable consideration, more than six months before the death of E. Woolcott; and that the plaintiff had a beneficial interest therein, exceeding the amount of the policy. It also prayed for payment of the policy in full, together with interest on the amount, from the day when it ought to have been paid. It then prayed that the necessary accounts for ascertaining the plaintiff's interest might be taken, and that the stocks, funds and securities of the company might be ascertained and declared liable to pay the amount of the policy.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Bagshawe, jun., for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has a beneficial interest in the policy as assignee for value. This was made more than six months before the death of the assured—

Dufaur v. the Professional Life Assurance Company, 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 817.

Cook v. Black, 1 Hare, 390; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 268.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Schomberg, for the company.—An assignment in equity means such an act as would pass the property. It was true that no notice had been given to the office; but that was immaterial, except that, if any doubt was raised on the transaction, it might lead to further inquiry. An equitable assignment embraced nothing beyond what was presently due upon a valuable consideration. If 600*l.* due at the date of the letter was subsequently paid off, then after six months, if nothing was due, it could not amount to an assignment. Whenever, therefore, nothing was due on the bills existing at the time, the letter had spent its force. The plaintiff failed altogether in shewing any consideration to support the letter as an effective assignment at its date.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Suppose an assignment was made to cover a balance of account, with a condition avoiding it if nothing was due for six months. If nothing was due for five months before death, but something was due one month before death, the condition would not be satisfied.]

Mr. R. Palmer.—You could not import an ex post facto consideration after the six months had expired, or connect it in any way with the previous valuable consideration which had been satisfied. All the produced bills were dated after the 23rd of August 1857. The renewal of bills had not been traced back. The terms of the letter, however, related to bills “you may have cashed for me”; a prospective period was not referred to, and death was referred to, but not as defining any period of time. All these cheques bear the names of “Sandars & Woolcott.” The letter was not given as a security for the firm; the defendants, therefore, were entitled to an account.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — The assignment of the benefit of the policy was made six months before the death of the assured; and I think it was within the condition indorsed upon the policy. The letter of the 29th of June 1854 was clearly an equitable assignment; and I must dissent from the argument that the assignment recurs every time a fresh consideration passes. If an assignment is once made to secure a balance, then as soon as anything becomes due there is a valuable consideration to support it, and the assignment continues, though the beneficial interest in it may fluctuate. Rolt v. Hopkinson (1) was a question of priority which depended upon notice; but that was not so in the present case. The assignment made by the letter of the 29th of June 1854 was good within the terms of the condition. For what, then, was it a security? Was it for money actually due, and not for subsequent advances? There is some obscurity; but that is not the meaning or the intention. The parties themselves, by their dealings, have put a construction on the transaction; it was, that you shall hold it as a security that you may receive the money you have advanced, in the event of death or otherwise. This obviously meant the bills, notes and cheques which the plaintiff might at that time have cashed. What was the course that the parties adopted? The policy was not taken back when any money was paid; on the contrary, it was allowed to remain until death, and up to that time the same dealings were continued. There were at that time bills outstanding, which had been cashed by the plaintiff, who had discounted them. The assignment, therefore, being good, it covered all the bills, &c. which had either been cashed or discounted at the death of the assured; and so far the plaintiff was entitled to recover what was due. I shall therefore direct an account to be taken of all sums paid or advanced by the plaintiff to or for the use of E. Woolcott, upon or in respect of any bills of exchange or notes of hand, and of what is due in respect thereof: there must also be an account of what is due for premiums paid by the plaintiff. This decree, however, must be without prejudice to any right the defendants may be entitled to against the estate of Richard Sandars in respect of such bills of exchange and promissory notes. The defendants will be at liberty to use the name of the plaintiff; but they must indemnify him from all liability which may arise from any proceedings they may take.

M.R. }
Dec. 15. } CANHAM v. NEALE.

Practice — Staying Proceedings — Creditors' Suit — Administration — Costs.

If two creditors' suits are instituted for the administration of the estate of a deceased debtor, and one is stayed by order of Court, provision will not be imperatively made for payment of the costs of the suit stayed in the suit to be prosecuted, but they will be left to depend upon the result of the assets after debts are satisfied.

If two suits are instituted for one purpose, and one is stayed, no order will be made which will give the plaintiff in the suit stayed a priority for his costs, especially if the application is made in the one suit only.

This was a motion, on behalf of the plaintiff, Noah Clarke Canham, brickmaker, for leave to vary an order staying the proceedings in this suit, by making it imperative upon the parties in a suit of Cobbold v. Neale, to pay him the costs he had incurred in this suit.

Thomas Neale, a builder, was indebted at the time of his death to various persons. He was seised and possessed of both real and personal estate. Letters of administration were granted to Thomas Neale, his eldest son and heir-at-law.

Two creditors' suits were afterwards instituted for the administration of his estate: the one Canham v. Neale, and the other Cobbold v. Neale.

On the 5th of June 1858 an order was made in the suit of Cobbold v. Neale, for the administration of the estate, and notice of the decree was given to the plaintiff N. C. Canham.

An application was afterwards made to the Court to determine which of the two suits it would be most beneficial for the parties to prosecute, and by an order made in both causes, on the 7th of July 1858, it was ordered that the proceedings in this cause should be stayed, and that the costs of the plaintiff N. C. Canham, up to the time he had notice of the order, dated the 5th of June 1858, in the cause of Cobbold v. Neale, including the costs of this application, be taxed, and paid by the defendant Thomas Neale, if he had assets in his hands sufficient for that purpose: but if he had not, and upon an affidavit being made by Thomas Neale that he had no assets, the plaintiff N. C. Canham was to be at liberty to add his costs to his debt, and go in and prove his claim and the amount of his taxed costs, under the said order of the 5th of June 1858, and the costs of Thomas Neale, and what he should pay to the plaintiff N. C. Canham for his costs were to be added to his costs in the cause of Cobbold v. Neale, and be allowed him in his accounts in that cause.

It was now asked to vary the order by substituting in lieu of that part printed in italics the following words:—

“Let the plaintiff Noah Clarke Canham, upon establishing his debt in the cause of Cobbold v. Neale, be paid his costs of the cause of Canham v. Neale up to the present time, including the costs of this application, to be taxed as aforesaid pari passu with the costs of the plaintiff in the cause of Cobbold v. Neale.”

Mr. Grenside, in support of the motion.—The order made the plaintiff's costs contingent upon there being assets in hand. On the contrary, it ought to have provided imperatively for the payment of the costs incurred in this suit. The plaintiff ought not to be driven to take a composition upon the costs incurred. It was the practice at law, when staying one of two actions, to provide for the full costs incurred in the action which was prosecuted:—

Mr. Marten, for the defendant.—The parties to the suit of Cobbold v. Neale were not before the Court; the order, therefore, could not be entitled in both causes. The application could not be supported.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The order of the 7th day of July last was right. It was made in the presence of both parties. The plaintiff was not precluded from obtaining payment of his costs, if there were any assets remaining in that suit. The question was, therefore, left open that the plaintiff might have an opportunity of making his claim in that suit. It would, however, create great difficulty if an order was to be made in such cases directing a personal representative of a testator to pay the costs. The motion, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

WARREN v. RUDALL.

HALL v. WARREN.

Void Devise — Conditional Limitation over.

A testator directed that freehold premises should be given to the inhabitants of B. to found an asylum, and that his executors should call a meeting of the inhabitants to appoint a committee and trustees to carry out the same, but in the event of the said inhabitants not appointing a committee or not willing to carry out the scheme, he willed that all his said property so given to the said asylum should belong to W. H. W. The gift to the charity being void,—Held, that the devise to W. H. W. took effect.

William Hall, by his will, dated the 17th of January 1853, gave all his real and personal estate to William Unsworth and John Atkinson, whom he appointed his executors, and after directing his just debts to be paid, proceeded as follows:—“I will that my freehold house, No. 71, Queen's Road, Bayswater, be given to the inhabitants of Bayswater to found a lying-in assilem for unmarried women, or poor married women, if there is more than three beds to spare. I will that there shall be no paid parson, priest or chaplain, whose services is not given gratis, attend the said assilem. I will that the same be cald Hall's Maternal Assilem for Unmarried whoman. I will that my said executors doo call a meeting of the nabours and en-habitants of one mile round the said house as soon as convenient, to appoint a com-mity and trustees to carry out the same. I doo appoint my godson William Hall Warren one of the trustees, leaving the enhabitants to make choice of as maney more as they may please; but in the event of the said enhabitants not appointing a commity, or not willing to carry out the said schem, I then will that all my said property so given to said Maternal Retreat or Lying-in Assilem shall absolutely belong to my said godson William Hall Warren, and I will that the deeds of said house be given to said trustee or trustees. I will that the said trustee or trustees be my residuary legatees to this my will." The testator, then, after certain pecuniary legacies, proceeded to give several leasehold and freehold houses to various persons for life, with remainder to his residuary legatees "for the Maternal Retreat namd," and gave his freehold house, No. 4, Douglas Place, Bayswater, to W. H. Warren for his natural life, and after his demise to the trustees of the Retreat; and continued, "But should there bee no such trustees, then I give the same absolutely to the said William Hall Warren."

The testator died on the 23rd of October 1856, and the bill was filed by W. H. Warren and others, for the administration of his estate. A claim was also filed by the heir-at-law and next-of-kin, for the purpose of having it declared that the devises and bequests for founding a lying-in asylum were void, and that the testator had died intestate as to the real and personal estate included in those devises and bequests.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. De Gex, for the plaintiff, W. H. Warren, insisted that he was absolutely entitled for his own use and benefit to the houses Nos. 71, Queen's Road and 4, Douglas Place, the gift over taking effect upon the failure of the gift to the charity.

Mr. Osborne, for the heir-at-law and one of the next-of-kin, contended that the gift to the charity being clearly void, the gifts over could not take effect. All, therefore, that W. H. Warren could take was No. 4, Douglas Place.

Mr. Bevir, for others of the next-of-kin.

Mr. Wickens appeared for the Attorney General, but took no part in the argument.

July 16.—WOOD, V.C.—The intention of the testator seems to me sufficiently clear, looking at the whole frame of the will, that the property should go to his godson absolutely, in the event of its not being accepted by the inhabitants of the parish by the appointment of a committee and trustees; and the question that arises here is, whether the devise for the purpose of founding a hospital being absolutely void under the Mortmain Act, (9 Geo. 2. c. 36), and not merely failing by the non-appointment of trustees, the gift over to the son which was limited not upon a general failure of the charitable purpose, but only upon its failing in a particular way, is to take effect. It has been suggested, that an inquiry should be directed, whether the inhabitants of the parish have accepted the gift or not, and if it should be found that they have not, then that W. H. Warren (the godson) should be declared to be entitled. But it is perfectly immaterial whether there has been any meeting of the inhabitants or not, the gift being absolutely void. The power of appointing trustees is not a power in gross, but is coupled with the interest which the inhabitants were intended to take, and the interest being out of the way, the power fails with it. In such a case, as a general rule, the ulterior devise does not depend upon the performance or non-performance of the condition, but the gift over is to be considered as taking effect upon the failure generally of the particular trusts. Suppose, for instance, the gift had been to the managing committee of an existing hospital, and, in the event of their not accepting the gift, then over to the godson; and suppose the hospital to be broken up in the testator's lifetime, that would be a case within the principle of those authorities which have decided that an ulterior, executory or substituted gift to arise upon the failure of a prior interest may take effect, although the mode in which that event has happened has not been precisely provided for by the testator; it being in effect a gift in remainder, which is merely accelerated by the failure of the previous gift. This principle was established in Jones v. Westcomb (1), in which there was a devise to the testator's wife for her life, and after her death to the child she was then enceinte with, but if such child died before twenty-one, then over; the wife not being enceinte at the time of the devise, it was held, that the devise over was good, though the contingency never happened. That case was the subject of a great deal of discussion, and the Court of Common Pleas, in Roe v. Fulham (2), came to a different conclusion upon the same will from that arrived at by Lord Harcourt, though the Court of King's Bench agreed with him on two occasions—Andrews v. Fulham (3), and Gulliver v. Wickett (4). The reasoning was very well expounded by Lord Brougham, in Mackinnon v. Sewell (5), where he says, "No real difference is made in the result, for the event contemplated has not happened, but something equivalent has taken place; that is, something which made it impossible that the result could be otherwise than that upon which the executory limitation was made to depend. Almost all the cases are those of double contingencies, the second being of a negative nature, so that the first not happening amounts to the same thing as if both had happened. Thus, a bequest over to A. in case the first takers, the unborn children of B, die before they reach twenty-one, read as a condition, is a bequest to A. if B. has children, and they do not live to twenty-one; and the first or affirmative contingency not happening, it follows of necessity that the second or negative must. If it is read as to its substance and import, and not resolved into its parts, the bequest is in case no child of B. reaches maturity, and of course none can if he have none." Lord Mansfield puts it exceedingly clearly in Frogmorton v. Holyday (6), in which Jones v. Westcomb was referred to. He says, "A question was pleaded in the days of ancient Rome, by Scævola and Crassus, in the famous cause between Curius and Coponius; and much agitated in modern times in the Courts of Westminster Hall, in the case of Jones v. Westcomb. A man taking for granted that his wife was with child, devised his estate to the child his wife was enceinte of, and if such child died under age, then he devised it over. The woman was not with child, and the question was, whether the devisee over should take." And his Lordship, with some little sarcasm, perhaps, says—"The Roman Tribunals at once and the English at last, finally determined that the intent, though not expressed, must be construed to give the estate to the substitute, unless a posthumous child lived to be of age to dispose of it. Consequently, no posthumous child having ever existed, the substitute was entitled." The case before the Roman Tribunal, referred to by Lord Mansfield, is referred to several times by Cicero, in his De Oratore, and also in the Oratio pro Cæcinnâ, where the following passage occurs:—"Non occurrit unicuique vestrūm aliud alii in omni genere exemplum, quod testimonio sit non ex verbis aptum pendere jus, sed verba servire hominum consiliis et auctoritatibus? Ornatè et copiosè L. Verbis satis hoc cautum erat? Minimè. Quæ res igitur valuit? Voluntas; quæ si tacitis nobis intelligi posset verbis omnino non uteremur: quia non potest verba reperta sunt, non quæ impediunt, sed quæ indicarent voluntatem." The rules which ought to guide the Court in construing wills were probably never better expressed than in that passage. The question came twice before Lord Hardwicke, once in Fonereau v. Fonereau (7), where there was a gift to a son for life, with remainder to his issue, and if all the issue should die, then over. The son died without having had any issue, and Lord Hardwicke held, that the limitation over took effect. But the case I particularly refer to is Avelyn v. Ward (8). In that case there was a devise on condition that the devisee should give a release within three months after the testator's decease, and if he should neglect to give such a release, then over; the devisee died in the testator's lifetime; it was held, that this was a conditional limitation, and not a case of condition, and that the devise over took effect. Both Andrews v. Fulham and Jones v. Westcomb were cited in the argument, and Lord Hardwicke said, "The question will very much turn on this, whether this devise over is to be considered and the contingency on which it is given as a strict condition, or a conditional limitation; for, if the former, it would be very difficult to maintain that the second devisee could have the estate, but upon a strict breach or non-performance. If the condition had been performed, or it became impossible by act of God, that cannot be; but if it be a conditional limitation, the consideration is different; and I know"—this is the important part—"no case of a remainder or conditional limitation over of a real estate, whether by way of particular estate, so as to leave a proper remainder, or to defeat an absolute fee before by a conditional limitation; but if the precedent limitation, by what means soever, is out of the case, the subsequent limitation takes place." Again, Mr. Fearne, in his Cases and Opinions, where the trust was for the first son of D. attaining the age of twenty-five years, he having then no son born, with a limitation over, says, page 288, speaking of the subsequent trusts, "If they may be considered as vested subject to such intervening contingent limitation to the first son of D. attaining twenty-five years of age, supposing it to be good, and that intervention is found to be or becomes void, it seems to be as much out of the way as if it never had taken effect, and were determined, or as if it never had been limited at all."

There can be no possible reason suggested here for the testator desiring that the gift over should take effect in the event of the preceding estate failing in a particular way, and not if it failed in any other way. It is not the case of a simple collateral condition not attached to the estate, in which case the condition must, of course, be strictly performed; it is like the case of a gift to a nonentity, and then a gift over in case the nonentity should not attain twenty-one. The only cases that embarrassed me were Philpot v. St. George's Hospital and The Attorney General v. Hodgson. The Attorney General v. Hodgson was of this nature:—A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal property and effects to trustees, for the establishment of a charitable receptacle for old men, if the same could be done, but if no such institution could be conveniently established, then to be disposed of for certain other charitable purposes. The case was argued on demurrer, and the Vice Chancellor of England said:—"It appears to me that his primary object was the acquisition of a dwelling-place for fifty-four people, and that it was only in the event of that object not being capable of accomplishment that he makes the general disposition over.

(7) 3 Atk. 315.

(8) 1 Ves. 420.

That general disposition over cannot be said to have taken effect. There is no allegation about it. Besides which the testator seems to point at some physical impediment which might disappoint his first purpose." In that case, however, Grimmett v. Grimmett (9) was not cited, in which the testator desired his executors to settle and secure by purchase of lands of inheritance or otherwise as they should be advised out of his personal estate, an annuity of 50*l.* for charitable purposes, and the property bequeathed for that purpose was to stand in the names of trustees until the whole could be laid out in the purchase of land to the satisfaction of the governor and trustees. Lord Hardwicke considered that there being two methods of carrying out the will, one lawful and the other unlawful, the method which was lawful should be pursued and take effect. The other case, of Philpot v. St. George's Hospital, was in reality decided upon the authority of The Attorney General v. Hodgson; and upon the appeal to the House of Lords the question became immaterial. The hesitation I have felt has been caused entirely by these two cases, but I confess I cannot conscientiously bring my mind to the conclusion that was come to in them.

Declare that the plaintiff W. H. Warren is entitled to his own use to the residuary real and personal estate of the testator, including in such residuary estate the several gifts over of the freehold and leasehold messuages therein particularly mentioned to the trustee or trustees of the Maternal Asylum.

Legacy—Substitution—Personal Representatives.

A sum of stock was bequeathed to trustees, after the decease of the survivor of two tenants for life, "to pay and apply the stock equally amongst the testator's nephews and nieces then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike."

(9) Ambl. 210.

There were seven nephews and nieces; four were still living; one nephew and niece had died in the lifetime of the testator; the nephew alone had left issue; another nephew survived the testator, and died in the lifetime of the surviving tenant for life, leaving issue. Upon a suit for the administration of the fund,—Held, that it was divisible into seven shares, and that the nephews and nieces living were each entitled to one share, and that the legal personal representatives of each nephew and niece deceased were entitled to one share each.

Samuel Cleaveland, by his will, dated the 3rd of August 1841, made the following bequest:—"I give and bequeath to Richard Francis Cleaveland, [who died in the lifetime of the testator,] and John Tregonwell King [whom he afterwards appointed his executors], and the survivor of them, his heirs, executors and administrators, the sum of 4,000*l.* (part of 7,000*l.* now standing in my name in the 3½*l.* per cent. annuities or funds of this kingdom), upon trust to stand possessed thereof, and to pay and apply the interest and dividends thereof to and for the use and behoof of my brother R. F. Cleaveland and his wife Eliza, and the survivor of them, for his and her natural lives; and after the decease of my said brother and his said wife, then in trust to pay and apply the said sum of 4,000*l.* stock, which is now represented by 4,000*l.* new 3*l.* per cent. stock, equally amongst my nephews and nieces, children of my said brother R. F. Cleaveland and his said wife, then living, or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike."

On the 31st of March 1844 the testator died.

The testator's brother R. F. Cleaveland died on the 7th of January 1849, and his wife died on the 27th of August 1857.

There were issue of the marriage of R. F. Cleaveland and Eliza his wife seven children, nephews and nieces of the testator; four were still living.

Two nephews and one niece were dead: Richard Frederick, who died intestate on the 29th of April 1843, leaving a widow, now Mrs. M'Cleverty, and two children surviving. No administration had been taken out to him.

George, who died on the 8th of January 1855 intestate, leaving a widow and three children surviving; his widow took out letters of administration to him.

The widow and children of each of these nephews were the persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions to their respective personal estates at the time of their death.

Henrietta Maria, the wife of George Foster St. Barbe, died on the 15th of December 1843 without issue.

No settlement was made of the several shares of the fund on these respective marriages.

G. F. St. Barbe took out letters of administration to his wife.

Smith v. Smith, 8 Sim. 353; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 175.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is nothing in the present case to qualify what was said in Ive v. King and Coulthurst v. Carter. No person can take by substitution for members of a class, unless the parent could have taken under the terms of the will itself as a member of that class. This does not apply where the gift is to an individual named, because, then, it is expressly intended that the substitution shall take place in order to prevent a lapse. In this case Coulthurst v. Carter is more to be considered than Ive v. King. Smith v. Smith, and Gray v. Garman (1) point to this—which is a distinction important to be noticed, as to all these species of limitations—that the persons taking by substitution take not by substitution as members of a class, but as being objects of another separate and distinct class mentioned in the will. This principle is clearly expressed in Gray v. Garman, where it is said, "If the entire clause is to be read as containing an original and substantive gift to two classes of legatees, namely, first to brothers and sisters living at the death of the wife, and, secondly, to the issue of brothers and sisters who may be dead at the time of the death of the wife, there is nothing in the description of the second class to prevent the issue of the person dead from taking." So in Smith v. Smith, it is obvious that the persons who took did not take by substitution, as has been sometimes erroneously supposed, but as the objects of a separate and distinct class. The words of the gift there are, "unto and amongst all and every my children who might be then living," that was, living at the death of the wife, and there was also a gift to the issue of any of the children who should happen to die in the lifetime of the wife. It is clear that there were two classes: one class was the children who survived the wife, and the other class was the issue of children who had died in the lifetime of the wife; it was held, that they were both entitled to take. It was also held, that there was nothing to limit the issue; who were to take with issue of children who had died in the lifetime of the wife, during the period which elapsed between the death of the testator and the division of the fund; but the issue of all the children who died in her lifetime were held entitled. So in Coulthurst v. Carter it was held, that the children did not take by way of substitution, but that they took as specified objects of a particular gift. Applying those rules to the present case, the real question is, at what time is the class to be ascertained? Is there one or are there two classes? If there be one class merely of nephews and nieces, and that class is to be ascertained at the death of the testator, unquestionably no representative of any one of those nephews and nieces who have died can take, unless the nephew or niece would have taken: that is, unless the nephew or niece had survived the testator. But if the true construction is, that the nephews and nieces who survived the tenant for life are one class, and that the representatives of the deceased nephews and nieces form another class, then there is nothing to limit the period of the decease of those nephews and nieces to the period which elapsed between the death of the testator and the time of distribution. The view that I take of the case is, that there are two distinct classes. There is a gift both to nephews and nieces who were living at the death of the testator, or to the representatives of such of them as should have died, that is, of nephews and nieces as should have died, share and share alike. These words are not words of limitation; but assuming that they are words of substantive gift, then I hold that they do not apply to the representatives of nephews and nieces then living, but that they apply to the representatives of nephews and nieces who had previously died, if any, in which case it would include the nephews and nieces who were living at the date of the will, and those who died previously to that period. That would be in accordance with Coulthurst v. Carter. The difficulty in these cases is not in stating or ascertaining the principle,—that is well ascertained in all the cases referred to, and they appear consistent and agree on the point,—but the difficulty is, in construing the meaning of the words, “to apply the sum of 4,000*l.* stock equally among my nephews and nieces, children of my brother and his wife then living,” (that is, at the death of the last tenant for life) “or their legal personal representatives, share and share alike.” I hold that the words, “share and share alike,” coming after the word “representatives,” ought properly to be referred to the last antecedent, which is, “representatives,” and that the word “equally” shews how the nephews and nieces are to take, and that the words “share and share alike” shew in what character the representatives are to take, namely, as the representatives of nephews and nieces. That is a separate and distinct class from those who were living at the death of the tenant for life. The result, therefore, will be, that the fund will be divided into seven shares, instead of four; each nephew and niece still surviving, and the representatives of each nephew and niece deceased will take one of such shares.

Legacy—Substitution—Personal Representatives—Administrator.

A substitutionary gift to the personal representatives of a niece, one of a class, who had died in the lifetime of the testator, without issue, devolves upon her next-of-kin, and does not pass to her administrator.

Upon the decision (reported in the last case) that the fund was to be divided into seven shares, and that the nephews and nieces then living and the representatives of the nephews and nieces then dead were each entitled to one share, the husband and administrator of the deceased niece who had died without issue claimed her share as her legal personal representative.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The words "legal personal representatives" mean "the next-of-kin;" and, therefore, the husband can take only in that character. It is important to distinguish between the two classes of cases in which the words "legal personal representatives" are used; they are used in the primary or in the secondary sense, when the persons who take do so under the administration; no doubt, the question arises whether they take in their character of trustees or beneficially. If the words had been extended beyond the next-of-kin, according to the statute, it would be very material, and the husband would be let in; but if confined, then it is admitted that the husband does not take. When the meaning has been extended, it has been where the word "heirs" is used. The husband, therefore, is excluded.

Landlord and Tenant—Repairs—Covenant—Implied Liability.

A tenant, under a lease which contained a covenant to repair, and leave in good repair, all buildings and erections then standing or to be erected during the term, built a farm-house, partly on the land demised and partly on the waste adjoining belonging to the lessor. On the decease of the tenant, upon a claim by the landlord for dilapidations,—Held, that his acquiescence in the act of the tenant prevented his dispossessing him of the premises built on the waste, and that it must be assumed by implication that the covenant to repair extended to the whole building, and that the landlord was entitled in a suit for the administration of the tenant's estate to establish a claim for dilapidations.

By a lease, dated the 21st of July 1798, John Burridge Cholwick demised a messuage and about forty acres of land, called Little Snodwell, to Nicholas Newbery, for ninety-nine years, if the said Nicholas Newbery, Susannah Newbery, and Francis Newbery, deceased, or either of them, should so long happen to live, at the yearly rent of 2*l.*, and a further sum of 2*l.* on the death of each of the said lives. The lease contained a covenant by N. Newbery, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, and for every of them, to pay the rent and reservations, and also at his own costs during the term to well and sufficiently repair, uphold, sustain and maintain the demised premises and every part thereof; and all erections, buildings, hedges and fences to be erected and built on the same premises so well and sufficiently repaired, upheld, sustained and maintained, and in good substantial repair in all things whatsoever, at the end or sooner determination of the lease to peaceably and quietly deliver and yield up unto the said J. B. Cholwick, his executors, administrators or assigns, or to such other person who for the time being should be seised of the freehold, reversion and inheritance of the said premises.

On the death of Francis Newbery, William Sandys was seised of the reversion expectant on the determination of the lease.

Nicholas Newbery, in 1808, built a farm-house and buildings partly on the demised lands, and partly on a piece of waste land, part of Langbeer Down adjoining, belonging to the reversioner.

These buildings were out of repair at the expiration of the lease, and a suit having been instituted for the administration of the estate of Francis Newbery, Mr. Sandys claimed a sum of 124*l.* 2*s.* as a debt under the covenant to repair, in respect of the dilapidations; this claim, upon its being made before the chief clerk, was disallowed, but it was finally adjourned into court.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Sandys now moved to vary the chief clerk's certificate.—The present claim is resisted, because it is said that a part of the site of the house is outside the lease; a head-rent, however, was paid throughout the lease: so far, therefore, the reversioner had acquiesced in the act of his tenant in building on the waste. The new house was now within the inclosure, and the landlord could not have ejected the tenant from the part not comprised in the lease.

Mr. Barber, for the plaintiffs, the residuary legatees of F. Newbery.—The question was one of law. It ought to be tried in an action on the covenant. Assuming that the piece of land taken was not a part of the demised premises, still the owner of the soil allowed the tenant to take right of common over the waste; but was it taken on the terms of the lease? No claim was made by either party in respect of it, and a right to the use and occupation could only arise upon a contract. This was but a permission to build and to occupy. It was irrespective of all contract, and the decease of the tenant could give no claim to the landlord. No covenant could be implied against him at law, and no contract could be implied to keep in repair a building erected upon an encroachment; neither was there anything from which it could be said that the term granted by the lease was to extend to this encroachment.

Mr. Selwyn, in reply.—If a tenant, after the expiration of his lease, held over, an implication arose that he did so upon the terms contained in his lease. Was there not then such an implied intention between these parties as to make the demised estate liable for these dilapidations?

July 12.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Must not a contract be implied between the landlord and tenant, that the house erected by the tenant should be considered and held as part of the original demise, although built on land not comprised within the limits of the original lease? There does not appear to have been any agreement in writing between the parties, nor is there any evidence of anything that took place on the subject. There is nothing but the fact, that the landlord allowed the tenant to build, and that the tenant for the time being of the premises under the lease has occupied the house until the termination of the lease, without paying any rent for the house, or any increase of the rent upon the sum reserved by the original demise. In the absence of all agreement, in order to ascertain on what condition the tenant held the house, it will be necessary to consider whether the Court would have allowed the landlord to evict the tenant after he had erected the buildings with the landlord's acquiescence. I have no doubt of the principle laid down in Dann v. Spurrier with the limitations established in The Master, &c. of Clare Hall v. Harding, and such cases as Powell v. Thomas. The Court would have interposed to restrain the landlord from evicting the tenant immediately after the erection of the building: then, to what period would this equity in favour of the tenant extend? The mode of deciding is to consider that there was involved in the permission to build a permission by the landlord to the tenant to occupy the building for the term of the lease. Again, if the landlord, after allowing the occupation of the house for several years without payment of rent, had required rent to be paid for it, this Court, in the absence of express agreement, would hold that there was an implied agreement that the occupation during the term should be without any additional rent to that previously paid by the tenant. If that is so, is this implied agreement to be one-sided? Can this Court hold, that the tenant is to be at liberty to suffer the house to fall for want of repair, or, if he please, to pull it down during the term and sell the materials? The Court would interfere to prevent this, just as if the building were included in the original lease. But this could only be on the ground of an implied contract between the parties that the house should be treated as part of the premises contained in the lease, and therefore subject to all the covenants and obligations contained in the lease. The dilapidations must be made good out of the estate of the deceased tenant.

Legacy—Specific or General.

*A testator, by his will, stated that he had lent his money to various persons named on their respective notes of hand, and to sundry other persons, whose names and notes would be found among his papers; he then said, "Now my will is, that the monies as aforesaid be disposed of as follows"; the testator then gave legacies to the amount of 9,900*l.* At his death none of the enumerated investments existed:—Held, that the legacies were not specific, but general, legacies.*

Francis Newbery, by his will, dated the 3rd of April 1841, said, "Whereas I am possessed of certain freehold and leasehold property, and also of monies in the hands of several persons hereinafter mentioned, lent to them on their respective notes of hand, payable, with interest, viz., to Messrs. —, &c."; the testator then stated the names of the several persons whose notes he held, and concluded, "To Dutch stock, Stuckey & Co. (who were his bankers), and sundry other persons, whose names and notes of hand will be found amongst my papers," &c. "Now my will is, that the monies as aforesaid be disposed of as follows." The testator then disposed of his freehold and leasehold property; he also gave several legacies amounting to 9,900*l.*

Several questions were raised upon this will: first, whether the legacies were specific and adeemed, by reason of none of the identical monies mentioned in the will being in existence at the death, the Dutch stock itself having been sold; second, whether the legacies were payable so far as the monies out on new notes of hand, and at the bankers at the time of the death, would extend; and, third, whether they were payable out of the general estate.

Mr. Barber, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Turner, for the testator's widow, who, though not a party to the suit, appeared under an order for liberty to attend proceedings, insisted that the legacies were not payable, or, if payable, that payment must be made out of the monies invested, and then only so far as monies on notes of hand at the testator's death or at his bankers, would extend.

C. died in the lifetime of the testator:—Held, that her 500*l.* survived to M. A. and B; and that Sarah was not included in the words "the surviving sisters above mentioned."*

Francis Newbery, among other legacies, gave the following, "I bequeath to my brother Joseph Newbery the interest of 2,000*l.* during his life, the said sum to be invested in the funds, or on land security, by my executors hereinafter mentioned, and at his decease to be divided between my sisters (except Sarah); to my sister Sarah I bequeath the interest of 1,000*l.* for her life for her sole use, and at her decease equally to her children (if any), if not, to Mrs. Frazer's family. To each of my sisters, viz., Mary Ann, Charlotte and Betsy, I bequeath 500*l.*, making 1,500*l.*, and in case of death to either their portions to go to the surviving sisters above mentioned."

Charlotte died in November 1846, in the lifetime of the testator.

It was now insisted that the words "to the surviving sisters above mentioned" included Sarah; and that the right to participate in the 500*l.* which Charlotte would have taken was not confined solely to Mary Ann and Betsy.

The bill was filed, by James White and Sarah his wife and William Newbery, the two last of whom were the residuary legatees of the testator, against Henry Wakley, the executor of the testator's will, for an administration of the estate.

None of the legatees interested in this question were parties to the suit, neither did it appear that they had obtained any order to attend the proceedings.

Mr. Barber submitted the question to the Court.

July 15.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The gift of this legacy is in itself complete and confined within its own words. Sarah is, therefore, excluded; she has no right to participate in the gift of the 1,500*l.* This is not a question which has any relation to land.

Baron and Feme—Legacy to Wife—Protection Order.

A married woman, whose earnings and property were protected against her husband and his creditors, by an order made under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 21, on account of his desertion of her, will be ordered the payment of a legacy given to her in general terms (1).

This was the petition of Ann Woolley, a married woman, by her next friend. She had been deserted by her husband from the year 1845, without any reasonable cause, and she now prayed that a sum of 414*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities might be paid to her as if she were a feme sole. The petition prayed in the alternative, that the fund might be settled and the dividends paid to her during her life for her separate use, free from the debts and engagements of her husband, with remainder after her decease for her only child.

Jane Kingsley, by her will, bequeathed to Ann, the wife of Edward Woolley, the sum of 400*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities. The testatrix died on the 11th of March 1853, and her will was proved by Charles Kingsley and Robert Wills, her executors.

On the 21st of February 1855, Edward Woolley, the husband, was living at Turee, in New South Wales, and on that day he executed a power of attorney which had been sent out to him, authorizing Messrs. Kingsley and Wills to pay the legacy to a person named in the power. This was subsequently signed by Ann Woolley, but the executors refused to act upon it; and E. Woolley had not since been heard of by his wife.

On the 10th of April 1858, the Justices of the county of Somerset, assembled in Petty Sessions, by virtue of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. s. 21, made an order protecting the earnings and property which Ann Woolley had acquired since 1845, from her husband and his creditors, and it directed that the same should belong to her as if she were a feme sole. This order was duly registered in the County Court of Somersetshire, at Taunton.

The petitioner then applied to the executors; they refused to pay either the legacy or the dividends to her, but they paid 380*l.* and 34*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, making the 414*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, into court, under the Trus-

LORDS JUSTICES.
 July 17, 23, 24, 26; } PRIDE v. FOOKS.
 Nov. 25.

Will, Construction—"Children"—"Issue"—"Without leaving Issue."

T. W., by his will, made in 1805, gave the residue of his real estate and all his personal estate to a trustee in trust for conversion and for accumulation, for the benefit of "such child or children" as his nephews and niece, Walter, Thomas and Dorothy, should leave at the time of their respective deceases, in equal third parts; and in case either of his said nephews and niece should die without leaving any children or a child, then such third share should be paid to the children or child of the other or others leaving children or a child, in equal proportions. And in case all his said nephews and niece should die without "leaving any issue," then he directed that the whole should go to the children of P. G., in equal shares. Walter, Thomas and Dorothy all died without leaving any child, but Dorothy left grandchildren. The Master of the Rolls decided that the word "children" should be interpreted so as to include grandchildren and remoter issue, and that the property was divisible among the eight grandchildren of Dorothy per capita, so that the gift over did not take effect, nor was there an intestacy:—Held, reversing that decision, that the words "child or children" must be read in their strictly proper sense, and did not include grandchildren or remoter issue; that "any issue" could not be read "any such issue," so that the gift over to the children of P. G. did not take effect, but that there was an intestacy.

This case came on upon two appeals from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, on the construction of the will of Thomas Webb, dated the 3rd of April 1805.

By this will the testator, after giving certain legacies and annuities, and some property to his wife for life, devised a close in Sherborne to his nephew Thomas Pride for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; and for default of such issue to the same uses in favour of Walter Pride and his sons; and for default of such issue, to the use of his niece Dorothy, for life, with remainder to her children, as tenants in common in fee; and for default of such issue to his own right heirs.

The testator then proceeded as follows:—"As to all other my freehold messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, and my several leasehold estates, lands and premises, not hereinbefore disposed of, situate in the parish of Sherborne aforesaid, or elsewhere, and the sum of 7,000*l.* stock in the 3*l.* per cent. consolidated annuities, and other my monies, securities for money, and personal estate of every denomination whatsoever, I give, devise and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto the said Thomas Fooks, to hold to him, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the nature of the respective estates; but upon and subject nevertheless to the several trusts, and to the provisoes and declarations hereinafter mentioned, expressed and declared of and concerning the same; that is to say, in trust that he, the said Thomas Fooks, his heirs, executors or administrators, do and shall, with all convenient speed after my decease, absolutely sell and dispose of all my said estates, lands and premises, to any person or persons willing to purchase the same, either by public auction or private contract, as he or they shall think fit, for the best price that can be obtained, and do and shall, for that purpose, make and execute such deeds and conveyances as may be requisite and proper; and I do hereby declare, that the receipt alone of him, the said Thomas Fooks, or his heirs, executors or administrators, shall be a valid and effectual discharge to any purchaser, without such purchaser looking to the application of the purchase-money by him paid. And it is my will, and I do direct that the said Thomas Fooks, his executors and administrators, do and shall stand possessed of the monies arising from such sale or sales of my said estates and all other monies whatsoever which shall come to his or their hands, subject to the trusts hereinafter declared, that is to say, in trust, in the first place, to pay and discharge all my just debts, funeral and other expenses, the cost of proving this my will, and the several legacies hereby bequeathed, and after such deduction thereout then in trust to place and invest all the residue in the name of him the said Thomas Fooks, his executors or administrators, in the said 3*l.* per cent. consolidated annuities, in addition to the said stock of 7,000*l.* already there. And it is my will, and I do direct the said Thomas Fooks, his executors or administrators, do and shall from time to time receive the interest or dividends arising from the whole of such funded property, and after paying and discharging the said several annuities hereinbefore bequeathed, which I hereby charge thereon, and direct to be paid half-yearly, as such dividends shall become due and be received, invest and place the residue of such dividends and interest in the name of him, the said Thomas Fooks, his executors or administrators, in the said 3*l.* per cent. annuities, in augmentation as well of the said stock of 7,000*l.* already there, as of the addition or accumulation from time to time to be made thereto by and out of the aforesaid trust estate, which it is my will shall continue to be increased in such manner, and remain vested in the said Thomas Fooks, his executors or administrators, in trust for and for the only benefit of such child or children as they, my said nephews and niece, Walter, Thomas and Dorothy, shall leave at the time of their respective deceases, and to be paid and divided in manner following (that is to say): one third part thereof to the child or children of the said Walter Pride; if but one child only, then the whole to such only child, but if more than one, then unto all such children in equal proportions; and the two remaining third parts thereof, to the child or children of the said Thomas and Dorothy, in like manner. And in case either of my said nephews and niece shall happen to die without leaving any children or a child lawfully begotten, then I direct that such third part shall go and be paid to the children or child of the other or others leaving children or a child, in equal proportions, if more than one; and in case all of them, my said nephews and niece, shall happen to die without leaving any issue lawfully begotten, then I direct that the whole of the residue of my said estate shall go and be paid to the three children of Peter Gapper, late of Sherborne aforesaid, brandy-merchant, deceased, by Jane his wife, the daughter of my now wife, in equal shares and proportions, if all living, or in case of either of them being then dead, to the survivors or survivor, and the issue of such as may be dead, such issue taking per stirpes and not per capita. And I do hereby authorize and empower my said trustee, the said Thomas Fooks, his executors and administrators, from time to time to apply so much and such part of the income of my said estate as in his or their judgment may be sufficient and proper for the education and maintenance of the children of my said nephews and niece during their minority, and for their future advancement in life."

The testator died in 1808, and his will was proved. He left his two nephews, Walter Pride and Thomas Pride, and his niece, Dorothy Prisk originally Pride and afterwards Worsdale, surviving.

Thomas Pride died in 1824, without ever having had a child.

Walter Pride died in 1854, without leaving a child or remoter issue, his only son, Thomas Webb Pride, having died in his lifetime without issue.

Dorothy (married to Mr. Prisk) died in January 1858, leaving no child, but eight grandchildren. She had had four children, Henrietta Jane, Edward Thomas Henry, both of whom died without having been married, Elizabeth, the wife of Mr. Cottle, and Caroline, the wife of Mr. Fowler.

Mrs. Cottle died in 1827 leaving children, and Mrs. Fowler died in 1845, also leaving children.

The children of Mrs. Cottle and Mrs. Fowler were together eight in number.

The suit was instituted for the purpose of having a determination, whether the gift over to Peter Gapper's children took effect, or whether there was an intestacy, so that the next-of-kin of the testator were entitled, or whether the children of Mrs. Cottle and Mrs. Fowler were entitled.

The cause was heard before the Master of the Rolls, who held that the true construction of the will was, that the word "children" in the early part of the will ought to be read so as to include "grandchildren and remoter issue"; that the gift over did not take effect, nor was there an intestacy, but that the eight children of Mrs. Cottle and Mrs. Fowler were each entitled to one-eighth per capita (1).

(1) The Master of the Rolls, in delivering judgment upon the question of construction, spoke as follows:—"Looking at the words of the will as res integra, the time having come when the decision respecting these words must be pronounced, and the proper construction put upon them, I am compelled to say that, in my view of the case, the event in which alone the testator intended the gift over to take effect in favour of the Gapper family has not arisen, and that, unless the nephews and niece all died without leaving any issue surviving any one of them, the gift over did not take effect. In the first place, the word 'issue' is nomen generalissimum; it includes all issue, and the burden of shewing that it is to be used in a restricted sense lies on them who so contend. It is certainly not to be contested that, when a testator makes a gift of personal estate to certain persons for life, and, after their death, to a particular class of their issue, and then introduces a gift over in case those persons should die without issue, the word 'issue' is, as a general rule, confined to the 'issue' previously spoken of. This is, however, subject to this qualification, that the whole will and the scope and object of the bequest must be

The representatives of the children of Peter Gapper appealed, as did also the next-of-kin of the testator.

The case was argued elaborately during the greater part of four days, and as many of the points of discussion are examined in looked at, so as to see that this is the real meaning of the testator. It is, I think, a just observation which is made by Sir Richard Kindersley, in the case of Westwood v. Southey (1): 'The remaining question is, how does this conclusion affect the construction of the word "issue" in the limitation over? It is true that where there is a legacy to one for life, and after his death to his children, with a gift over if he die without issue, and there is nothing to restrain those words, the words "without issue" are limited to the issue before mentioned. But the ground on which the Court has used violence with the words, and interpolated the word "such," is this, that if there were no restriction on the generality of the words "dying without issue," the limitation over would be void; you refer, therefore, the language of the gift over to that of the preceding gift, in order to limit the general term "issue" to the particular issue before mentioned. But when the dying without issue is either in terms or by the proper construction limited to dying without issue living at the death, there is no reason for interpreting the words as meaning "such issue as before mentioned." I am not aware of any case in which a legacy to one for his life, with remainder to his children, and a gift over if he dies without issue, in the sense of issue living at his death, the limitation has been restricted as if the words had been "such issue as before mentioned." Such a construction might, in fact, wholly defeat the testator's intention; for if the words were construed to mean "such issue," the effect might be this: the tenant for life might have an only child, who might attain twenty-one, marry, and have children and die before the tenant for life, and then the child and the issue of that child would be excluded.' Thus the Vice Chancellor really, in fact, suggested by anticipation the precise case which has arisen in the present case. Here the words are 'leaving any issue.' The failure of issue is, therefore, clearly attributable to the death of the survivor of the nephews and niece. A similar view to that stated by Sir Richard Kindersley is stated by Lord Cottenham in Ellicombe v. Gompertz (2); he says: 'Provision is made for certain members of a class answering a particular description, and then a gift over is made upon the failure of the class. If it be clear that the whole of the class were not to take, the gift over, though made to depend upon the failure of the whole class, will be construed to take place upon the failure of that description of the class who were to take; and, on the other hand, if it appears that all the class were intended to take, although some only are enumerated, and the gift over be upon the failure of the whole class, the Court will adopt such a construction as will extend the benefit, the judgment of Lord Justice Turner, a slight sketch of them here will suffice.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Hobhouse, for the representatives of the children of Peter Gapper, while contending that the expression "child or children" ought to be strictly construed and kept to its primary signification, yet argued that the words "without leaving any issue," preceding the gift over to the Gappers, ought to be read "without leaving such issue," so as to avoid an intestacy and give effect to the gift over. They cited—in the best way the law will admit, to the whole class. Of both these propositions the authorities present many examples.' In fact, according to the view of Lord Cottenham, it would seem that the principle on which the Court construes wills of this description is, still to preserve the rule that the gift over is to take effect upon the failure of the class of issue before described, but that it will in some cases restrict the word 'issue' to a particular portion of that class before enumerated, in order to prevent intestacy; while it would in the other case enlarge the previous enumeration of the class to the extent of the whole class after mentioned, on the failure of which alone the gift over is to take effect. In this case, the other parts of the will seem to me to point strongly towards rejecting any limitation of a general description of the word 'issue' to a portion only of that class on the failure of which the gift over is expressed to take effect. In the prior part of the will, which I have stated in detail, when the gift over is limited on the failure of children of the nephews and niece, the word 'such' is introduced before the word 'issue' and this is done on several occasions. This is not omitted in the present residuary bequest, but the word 'any' is introduced and substituted for the word 'such,' as if in contradistinction therewith. In this very sentence also, if the gift over takes effect, it is to the children of Peter Gapper by Jane his wife, and the issue of such as might be dead, such issue taking per stirpes. In this clause of the sentence, therefore, it is impossible to restrict 'issue' to children of a child, but it must include all the remoter issue if there were no children to take. There are many cases, particularly in the instances of devisees of real estate, in which the Court has held the word 'children' to be a word of limitation, extending it beyond its more limited meaning, and making the word

Mr. Batten, for some of the next-of-kin of the testator, insisted that the limited construction of the term "child or children" was the proper one, but that "without issue," preceding the gift over to the Gappers, ought not to be construed "such issue," to give effect to that gift over; but on the contrary, that by strictly construing both expressions, as they contended the Court ought to do, an intestacy would be the consequence, which, although unwillingly, the Court was bound from the authorities to pronounce had taken place. The cases cited were—equivalent to 'issue.' I think that in the present case, in the gift of the residue, the testator has shewn his meaning to be that the words 'children' and 'child' are to be extended to grandchildren and to remoter descendants, in the words which follow immediately after the enumeration of the children. It is to be paid to the children or child of the others having children or a child in equal proportions, and in case all die without leaving any issue, then over. I read the word 'issue' as introduced here to shew the intention of the testator to extend the meaning of the word 'children' before specified, and to save the complicated enumeration of grandchildren and great-grandchildren, which would probably have been required to express fully his intention, but which, without such expression, the rules of law give effect to in the case of the word 'issue.' According to its more extended signification, grandchildren certainly would not have taken concurrently with their parents; but if a nephew had died, leaving no children, but having grandchildren, then in my view of the construction of the whole of this clause, the gift over to the Gapper family would not have taken effect, as it was only to take effect in case the nephews and niece all died without leaving any issue. But that event has not occurred, and the gift over therefore does not take effect; but this does not in my opinion create any intestacy, but the meaning expressed by the testator by the use of the word 'issue' makes, in my opinion, the issue of the nephews and niece objects of his bounty, under the description of their children. The will is certainly one of no easy construction; but I think that that is the fair meaning of the words used by the testator, and also that which is most consistent with the rules of construction adopted by this Court in similar cases." His Honour afterwards, upon argument, made a direction that the property should be divided amongst the children of Mrs. Cottle and Mrs. Fowler equally per capita.

Moor v. Raisbeck, 12 Sim. 123.

Sanderson v. Bayley, 4 Myl. & Cr. 56; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 18.

Wylid's case, 6 Rep. 17, b.

Nov. 25.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.

—The controversy in this case is as to the true construction of the disposition of the residuary estate of Mr. Thomas Webb, made by his will, dated in the year 1805, which, after granting some annuities and making other gifts to various persons, including the testator's nephew Walter Pride, the testator's nephew, Thomas Pride, their sister, the testator's niece Dorothy, and his executor, Mr. Thomas Fooks, gave the testator's residuary property, consisting, as it was stated at the bar, and as I assume, of personalty only, in these words.—[His Lordship then read the residuary gift as before set forth, and proceeded]—There was a codicil added in the same year, 1805, which gave an annuity; but neither by that codicil, nor, as I conceive, by any other parts of the will than the portion beginning with the words, "as to all other my freehold messuages," and ending with the words "advancement in life," which I have just been reading, is the interpretation of that part affected adversely to the construction to be presently stated as appearing to me right. The testator died, as I collect, in December 1808, notwithstanding the different statements on that subject, in one at least of the documents before us. I collect also that his wife, living when the will was made, in fact survived him for a short time. He was survived also by his two nephews and niece. The will and codicil were proved at Doctors' Commons in the year 1810 by Mr. Fooks, who proceeded to act in the duties of the executorship and trusteeship accordingly. It has been agreed on all hands that the accumulation directed by the will was by law prohibited from proceeding, and did not proceed, beyond the end of twenty-one years next after the testator's death, a period reached in the year 1829; the present dispute being only as to the title to the Consolidated Bank Annuities which then by accumulation and otherwise constituted his residuary estate, and the income accrued on them since the death of his niece Dorothy, who survived the nephews, Walter and Thomas, and died in the present year 1858. The dividends that became payable during the interval between the end of the twenty-one years and her death, are, I repeat, not in question. The nephew Thomas never had any issue; the nephew Walter had an only child, a son, who died a bachelor after the testator's death, but in Walter's lifetime, so that Walter left no issue. There were children of Dorothy, also, who were living after the testator's death, but all Dorothy's children died in her lifetime, so that she left no child. She left, however, various grandchildren, some of whom at least are at present in existence. Of the three children whom the will mentions of Peter Gapper, deceased, by his wife Jane, both also mentioned in it, one is still alive, and there is living issue of one of the two others. The fund in dispute is claimed by some of the parties before us as having been given by the will to Dorothy's grandchildren under the designation of Dorothy's children. It is, adversely to that alleged title, claimed as having by force of the will in the events that have taken place become vested in the issue or some of the issue of Peter Gapper, deceased, by his wife Jane. And it is, in opposition to both contentions, claimed to belong, as upon an intestacy, to those who represent the testator's widow, and the persons who were his next-of-kin at his death. There is not any claim made under the will to any share of the residue on behalf of the estate of the nephew Walter, on behalf of the estate of the nephew Thomas, on behalf of the estate of Dorothy, on behalf of the estate of Walter's deceased son, or on behalf of the estate of any deceased child of Dorothy. We were, during the discussion at the bar, informed that there was at least one great-grandchild of Dorothy, who, born in Dorothy's lifetime, survived her. Though this was not stated by way of objection, and the cause was not, I believe, on any side suggested to be defective in point of parties, I felt some doubt whether it was not so, there being no great-grandchild of Dorothy, as I understand, before the Court or represented here. It has, however, seemed to me, and I believe likewise to my learned Brother, not necessary to treat the case as incomplete in that respect, all the counsel having, I repeat, appeared desirous that it should be heard by us in its actual state, being the condition in which it stood when heard by Sir John Romilly, before whom also, as I collect, no such objection was taken. We have, therefore, to declare whether we view the testator as having made an effectual gift of the beneficial interest in his residuary property now in controversy, and if so, in what manner; and accordingly to determine, so far as our opinion is concerned, the meaning to be attributed to the word "child," the word "children," and the word "issue," where those three words are used with reference to the progeny of Walter, of Thomas and of Dorothy, respectively, in the disposition which I have just been reading. This and the rest of the composition before us I have repeatedly gone through and considered, not without giving attention to the authorities (more than thirty in number) cited during the argument, and especially to the case of Wythe v. Blackman (or Wythe v. Thurlston), and those of Gale v. Bennet, Ginger v. White, Goodright v. Dunham, Morse v. Lord Ormonde, and Greene v. Ward; the decision in which last case pronounced at the Rolls I have, in consequence of a suggestion from Mr. Lee, ascertained to have been affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst when Lord Chancellor, in August 1829. I find mentioned in my note a case of Key v. Key (2), recently before this Court, though whether it was in argument referred to I am not sure. I advert to it for the purpose of saying that I continue to take the view which my learned Brother and myself thought right when we disposed of it. The grandchildren of Dorothy contend that the words "without leaving any issue lawfully begotten" shew that, in the events which have happened, they were meant to take (exclusively or otherwise) under the description of "Dorothy's children;" while those who claim under the gift to children or issue of the deceased Peter Gapper, by his wife Jane, insist that the words "issue lawfully begotten," mean "children or child," and that accordingly the gift to them took effect and became vested. Now, since neither of the testator's nephews nor the niece left a child, and since the niece who died the last of them has left grandchildren, and therefore issue, it is clear and manifest that if the dispositions and provisions which the will contain concerning the residuary estate ought to be read and understood according to their strictly popular force or (what in the present instance is the same thing) the ordinary or proper acceptation of the language in which they are expressed, there is a total intestacy, so far as all beneficial interest in it is concerned; and the question whether those dispositions and provisions ought to be thus read and understood must, I apprehend, be answered in the affirmative, unless the effect of the entire contents of the testamentary instruments is to forbid such an answer; that is to say, unless from the whole of the two documents, each part being considered with due attention to the rest, and to such extrinsic facts, if any, as ought to be taken into the account, an intention contrary to the intestacy alleged can be collected. But certainly, no help to the contention of either side of alleged residuary legatees is afforded by any extrinsic fact or collateral circumstance. The will treats the nephews and niece as living at the time when it was made; they were so in fact, and having survived the testator, were, of course, also living at the time when the codicil was made. By declining, however, to ascribe to him a wish to die testate as to the beneficial interest in his residuary estate, in case of such events happening as have happened, is there imputed to him any contradiction of himself, or any opposition between one portion and another of his testamentary provisions? It appears to me clearly not. I have been unable to discover, and do not think, omni considerata scriptura, that by the instruments together, or by either separately, an intention is exhibited to dispose of the beneficial interest in the residue in the events which have happened. It may be repetition, or the mere utterance of a truism to say, as I venture nevertheless to do, that if a will, taken as a whole, shews that the testator has used in it any word in a sense and with a meaning different from the ordinary or correct interpretation of the word, and shews also what are the sense and meaning attributed to the word by the testator, it must be construed according to that sense and to that meaning. But, as I have in effect already said, the will before us appears to me not to shew any such intention with regard to the word "child," with regard to the word "children," or where the word "issue" occurs in the phrase "dying without leaving any issue lawfully begotten," with regard to the word "issue." Again, all lawyers know that if the contents of a will shew that if a word has been unintentionally omitted, or undesignedly inserted, and demonstrate what addition by construction, or what rejection by construction will fulfil the intention with which the document is worded, the addition or rejection will by construction be made; but there is, I think, no such state of things here. It may be a slight remark to observe that the testator says here "and in case all of them," and not "but in case all of them," and that the phrase "children or a child," in one instance, occurs so near the phrase "without leaving any issue lawfully begotten" following it, as to be separated from it by only twenty-two words, and the latter phrase, "without leaving any issue lawfully begotten," is separated from the word "children," when first coming after it, by only twenty-one words; while after the expression "three children of Peter Gapper," the word "issue" occurs twice, and the word "children" once. There is, perhaps, more importance in the circumstance that the phrase "without leaving any issue lawfully begotten," contains the word "any," and the fact that wherever the word "issue" is used in those parts of the will which I have not read to-day, it is accompanied—that is to say, immediately preceded—by the word "such"; and though I do not mean to intimate any doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Morse v. Lord Ormonde, it does not, as I conceive, govern the present case. There is a well-known class of decisions, which at one time seemed to me might possibly be thought to rule this contest in favour of the Gapper family—I mean that to which we may ascribe Murray v. Jones (3), where Sir William Grant says, "The limitation over depends on the failure of that which precedes it; but the testatrix has not taken in all the modes by which it might fail." And he particularly refers to Jones v. Westcomb (4). Upon reflection, however, I have become convinced that the will before the Court does not shew an intention that the mere failure after the testator's death of the gift of the residue to the children of Walter, of Thomas, and of Dorothy (howsoever the failure might happen), should necessarily have the effect of conferring on the Gapper family, by way of substitution, what, in a particular state of circumstances, was meant for those children. And my opinion being that we ought not here to read the word "child" as not meaning merely child in the ordinary familiar sense of that expression when meant to indicate relationship, the word "children" as not meaning merely children in the ordinary and familiar sense of that expression when used to indicate relationship, or the word "issue," where it occurs in the phrase "die without leaving any issue lawfully begotten," as not meaning progeny or offspring in whatever degree, I must hold that, as events have happened, the fund in dispute, which at the end of twenty-one years from the testator's death represented his residuary personal estate, ought to be considered as not disposed of, and be distributed accordingly as upon an intestacy. This interpretation certainly attributes to the testator (who had no issue) an intention to dispose by the will of the capital of his residuary estate in favour of the near relations of his wife, if, and not unless, his two nephews and his niece should all die without leaving any lawful progeny whatsoever, immediate or not immediate; and at the same time an absence of intention to dispose by the will of that capital or any part of it, in favour of any person after the death of the survivor of the two nephews and niece, if it should happen that no one of those three persons should leave a lawful child, and it should also happen that all or any two or one of them should leave lawful progeny. Considering, however, that the will is, so far as its construction is concerned, plain and clear, I really cannot perceive that, while ascribing to the document substantial propriety of expression, I am imputing to the testator a state of mind or view less likely to have belonged to him than the designs, which every one necessarily admits to be exhibited upon the face of the instrument. It is sufficiently obvious that if the will is, as to the property in question (with reference to the events which have actually taken place) incomprehensible, intestacy must be the result. Of course, the two sets of opponents of the proposition of intestacy here cannot both be entitled; but if either, which of them ought to be considered as being so? I find myself entirely unable to say: the case of one seeming to be quite as good or as bad, and quite as consistent with the rules and idiom of the English language and with probability, as that of the other. Where is the not uncertain gift beneficially of the residue, which alone can prevent the intestacy contended for? Now, without more, I repeat, as it seems to me, when letter and spirit are at variance, the spirit, I assume, ought certainly to prevail. Here, I can discover no spirit that the letter contradicts; by the letter, therefore, I must be guided, and that pronounces for intestacy.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This case has come before us upon two appeals from an order of the Master of the Rolls, by which his Honour has declared that, according to the true construction of the will of Thomas Webb, the testator in the cause, and, in the events which have happened, the testator's residuary estate became divisible, upon the decease of Dorothy Prisk, the niece of the testator, into eight equal shares among the eight grandchildren of Dorothy Prisk living at her death; and has ordered the residuary estate, which is represented by the sum of 33,070*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, Bank 3*l.* per cent. annuities standing in trust in the cause, to be divided accordingly. Thomas Webb, the testator in the cause, had, at the date of his will, two nephews, Walter Pride and Thomas Pride, and a niece, Dorothy, who appears at that time to have been the wife of Edward Worsdale, but afterwards became a widow, and married a second husband, whose name was Prisk. By his will, dated in the year 1805, the testator, after making some specific dispositions of certain parts of his real and personal estate, and giving several annuities and legacies, devised a particular estate which is mentioned in the will to his nephew Thomas Pride for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of Thomas Pride in tail male, with remainder to the nephew Walter Pride for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of Walter Pride; and then the will goes on thus:—"And for default of such issue to the issue of his niece Dorothy for her life, and after her decease to the issue of all and every child and children of the said Dorothy lawfully begotten; and if but one child, then to such only child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever; but if more than one, then unto all such children, their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants; and in default of such issue to the issue of the right heirs of me the said Thomas Webb for ever, and to and for no other use whatsoever." Then there follows the disposition of the residuary estate, which has been already fully read by my learned Brother. By a codicil to this will, dated the 24th of November 1805, the testator merely increased an annuity which he had given by the will, and he died on the 17th of December 1808, leaving the two nephews and the niece above mentioned him surviving. The events which happened were, that Thomas Pride, one of the nephews, died in the year 1824, without having had any issue; that Walter Pride, the other nephew, died in the year 1854, having had a child, Thomas Webb Pride, who died in his lifetime, in the year 1820, without having been married; and that Dorothy Prisk, the niece, died on the 5th of January 1858, having had several children by her first husband, Edward Worsdale; all of whom had died in her lifetime, but two of whom had left children, who were living at the time of her decease. These children, eight in number, the grandchildren of Dorothy Prisk, are the persons whom the Master of the Rolls has declared to be entitled to the testator's residuary estate, and amongst whom he has directed it to be divided. The two appeals before us are, as to one of them, by parties who claim under some of the three children of Peter Gapper, on whose behalf it is considered that the words "and in case all of them, my said nephews and niece, shall happen to die without leaving any issue lawfully begotten," ought to be read "and in case all of them, my said nephews and niece, shall happen to die without leaving any such issue lawfully begotten," that is to say, without leaving any children or child living at their deaths; and that this event having happened, they were entitled to the residue; and as to the other of these appeals by parties claiming under the widow or next-of-kin of the testator, on whose behalf it is contended that the limited construction of the words "without leaving any issue," insisted upon by the other appellants, cannot be maintained, and that there having been issue of Dorothy Prisk living at the time of her decease, the limitation over to the Gappers and their issue could not take effect, and the residuary estate not being otherwise disposed of, belonged to the testator's widow and next-of-kin. On the other hand, the order is supported by the eight grandchildren, in whose favour the Master of the Rolls has decided, and on whose behalf it is contended, that there having been no child of the nephews or of the niece living at their deaths, the dispositions in favour of their children must be construed to extend, and must be applied to their grandchildren, and that the order of the Master of the Rolls ought, therefore, to be maintained. Many authorities were cited in support of each of these conflicting views of the construction of this will; but before referring to the authorities it will be right to examine the words of the will, and to consider what light is thrown upon them by the context, for the rights of these parties must be governed by the intention of the testator, to be collected from the words which he has used; not indeed from a strict observance of the literal force of these words, but from a sound and just interpretation of the meaning to be attached to them. In saying this, I must not be understood to undervalue the weight which is due to authorities. The decisions of the Court regulate the distribution of property out of court, and whatever my individual opinion might be in any particular case, I should think it not only unwise and dangerous, but presumptuous and wrong to act upon it in opposition to any settled rule of construction, or to any established interpretation of any particular expressions or words. It is for convenience only we adopt the course of first examining the words and the context of this will. First, then, as to the residuary disposition. The testator has disposed of the residue thus: he has directed it to be held in trust for such child or children as his two nephews and his niece, Walter, Thomas and Dorothy, should have at the time of their respective deceases, the child or children of each taking one-third; and in case of either of his said nephews and niece dying without leaving any child or children, he has directed such third part to go to the children or child of the other or others leaving children or a child; and in case all of them, his said nephews and niece, should die without leaving any issue, then he has directed the whole residue to go to the three children of Peter Gapper, in equal shares, if all living, or in case of either of them being then dead, to the survivors or survivor, and the issue of such as might be dead, such issue taking per stirpes and not per capita; and he has empowered his trustees to apply the income of his estate for the maintenance and education of the children of his nephews and niece during their minority, and for their future advancement in life. There is nothing, it is to be observed, here given to the nephews or niece, or any of them; and if I rightly understand this will, everything was to rest in contingency during their lives, and it was to depend upon the events which might happen who was to take upon their deaths; the will, as I read it, creating as to the residue, not a series of limitations to take effect in succession, but a series of concurrent contingent limitations. The question, therefore, as I view it, is in whose favour were these concurrent limitations created, and on what events were they to depend? Upon these questions, there can, I think, as to the first part of the limitations, be no reasonable doubt. The limitations are plainly in favour of the children living at the deaths of the nephews and niece, and of such children only; and so strongly is this marked, that we find the testator actually preferring the children of one who may have died leaving children, to the more remote issue of any who may have died leaving only more remote issue. Upon the mere words of this part of the disposition, I can see no reasonable ground for doubt. We come then to the ulterior disposition, "in case all the said nephews and niece shall happen to die without leaving any issue;" and here again, upon the mere words of the will, I see as little room for doubt. The word "issue," of course, in its primary sense, embraces all the issue; and this will seems to me to afford the strongest evidence that it was used in that extended sense. How, otherwise, are we to account for the circumstance that the testator having strictly adhered to the words "children or child" in the earlier part of the disposition, drops these words here, and substitutes for them not the word "issue" only, but the words "any issue," putting the expression as strongly as possible in contrast with that which he has previously used? There is, besides this, further evidence of the sense in which the testator has used the word "issue." The limitations over to the Gappers, in the event of any of them being dead, is expressed to be in favour of their issue, who are to take per stirpes and not per capita. It is plain that the word "issue" is here used in its ordinary sense. No limited construction can be put upon it, and the word being used in its extended sense in one part of the disposition, it is very difficult to suppose that in the other part of the same disposition it could be intended to be used in its more limited sense. The maintenance clause, too, comes in aid of the interpretation of the word "children" as pointing out the objects for whom the testator intended to provide; and upon the whole, therefore, looking at this case upon the mere words of the will, I am perfectly satisfied that upon the true construction of this disposition, the testator meant to give the residue only to the children of the nephews and niece living at their deaths, and meant to give it over to the Gappers and their issue only upon a failure of all the issue of the nephews and niece living at their deaths. I do not of course suppose that he intended in any event to die intestate as to the residue, but I think that the absence of any provision for the issue of the nephews and niece beyond their children living at their death was overlooked and unprovided for. Passing, therefore, from the words of the residuary disposition to the context of the will, the context seems to me to confirm the construction which I have put upon the words; for, in the anterior part of the will, each of the devises to the sons of Thomas and Walter, and what is more remarkable, the devise to the children of Dorothy is followed by a limitation over, not for the default of issue generally, as in the residuary disposition, but for default of such issue, and the testator has thus shewn that where he intended to limit over upon default of children only, he knew how to effect that intention. He has used in the one case the words "in default of such issue," in the other case the words "without leaving any issue;" and we cannot, I think, impute to him the same intention in the one case as in the other. Such, then, being the case as it stands upon the words and context of the will, we have next to consider how it stands upon the authorities. And, first, as to the point argued on the part of the grandchildren, and on which the Master of the Rolls decided in their favour, that according to the true construction of this will, the dispositions of the residue in favour of the children of the nephews and niece extend to their grandchildren and other more remote issue; for, although no mention is made, in the judgment or in the order, of the more remote issue, the principle which extends the limitations to the grandchildren must, as I conceive, extend it also to the more remote issue. I can see no ground on which the limitation, if it extends beyond the children, can be confined to the grandchildren, or on which the great-grandchildren mentioned in the course of the argument can be excluded. In the argument on this part of the case, it was not, and, of course, it could not be denied, that the word "children" in its ordinary interpretation does not include grandchildren or other more remote issue; nor was it denied that if there had been a child of either of the nephews or the niece living at the death of any of them, that child must have taken to the exclusion of any grandchildren or more remote issue; but it has been said that as there was no such child, the grandchildren were entitled to take. This proposition is plainly open to this objection, that it makes the construction to be put upon the words of the will dependent upon the events which may happen after the death of the testator. If there be a child, the word "children" is to receive its ordinary interpretation; if there be no child it is to be construed in a more extended sense. It was said, however, that this proposition was supported by authority, and the case of Gale v. Bennet was mainly relied on in support of it. We have been furnished with a copy of the will on which the question in that case arose, and it is perhaps not immaterial to observe that the survivorship between the children, which in the report of the case is stated to have been in the event of the sons dying under twenty-one, was in the event of their dying under twenty-one without issue. In the event, therefore, of a son dying under twenty-one leaving issue, that issue was to take. There is not, as is noticed in Mr. Ambler's report, any entry of this case in the registrar's book, but in the registrar's minute-book of the 14th of December 1768 there is the following entry:—"Declare that the plaintiffs, the grandchildren of Clara Gale, one of the testator's daughters, are entitled as the children of Clara Gale, within the true intent and meaning of the testator's will, to one-third part of the freehold and copyhold estate in question, and to one-third part of one-fourth of the residue of the testator's personal estate." Then there is "an account of rents and profits of freeholds and copyholds since the death of Hester Martin; and let one-third part of what shall be coming on that account be paid to the plaintiffs in equal shares. Account of personal estate and debts, &c. Declare that the clear residue of the testator's personal estate ought to be divided into four equal parts, and that one-fourth part thereof, which was bequeathed to Hester Martin, is now fallen to the plaintiffs, the defendants the Bennetts, and the defendants the Tunketts, each stock being entitled to one-third of such one-fourth. And executors admitting assets—"How that can well be, I do not understand, as it relates to the residue.—"And executors admitting assets, pay one-third of such one-fourth to the plaintiffs in equal shares." And then there was to be "a partition of freeholds and copyholds, and to allot one-third to the plaintiffs, one-third to the defendant Thomas Bennett, and one-third to the defendants the Tunketts." This entry, no doubt, expresses that the grandchildren were entitled as children, but I think more was meant by this than that the grandchildren were to take under the limitation to the children; and the entry, it is to be observed, does not furnish the ground on which that conclusion was arrived at. On referring, however, to the report of the case, it appears that it stood over in order to examine the case of Wythe v. Blackman, in which the question had been whether, upon the particular will then under consideration, children meant issue; and from this it is only reasonable to conclude that that was the question on which the case of Gale v. Bennet was considered to depend. I think, therefore, that Gale v. Bennet decided no such point as has been contended for on the part of the grandchildren in this case, otherwise than it decided that upon the construction of the will then under consideration children meant issue. It furnishes, therefore, no rule and no authority for the present case, which on this point, as on all other points, must be decided upon the construction of this particular will. And for the reasons which I have already given, I think that upon the construction of this will "children" cannot be held to mean issue. I do not think it necessary to go through the other cases which were cited in this part of the argument, except, indeed, the case of Crooke v. Brooking, as to which, it may be observed, that what is alone pertinent to the present case, the words "that if there had been no child, the grandchildren might have taken by the devise to the children," was a dictum merely, and is certainly not reconcilable with the ordinary rules of construction; unless, indeed, it was meant to express that the grandchildren might have taken if their parent was dead at the date of the will, leaving no child, but only grandchildren; and even in that point of view it would be difficult to reconcile the dictum with the decision in Moor v. Raisbeck, and still more difficult to apply it to the present case, in which the limitation to children is so precise and so often repeated. It is sufficient to observe upon these cases that they fall far short of the case of Gale v. Bennet. I find myself unable, therefore, to agree in the conclusion in favour of the grandchildren at which the Master of the Rolls has arrived in this case, and am of opinion that the order cannot be supported. We come next to the question raised on the part of the appellants, who represent the Gappers, whether the limitations over in case the nephews and niece shall die without leaving any issue can be construed to mean, in case they shall die without leaving any such issue; or, in other words, without leaving any children or child living at their deaths. This construction, of course, involves a material alteration in the language of the testator's will, and wholly alters the effect of it. It destroys the pointed contrast between the words "children or child," and the words "any issue," aided in point of construction as these latter words are by the limitations to the issue of the Gappers; but it was said, that the authorities warrant the construction, and certainly some of the cases have gone to a considerable length in support of it; but, on the other hand, there are many cases in which the construction has not prevailed. Amongst the cases on the point, which are almost innumerable, may be placed, on the one side, Malcolm v. Taylor and Ellicombe v. Gompertz, and on the other, Andree v. Ward and Campbell v. Harding. If the primary limitations be in favour of children, and be so expressed that they take immediate vested interests, and there be a limitation over in default of issue, it is not difficult to see reasons for construing "default of issue" to mean default of children, for if there be no child, there can be no other issue, and if there be a child, the child will take the whole, and there will be nothing to limit over; but where the primary limitation is so expressed, as that there may be issue who may not take under it, as in the case of gifts to children to vest at twenty-one, it is not so easy to see the reasons on which this construction has prevailed. It is true, that by adopting the construction, the limitations of the will are made to follow in regular order and succession, but it is equally true that the general terms in which the limitations over are expressed, prove that there has been some omission or some mistake on the part of the testator; and the difficulty seems to be to determine what the omission or mistake has been—whether it has been in the gift over not having been limited, or in the primary gift not having been extended. I have carefully read the cases which were cited on the point, and many others bearing upon it, in the hope that I might be enabled to extract from them some definite rule as to the cases in which the limited construction ought to be adopted. But the result has been that, upon the examination of all the cases, I have found that each case depends upon the construction of the particular instrument on which the question arises, and that no general rule, therefore, can be laid down. The Master of the Rolls, in deciding against the construction contended for by these appellants, seems to have rested much upon the case of Westwood v. Southey. I think it unnecessary to give, and do not mean to give, any opinion upon that case. It is sufficient to say that, without reference to that case, I think that the construction contended for cannot be supported in the case before us. This appeal must therefore be dismissed; and the case on the part of the grandchildren also failing, I agree with my learned Brother, that our decision must be in favour of the other appellants, who represent the widow and next-of-kin, upon whose appeal an order must be made, discharging the order of the Master of the Rolls, declaring that in the events which have happened there is an intestacy as to the residue, and directing distribution accordingly; but I think the costs of all parties of both appeals must be paid out of the fund, though not, of course, between solicitor and client, unless all parties consent.

Nov. 5. } JOLIFFE v. TWYFORD.

Devise—Incomplete Buildings—Condition to repair—Implied Direction to complete—Forfeiture—Costs.

A testator by his will settled estates and declared that the same should be forfeited and go over in the event of the party entitled for the time being to possession not repairing a column which he was building, but which he left incomplete at his death. Upon a bill for the administration of the testator's estate,—Held, that the party entitled to possession of the estates was not liable to complete the column, and that no contract could be implied to make the testator's residuary estate liable to the expenses of completing it.

Held, though all the questions except those relating to the column and the payment of costs had been settled by agreement between the parties, that the suit remained an administration suit, and that the costs must be paid out of the residuary estate of the testator.

John Twyford Joliffe, of Ammerdown Park, in the county of Somerset, by his will, dated the 15th of March 1854, devised and bequeathed all his estates, both freehold, copyhold and leasehold, in the parishes of Holcombe and Midsomer Norton, in the county of Somerset, to the defendant Samuel Twyford and Edward Lovel, since deceased, (whom he also appointed executors of his will,) their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon such trusts and subject to such powers as would best correspond with those expressed and declared concerning the real estates in the county of Somerset, comprised in a settlement dated the 1st of July 1823; and the testator declared, "That if any person made tenant for life or tenant in tail by purchase of the estates by his will devised or bequeathed, and being at the same time in possession of the estates comprised in the settlement of the 1st of July 1823, should neglect to keep in complete repair the column now being erected in Ammerdown Park aforesaid, to the memory of his late father, or to pay the annual sum of 20*l.* to the trustees for the time being of the parish school at Kilersdon, the person so neglecting should thereupon forfeit all the estates taken by him or her under his will," and the devise next in remainder was to take effect as if the person committing the forfeiture had died at the time of the neglect taking place.

The testator then devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his said trustees, upon trust to get in his personal estate, and out of his personal estate, if sufficient, or by sale or mortgage of the residuary real estate, to pay his debts and legacies, and after satisfaction thereof, to pay the annual income to arise therefrom unto his brother, the plaintiff, the Rev. Robert Thomas Joliffe, for life, with remainder to his issue, with a limitation over in default of any issue of his brother to his sister, the defendant Mary Ann Joliffe, and her issue, with a limitation over in default of any issue of his sister to the defendant Samuel Twyford, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns absolutely.

The testator died on the day he made his will.

By the settlement referred to in the will, the Ammerdown Park estate stood limited to uses, by virtue of which, after the death of the testator, who was tenant for life, the plaintiff became tenant for life, with remainder to his issue in tail, and in default of issue then to similar uses for Mary Ann Joliffe for life, with remainder to her issue, and in default thereof then to uses by which a second cousin of the testator and his issue would become entitled thereto.

Neither the plaintiff nor his sister had ever been married.

In 1852 the testator commenced the erection of the column referred to in his will, from a design and model prepared by an architect. It was proposed to be 180 feet high. The testator, however, entered into no contract for the erection of the column, but the work was done under the superintendence of the architect. The testator paid for the materials supplied and for the work done. At the testator's death the column had reached only half its intended height, but a great part of the stone and other materials necessary for its completion had been purchased by the testator and prepared. These had been paid for either by the testator in his lifetime or by his executors after his decease. The plaintiff after the death of the testator continued the work, and he wrote to the executors, referring to the provisions in the will, requiring the column to be kept in repair, and contended that the testator contemplated the completion of the column at the expense of his estate, either by himself in his lifetime or by his executors after his decease, and stated that he had expended 1,000*l.* upon the building and that 1,000*l.* more would be required to complete it. Mr. Lovel, in reply, stated that, in his opinion, the executors would not be justified, under the terms of the clause in the will, in defraying the cost of completing the column out of the testator's estate. There was a further correspondence, but ultimately, with the consent of S. Twyford, a sum of 2,000*l.*, part of the testator's residuary estate, was paid to the plaintiff towards the completion of the column. This sum, however, proved insufficient, and the plaintiff expended a further sum of 1,200*l.*, and completed the column to the full height.

Mr. Lovel died on the 21st of September 1857.

Mr. Twyford would not allow this further sum to be paid out of the testator's residuary estate.

The plaintiff, therefore, filed this bill. It stated that several questions had arisen as to the proper mode of administering the trusts of the testator's will, and that doubts had been suggested as to the fund from which the cost of completing the column should be defrayed, and prayed that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution, that a new trustee might be appointed, and that all necessary accounts, inquiries and directions might be taken, made and given.

The parties afterwards agreed to appoint Mr. Simpson a new trustee of the will, and, among other things, that the question for the consideration of the Court should be confined, first, to the column and the mode of defraying the expenses of completing it, and secondly, to the costs of the suit, whether they related to the column or otherwise, and by whom and in what manner they ought to be borne and paid.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Eddis, for the plaintiff, insisted that the direction to maintain and repair the column implied an agreement to complete, and consequently that the testator's estate was charged with the expenses incurred in the completion of the column.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Lewin, for Mary Ann Joliffe, supported the same view.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. W. P. Murray, for Samuel Twyford, were not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have no doubt upon the construction of this will in regard to the column. To support the plaintiff's claim, you must find in the words of the will a direction to complete the column, either expressed or implied. It has been argued that the words used involve by necessary implication a direction to complete as well as to keep in repair. That, however, would be a stronger implication than this Court would be justified in making. What they are to keep in repair is "the column then in course of erection." These words are common with respect to tenancies. When a farm is leased to a tenant who covenants to keep the farm in repair under the lease, it does not mean that he is to keep it in complete repair, but it means the repair in which he found it. If he delivers it up in the repair in which he found it, that satisfies the covenant. It is the strongest possible implication to say that to repair a particular thing means that something larger and much more expensive must be made to be kept in repair. If it could be proved that there was no mode of keeping this in repair but by building it 100 feet higher than it stood at the death of the testator, a very different question might have arisen; but it is impossible that any serious evidence on that point could have been given. It is clear that I cannot introduce a direction to complete and keep in repair the column now being erected in Ammerdown Park, for this is a clause of forfeiture, in case that which he left at the time was not kept in complete repair. If the direction to keep in repair involves the completion and keeping in repair, then the direction in the latter part of the clause to pay 20*l.* to the trustees of the parish school must involve the establishment of a school if no school existed in the parish, or the completion of a school if one had been begun but left unfinished by the testator. Two clauses of forfeiture in the same part of the will must bear a similar construction. It is, therefore, impossible to say that there was any obligation on the testator's estate to complete the column, or that the residuary estate was liable for that purpose. On the question of costs, I wish to hear the parties.

Mr. Murray.—The agreement between the parties has put an end to this as an administration suit. Had that not been so, the 2,000*l.* advanced must have been paid into court, as Mr. Twyford had made himself liable for a breach of trust, and this question was still open in the event of there being any issue either of Mr. or Miss Joliffe.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—My impression is, that this is an administration suit which parties have a right to institute if they choose. If it had been established that the column had been the only question, I should have made the costs follow the event. A general administration, however, was asked for; but assuming that no question existed about the column, if the parties thought fit afterwards to say, we do not want a decree for administration of the estate, we will settle those matters among ourselves, but we cannot agree about the costs, and will leave that to the Court; it can only say that they must follow the ordinary rule, and come out of the estate.

Mr. Murray.—The form of the suit could not controul the discretion of the Court. The throwing the costs of the suit upon the estate would in effect be to make Mr. Twyford pay the greater portion.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is a hard case; still I do not see how I can act otherwise. Leave the 2,000*l.* out of the case, how would the matter stand if Mr. Twyford had not paid it, and had kept the plaintiff at arm's length? Had a bill been filed, and without any agreement had the suit been brought on, if the plaintiff had then said, we will waive all the accounts now we have got the question determined, still, the costs would have to come out of the estate. They could not depend upon whether the accounts were taken or waived. The result would still be administration. The costs of the suit, therefore, must be paid in the usual way.

Legacy—Remoteness—Gift to a Class.

In a gift by will to the present and future children of J. L. who should be living at the decease of the testator's wife, a direction that the shares of daughters should be settled upon themselves for life, with remainders to their children, is not void for remoteness as regards the share of a daughter born in the testator's lifetime, the gift not being to a class, but a separate gift in favour of each child.

John Lawrence, by his will, dated the 13th of November 1832, directed his executors to appropriate, out of the public stocks of Great Britain of which he should die possessed, such a part as should be equivalent to the sum of 50,000*l.*, and to stand possessed thereof upon trust, during the life of his wife, to pay to her the interest and dividends; and after her decease to raise thereon certain sums; and subject thereto he declared that the said sum of 50,000*l.* should be in trust for the then present and future children of his brother Isaac Lawrence, who should be living at the decease of his, the testator's, wife, and who being a son or sons should then have attained, or thereafter should attain the age of twenty-one years, or who should then be dead or should thereafter die under that age, leaving issue living at his or their decease, or who being a daughter or daughters should then have attained or thereafter should attain that age, or should have been or should thereafter be married, their respective executors, administrators and assigns, to be divided between them, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common; and if there should be but one such child, then that the whole thereof should be in trust for that one child, his or her executors, administrators or assigns; and he directed that the shares, legacies or sums of money thereinbefore given in favour of such of the children of his said brother as should be a daughter or daughters should not be paid to them, but be held by his executors or trustees, upon trust to lay out and invest the said several sums of money at interest, and during the respective life of each daughter to pay the interest of her respective legacy to her separate use, without power of anticipation; and after the decease of such daughters respectively, he directed that the respective legacies should be held in trust for all and every the child and children of such respective daughters who should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or depart this life under that age, leaving issue living at the time of her or their decease or respective deceases, in equal shares as tenants in common.

The testator died in 1833. Mary Lawrence, one of the daughters of Isaac Lawrence, was living at the death of the testator; and in 1835 she married the defendant W. A. Wilson, and there were children of the marriage. A question having arisen whether the limitations in favour of the children of the daughters of I. Lawrence were not altogether void for remoteness, the present bill was filed, by the children of Mrs. Wilson, praying that those limitations might be declared to be valid.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. W. Morris, for the plaintiffs, cited

Vanderplank v. King, 3 Hare, 1; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 497.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Crouch, for the defendants W. A. Wilson and Mrs. Wilson, contended that the limitations were void for remoteness.

Griffith v. Pownall, 13 Sim. 393.

Mr. G. L. Russell, for the executors.

Wood, V.C.—The will appears to me to contain an absolute gift, in the first instance, to each of the children of I. Lawrence, just as if the testator had said, "I give to each of the children born or to be born of my brother Isaac Lawrence 10,000*l.*, and I direct the share of each such child, being a daughter, to be settled upon her children." I can conceive no reason why, because some of the children may not be in esse at the time of the testator's decease, this direction should not be good in respect of such children as are in esse. The share of each child is separate from the shares of the other children. In Porter v. Fox (1) and that class of cases, the difficulty arose from the gift being to a class of persons some of whom could take and some could not, and the share of each could not be ascertained. But each child here forms a separate class, and the share of each is separate from the shares of the rest. The limitation, therefore, in favour of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson is valid.

Trustees, Appointment of—Transfer of Funds.

If the Bank of England is required to act upon an order made in pursuance of the Trustee Acts, the circumstances bringing the case within the acts must appear upon the order of Court.

A petition was presented, under the Trustee Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, amended by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55, for the appointment of two new trustees, and for the transfer of the trust funds to them. One of the trustees was out of the jurisdiction.

The order was made in July last, but, as drawn up, it did not state that it appeared to the Court that the trustee was resident out of the jurisdiction. There was nothing, therefore, from which it could be collected that the case was within the Trustee Acts. The Bank of England objected to its not appearing on the face of the order, that the case came within the Trustee Acts.

Mr. Prendergast now asked that the order might be varied by stating that it appeared to the Court that the trustee was resident out of the jurisdiction.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS directed that the required recital should be inserted.

Nov. 12, 13. } WALROND v. WALROND.

Baron and Feme—Agreement for Separation—Specific Performance—Voluntary Deed—Illegal Consideration—Appointment of New Trustees.

By an agreement for a separation under seal B. W., in consideration of the agreements therein contained on the part of his wife J. W., covenanted with a trustee to pay for her separate use an annuity, in addition to the income to which she was entitled under her marriage settlement, and also to permit his daughter H. W. to reside with her; and J. W., who was entitled under her marriage settlement to an annuity of 400l. to her separate use, without power of anticipation, covenanted with the same trustee, that so long as B. W. should perform his part of the agreement, she would maintain, &c. H. W., and would not allow B. W. to be sued for her debts. Upon demurrer to a bill filed by J. W. for specific performance of the agreement, and for the appointment of a new trustee,—Held, that such a bill could not be sustained, first, because there was no consideration for the agreement on the part of B. W.; secondly, because the stipulation as to the custody of the daughter was illegal; and, thirdly, because there was no trust property of which a new trustee could be appointed; and that to appoint a new trustee would be in effect to order fresh covenants to be entered into with a new covenantee.

A covenant by a married woman having property settled to her separate use, without power of anticipation, is not a sufficient consideration to support an agreement otherwise voluntary.

This was a demurrer to a bill for specific performance of articles of agreement for a separation between husband and wife.

The plaintiff, Lady Janet St. Clair Walrond, stated by her bill that she intermarried with the defendant Bethell Walrond, in November 1829; that prior to such marriage a settlement was executed, whereby, in consideration of the plaintiff's fortune being 10,000l., an annuity of 400l. was secured to be paid, during the joint lives of herself and her husband, to her or her appointees, without power of anticipation, and in default of appointment to her separate use; and that there was issue living at the time of filing the bill two children, viz. Harriott Walrond, who had attained the age of twenty-one years, and Henry Walrond, still an infant. The bill then stated, that "certain articles of agreement under seal, bearing date the 2nd day of May 1850, were made and entered into between the defendant B. Walrond, of the first part, the plaintiff, of the second part, and George Capron, who is a defendant hereto, of the third part; and thereby, after reciting, amongst other things, that the defendant B. Walrond and the plaintiff had agreed to live separate, * * and that upon the treaty for the said separation, it was contracted and arranged between the said parties thereto, that the defendant B. Walrond and the plaintiff should enter into such agreements as on their respective parts were thereafter contained, it was witnessed, that, in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the agreement and promises on the part of the plaintiff thereafter contained, he, the defendant B. Walrond, did thereby, for himself, his executors and administrators, promise and agree to and with the defendant George Capron, his executors and administrators, that he, the defendant B. Walrond, should and would, yearly and every year, during the joint lives of himself and the plaintiff, well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the plaintiff, or as she should from time to time appoint, an annuity of 250*l.* for her separate use, and without power of anticipation, in addition to the annual sum to which, under the marriage settlement, she might from time to time become entitled : and further, that he, the defendant B. Walrond, should and would from time to time, and at all times during the separation, permit and suffer the said Harriott Walrond to reside with her mother, the plaintiff, and should and would permit and suffer the plaintiff to have the care, controul, management, education, residence and support of the said Harriott Walrond ; and it was further witnessed that, in pursuance of the thereinbefore-recited agreement, and in consideration of the premises, the plaintiff did thereby, for herself, her executors and administrators, promise and agree to and with the defendant George Capron, his executors and administrators, that so long as the said annuity of 250*l.* should continue to be duly and regularly paid, in pursuance of the agreement and promise for that purpose on the part of the defendant B. Walrond, thereinbefore contained, and so long as the defendant B. Walrond, in pursuance of the further agreement and promise on his part also thereinbefore contained, should permit and suffer the said Harriott Walrond to reside with, and be under the care, controul and management of the plaintiff, she, the plaintiff, should and would maintain, provide for, educate and bring up the said Harriott Walrond, without making any demand or request of the defendant B. Walrond for any further allowance as or for the maintenance or education of the said Harriott Walrond ; and, lastly, that so long as the defendant B. Walrond should continue well and truly to pay, or cause to be paid, the said annuity or yearly sum of 250*l.*, on the days and in the manner thereinbefore stipulated and agreed, she, the plaintiff, should not, nor would permit or allow B. Walrond to be called upon or sued for or in respect of any debt or debts which she might contract, either on her own account or on account of the said Harriott Walrond." The bill then stated, that the articles of agreement were duly executed by the defendant B. Walrond and the plaintiff ; that ever since the execution thereof the plaintiff and the defendant B. Walrond had lived separately ; that Harriott Walrond had resided entirely with the plaintiff, and had been entirely maintained and educated at her cost, and that the plaintiff had on her part done and performed all that by the said articles of agreement she promised and agreed to perform and do, and in addition to paying all the expenses of the maintenance and education of Harriott Walrond, had punctually paid and discharged all her own debts ; that the defendant B. Walrond had from time to time, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant Capron, paid various sums of money on account of the annuity ; but there was now a large arrear due to the plaintiff in respect thereof, which the defendant B. Walrond refused to pay ; and that the defendant Capron declined to take any steps for obtaining payment thereof, and also declined further to act as the trustee of the articles of agreement.

The plaintiff prayed that she might be declared entitled to have the articles of agreement specifically performed, and that the defendant B. Walrond might be decreed specifically to perform the same ; that an account might be taken of what was due in respect of the annuity, and that the defendant B. Walrond might be decreed to pay to the defendant Capron, or to some other trustee to be appointed in his stead, what should be found due ; that if necessary a new trustee might be appointed in Capron's place ; and for general relief.

To this bill the defendant Bethell Walrond demurred for want of equity.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Jolliffe, in support of the demurrer, argued that the agreement being purely voluntary no bill to enforce it could be sustained.—

The Court could not appoint a new trustee of such a deed as this, for that would be to order the defendant to enter into fresh covenants with the new trustee; and covenant to allow the daughter to remain in her mother's custody was clearly void—Vansittart v. Vansittart (1).

[WOOD, V.C. referred to Ward v. Audland (2).]

Mr. H. F. Bristowe, in support of the bill.—The articles being under seal no consideration was necessary; but if so, the covenant by the wife was a sufficient consideration, as it would be binding upon the savings of her separate estate; at all events, if not a sufficient consideration to uphold the deed as against creditors, it was valid as against the husband himself.

(3) 10 Ves. 191.

Nov. 13.—WOOD, V.C.—In this case the question on the demurrer is, whether or not, regard being had to the nature of the agreement which has been entered into by the plaintiff and her husband, there being a third party to the agreement, as a trustee, the bill can be sustained, either with respect to the specific relief asked, or with respect to the prayer for general relief. As regards the specific relief asked, I have no hesitation, and no difficulty, in saying that it does not appear to me that any of it can be granted. In the first place, the agreement is a voluntary agreement, being between the defendant, the husband, of the first part, his wife of the second part, and the trustee of the third part, and the only consideration is, not a consideration moving from the trustee in any way, either by way of covenant for indemnity or otherwise, but it is an agreement on the part of the wife, by which she, for herself, her executors and administrators, promises and agrees with the trustee, so long as the annuity shall be paid, that she will perform her covenants therein contained, and maintain Harriott Walrond, one of the issue of the marriage. It is quite plain that any agreement by her, a married woman, was entirely inoperative. The only possibility of suggesting a consideration was that which was urged by Mr. Bristowe, on the footing of the statement in the bill, that there had been a settlement previous to the marriage, by which the wife was entitled to an income for her separate use, but without power of anticipation. Now, although it is perfectly clear that a married woman may deal with respect to her separate property as a feme sole, yet she cannot so deal with respect to property to which she is entitled only without power of anticipation. This difficulty it was attempted to meet by the suggestion that she might hereafter acquire separate property, either by savings out of her existing separate estate or otherwise. But the observation that she might acquire separate property would apply to every feme covert. Every feme covert in the world might acquire separate property, but it would be absurd, on the ground of that possibility, to say that every married woman is therefore able to contract. The deed is plainly without consideration. There is no appearance of any such consideration as that to which I referred in Vansittart v. Vansittart, viz., the abandonment of a right of suit in the ecclesiastical court. That has been recognized in many cases as a consideration sufficient to support a deed of this description. The question in Vansittart v. Vansittart was, whether the wife, in her proper person, inasmuch as she was the person suing in the ecclesiastical court, could not be held to be in a condition in which she could contract with reference to her interests in that suit. Here there is nothing whatever in respect of which the married woman can contract. The case is reduced simply to that of a mere voluntary deed. Then the question is, what relief can the Court give on a voluntary deed of this description upon the statement contained in the bill? If property is vested in a trustee under a voluntary instrument, no doubt the Court will operate on that property against the trustee, and will compel him to perform all the trusts in respect of that property which is vested in him. On the other hand, it will do nothing whatever against the author of the trust. It will take no steps whatever to enforce the completion or perfection of a trust on the part of a person who has entered into a voluntary engagement. Hence the only property that can be reached is such portion as is vested in the trustee. In the present instance, there is no property vested in the trustee at all, there is only a covenant on the part of the husband with that trustee. Therefore, when the bill asks that the articles may be specifically performed, and that an account may be taken by and under the direction of the Court as against the defendant, the covenanting party, and also that, if necessary, a proper person may be appointed as a new trustee of the articles of agreement, there is nothing in any one of those prayers that can possibly be decreed. I cannot operate against the covenanting party by decreeing him specifically to perform the agreement, which is merely voluntary; I cannot order him to account; I cannot substitute a trustee in the only mode in which a trustee can be substituted, which would be by ordering the covenanting party to enter into a new covenant. For the only way in which a new trustee can be appointed is by directing the covenantor to enter into a new covenant, and that, with respect to a voluntary deed, of course, cannot be done. The only difficulty that was suggested to my mind was, with regard to the case of Seagrave v. Seagrave before Sir William Grant. There the question was this:—there was a voluntary deed of a similar character, though different in form (being a bond), to this, with a trustee appointed. The bond was enforceable by that trustee, and the trustee concurred with the obligor in destroying the bond, and by that fraud prevented the lady asserting such legal rights as she might have in a court of law. There Sir William Grant first of all considered—and the Court was obliged to enter into the consideration in giving such limited relief—whether there was a reasonable case for taking the instrument in itself to be valid, so that the plaintiff was only prevented from pursuing her right at law by the fraud of her trustee, and he then considered that the only relief which the Court could give was by directing the trustee to allow his name to be used at law. That is the only relief which can possibly be had, and it is the relief which, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, was given by Sir William Grant. It has also occurred to me that there might be other cases, such as a covenant with a trustee in respect of a wife (freed from any other difficulty arising upon this deed) for the maintenance of the wife and children, which in a mere voluntary instrument would not operate against the covenantor, but the Court might, if necessary, direct that the cestui que trust should be at liberty to use the name of the trustee upon giving an indemnity. However, independently of the alleged consideration of the deed, which I have not yet considered, the allegations in the bill certainly do not bring the case in any degree up to Seagrave v. Seagrave with respect to any fraud or collusion on the part of Mr. Capron, the trustee. The only charges as to Capron are, that the plaintiff has frequently requested him to enforce the payment, but nevertheless he has neglected or declined to take any steps for the payment of the arrears; that he has acted in the trust, and that some other trustee ought to be appointed. It is not alleged that he colludes with the husband, or that an indemnity has ever been offered him in respect of suing. It may be that he declines because he might be directed to pay the costs of the action if such an action were brought. There is nothing, therefore, which in any degree implicates the trustee in any concurrence with the husband, in order that payment by the husband to the wife of this annuity may be avoided; and to say the least of it, before I could, on the prayer for general relief, overrule the demurrer on the ground that at the hearing the Court would direct that the plaintiff should be at liberty to sue, using the name of Capron and giving him proper indemnity, there must be a very different description of charges from those which are contained in this bill. Further than that, it appears to me that a serious difficulty does arise, even on the legal construction of the instrument, as to whether or not the plaintiff could possibly succeed at law. Although the consideration entirely fails because of the incapacity of the plaintiff to contract, yet, at the same time, the moving cause of the grant of the 250*l.* a year is twofold. It is expressed to be, in the first part of the articles, that they had agreed to live separate and apart, that it was agreed that the defendant and the plaintiff should enter into the agreement after mentioned, and then it says, it is witnessed in pursuance of that agreement, and in consideration of the agreement and promise on the part of the plaintiff thereafter contained, he, the defendant, enters into a covenant with the trustee for the payment of the annuity. Therefore, the moving cause for the payment of the annuity is the agreement, afterwards mentioned, on the part of the wife. There is a further declaration in the deed that Harriott Walrond, whom I must now take to have been an infant at that time, shall be permitted by the husband to reside with her mother, and that the defendant shall also permit the mother to have the care, controul, management, education, residence; and support of the infant child. The mother, then promises for herself that so long as the annuity shall continue to be duly paid, and so long as the defendant shall also, in pursuance of his further agreement in that behalf, allow the infant to reside and remain with her, she will provide for, educate and bring up the infant, without making any demand on the husband for such maintenance and education. The consideration for the contract is a compound consideration, no doubt, because it is to extend during the life of the wife, which, of course, might extend beyond the infancy of the child; but the whole scheme of the contract, the whole consideration, is the taking by the wife of the child to reside with her, the removing of the child from the controul of the father, and the sole and exclusive superintendence of the management and education of that child. That has been considered, both in the case of Vansittart v. Vansittart and in the previous case of Hope v. Hope (4), to be such a contract as is void as being contrary to the policy of the law. Although the lady herself is incapable of entering into a contract binding on herself,—and, therefore, the instrument became, as against the husband, voluntary,—yet, on the other hand, it is plain that the whole motive and origin of the grant of 250*l.* per year is, amongst other things, the taking of this child away from the paternal controul for maintenance and support by the wife instead of the husband. It has been argued, however, that the child has grown up, has been educated, and has been maintained, and, therefore, that part of the consideration is dispensed with. I apprehend that the Court cannot so split the consideration as to say that where, in consideration of two things, such as the payment of a sum of money, and an unlawful contract, an annuity is agreed to be paid, and the unlawful contract is determined by subsequent events, the consideration should in some manner or other be split, and apportioned, in order that you may say, “either in whole or in part, I am now entitled to the provision which has here been made.” I apprehend that where the trustee is to sue at law, the whole deed must be before the Court; and it appears to me, I confess, on the whole, that there would be very great improbability of the trustee succeeding in a contest of this description. The only averment, in truth, that I have in the bill is, that he has refused to sue. There is no averment that he has been offered any indemnity, and there is no difficulty alleged to be in the way of the plaintiff as to using his name. In point of truth, I believe there is no difficulty in her using the name, if the lady should be so advised. I have taken an opportunity of inquiring into it, and I have every reason to believe that she will experience no difficulty in that respect. But, without saying whether that is so or not, I apprehend that on this bill every portion of the specific relief must fail. The only relief that could possibly be granted would be under the prayer for general relief: upon that it might be said, I could give her leave to bring this action upon indemnifying the trustee. But I find that the prayer for general relief is unsupported by any allegation which could authorize me to interfere in that respect. Manifestly, the relief asked by the bill is such as cannot be obtained. The only relief ultimately will be, the bringing of that action, which she can bring just as well without the interference of the Court as with it, and, therefore, I am justified in saying that the right course is to allow the demurrer.

Mr. Bristowe.—The demurrer will be allowed without costs—Vansittart v. Vansittart.

Wood, V.C.—I allowed the demurrer there without costs because it was clear upon the face of the bill that a suit had been pending in the ecclesiastical court, and that a compromise had been come to. Here, were I to allow the demurrer without costs, I should be inducing the parties to go into evidence instead of stopping the whole case upon demurrer; a course which would not, I think, be for the benefit of the plaintiff. The demurrer must be allowed, with costs.

DAVIES V. DAVIES.

Power of Appointment, Execution of—General Devise.

*A father, on his son's marriage, conveyed a certain farm to the use of himself and his wife successively for life, with remainder to the children of the son. A power was reserved to the father by deed or will to charge all or part of the hereditaments thereby settled, with any sum or sums not exceeding 500*l.*, for the portions of his younger children, and to create a term for securing the same. The father, by his will, devised the said farm to his son in fee, charged with the payment of legacies of 200*l.*, 200*l.* and 100*l.* to the testator's three daughters respectively. The will contained no reference to the settlement, and no limitation of any term, nor did the father otherwise exercise the power:—Held, that the will operated as an execution of the power of appointment, of which the father was donee under the settlement.*

By indenture of settlement, dated in April 1835, made on the marriage of John Davies, Peter Davies, the father of the said John Davies, conveyed a certain farm therein described as Glyn Ucha, together with other lands and hereditaments, to the use of himself (Peter Davies) for life, with remainder to his wife for life, with remainder to the children of the said John Davies, as he, the said John Davies, should appoint, with remainder in default of appointment to such children equally; and it was thereby declared, that it should be lawful for the said Peter Davies, by any deed or deeds, "or by his last will and testament, or any codicil or codicils thereto, to subject and charge all or any part of the hereditaments and premises thereby granted and released, with the payment of any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of 500*l.*, for the portion of all or any one or more of the younger children of the said Peter Davies," as therein mentioned. And the indenture provided that, for the purpose of raising such portion and portions, it should be lawful for the said Peter Davies, by deed, or by his last will and testament, or any codicil or codicils thereto, to limit and appoint all or any part of the said hereditaments and premises which should be so charged as thereinbefore mentioned, to any person or persons, for any term or terms of years, by way of mortgage, to raise the money so to be charged.

Peter Davies, by his will, dated June 1846, devised the said farm and lands of Glyn Ucha to his son, the said John Davies, in fee, subject, nevertheless, to and charged and chargeable with payment of the legacies of 200*l.* thereafter bequeathed to his daughter Eliza Williams, also the sum of 200*l.* thereafter bequeathed to his daughter Anne Williams, and likewise the sum of 100*l.* thereafter bequeathed to his daughter Catherine Davies; and in a subsequent part of his will he bequeathed the same legacies to his said daughters respectively.

The will contained no reference to the settlement, and no limitation of any term of years, nor did Peter Davies otherwise exercise the power limited to him in the above-mentioned indenture of settlement.

Peter Davies died in 1846, and the said John Davies subsequently paid the said legacies, amounting to 500*l.*, to the respective legatees.

The bill in this cause was filed by the said John Davies, praying that the sum of 500*l.* which he had so paid might be raised by sale or mortgage of part of the hereditaments comprised in his said marriage settlement, and that the same when raised might be paid to him.

Mr. Elmsley and Mr. Currey, for the plaintiff. — The power being limited in its operation to a particular class, the provision in the Wills Act, 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 27, that a general devise or bequest shall operate as an execution of a general power, had no application to the present case. The case, therefore, remained subject to the old law. The will of Peter Davies, though it contained no express reference to the power of which he was donee under his son's marriage settlement, must nevertheless be considered as an execution of that power. The devise of the estate subject to the power failed; and unless the charge by the will of 500*l.* upon the estate were regarded as an execution of the power, the will would fail altogether, the testator not having any other interest in the estate devised upon which the will could operate.—

Curtis v. Kenrick, 9 Sim. 443.

Shelford v. Acland, 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 144.

Mr. Freeman and Mr. C. Barber, for the defendant, contended that the will was not an execution of the power. No reference was made by it to the power, nor did it create any term of years in the estate in settlement in order to raise the sums forming the subject of the power—Jones v. Tucker (1), Hope v. Hope (2).

STUART, V.C. held, that the case was governed by that of Bennett v. Aburrow, and made a declaration that the sums of 200*l.*, 200*l.* and 100*l.* were well charged by the will upon the hereditaments comprised in the settlement.

Judgment—Determinable Lien.

If a mortgagor sells the mortgaged estate, and pays off the mortgagee, the estate in the hands of the purchaser ceases to be affected by a judgment which had been registered against the mortgagee.

The bill in this case was filed for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a public-house called "The John Bull," which the plaintiff had purchased at public auction. The decree made on the hearing was, that, the plaintiff waiving all objections of title to the premises, except the concurrence of Edward Sexton, Percy Calvert and William Henry Calvert (who were mortgagees of the property), their executors, administrators and assigns, in the assignment of the lease and premises, declare the plaintiff entitled to a specific performance of the contract (1).

(1) Greaves v. Wilson, 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 546.

A draft assignment was forwarded to the defendant's solicitors, and Messrs. Calvert were made parties to the proposed deed. It was, however, ascertained that there was a judgment for 69,000*l.* registered against Messrs. Calvert; the plaintiff therefore required the defendant either to satisfy the judgment, or to give up possession of the premises upon the purchase-money being deposited in the hands of third parties at interest. This was objected to by the defendant, and the conveyance was not completed. The plaintiff then gave notice of motion, asking that the plaintiff might be at liberty to pay the sum of 1,358*l.*, the balance of the purchase-money, into court; and that he might be let into possession of the premises.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Kay, in support of the motion.—The estate was to be conveyed to the purchaser free from the mortgage of Messrs. Calvert, who, as mortgagees, claimed a sum of 1,595*l.* 2*s.*; there were, however, judgments against Messrs. Calvert for 69,000*l.*, and as these, by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 13, affected their charge upon the premises, they were an obstacle in the way of completing the purchase, and must be removed—Harris v. Davison (2).

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Smythe, for the defendant.—The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 13. made a judgment a charge upon all the lands of the debtor, and when registered under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11. it was assumed that the charge extended to the land of other parties upon which the judgment debtor had a mortgage. The owners of mortgaged lands, however, were at full liberty to sell their estates; and payment of the mortgage discharged the lands from being taken in execution under any judgment against the mortgagee.—

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — This motion is founded upon a misapprehension. Messrs. Calvert have not become bankrupts. When a mortgagee is paid off, after the passing of the 18 Vict. c. 15. s. 11, the effect of it is to make every conveyance of land determine the right of the judgment creditors, and that whether the mortgage was prior to the act or not: the judgment creditors of the mortgagee, therefore, cannot pursue the lands in the hands of a bona fide purchaser; and the judgments against Messrs. Calvert cannot affect the premises in the hands of the purchaser. The motion must be dismissed, with costs.

Legacy—Children—Advances in Satisfaction.

A testator, by his will, made an equal division of his real and personal estate among his children; in the course of fifteen years afterwards he made advances of large sums to some of his daughters on their marriage, and to some of his sons on establishing them in business: to others of his sons and daughters he gave trifling sums only:—Held, that the small sums were intended as free gifts, but that the larger sums being for permanent advancements, were in part satisfaction of the benefits given to them by the will.

If a presumption arises that payments by a testator to his children were made in satisfaction of legacies they would become entitled to under his will, it is not rebutted by their believing such payments to have been gifts, when the belief is unsupported by any testimony of the intention of the testator.

John Heap, by his will, dated the 4th of December 1840, gave and devised all his real estate whatsoever and wheresoever in the county of York, and also all and singular his money, securities for money, book debts, household goods and furniture, stock in trade, goods, cattle, chattels, personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, unto his eight children, Jonathan, Ruth, Edward, Sarah, John, Agnes, Mark and Frederick, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike. And in case any of his said children should happen to die under the age of twenty-one years, or before they should become entitled to the possession or receipt of their respective shares of the hereditaments and premises and personal estate thereinbefore given, devised and bequeathed to them, leaving lawful issue him or her surviving, then he gave, devised and bequeathed the share of him or her so dying of and in the said real and personal estate unto the lawful issue of him or her so dying, if more than one, to hold to them, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. But if any of such children so dying should not leave lawful issue him or her surviving, then he gave, devised and bequeathed the share or shares of him, her or them so dying of and in the said real and personal estate unto the survivors of his said children, and the issue of such as might be dead leaving children, such last-mentioned children only taking the share his, her or their respective parent would have been entitled to had he or she been living.

The testator died on the 3rd of February 1855.

The testator's daughter Ruth died on the 21st of February 1852, and this suit was instituted by John Schofield, her husband, on behalf of his six children, against the five sons of the testator, one of whom, "John," was of unsound mind, and the other four of whom had taken out letters of administration, with the will annexed, to the estate and effects of the testator. The bill charged that the testator had both before and after the date of his will, made large payments to or for the benefit of his said children, or some of them, other than Ruth Schofield, the mother of the plaintiffs, and that such payments were of the nature of advances, and ought to be accounted for as part of their respective shares of his real and personal estate: it then prayed for the administration of the personal estate, and that such advances might be taken into account as part of their respective shares of the real and personal estate.

The defendants Jonathan, Edward, Mark and Frederick Heap, by their answer, stated, that during the fourteen years which had elapsed between the making the testator's will and his death, the testator, as they believed, had occasionally given money to his said children, or some of them respectively, by way of spontaneous favour and kindness and free gift, but not by way of portion or advancement, or in contemplated diminution of any benefit which such children or child might otherwise be entitled to under the provisions of his will; and that in the third schedule thereto they had set forth the several sums so by way of spontaneous favour and kindness and free gift given or advanced by the testator for the benefit of any of his said children, and the times of such gifts: and that they had found no entry or memorandum of the fact, amount or particulars of any such pecuniary gift among the books, papers or writings of the testator which had come to their hands as administrators of the testator, save the particulars of four several sums of 525*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, 114*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, 53*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, and 2*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, and which were expressly referred to in the said third schedule: and that such pecuniary gifts were never treated by the testator, or by his said children, or any of them, or intended to be treated or looked upon by the child or children receiving such gifts respectively, as matters of debt or account either as between the testator and such child or children, or as between them and the others of such children.

The third schedule was as follows:—To his daughter Sarah Robinson, on and after her marriage, 600*l.*: To his daughter Agnes Stead, on her marriage, 300*l.*, and various sums since that time, making altogether 580*l.*: To his son Jonathan, at various times small sums amounting (as estimated) to a sum not exceeding 50*l.*: To his sons Mark and Frederick, in 1850 or 1851, on their commencing business together as clothiers, after their dissolution of partnership with the testator, 1,000*l.*: To his sons Mark and Frederick, whilst in business on their own account between 1850 and 1853, various other amounts in money, goods, and in the use of his horses and carts for journeys, amounting altogether to 525*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* (particulars of which were to be found in the testator's private memorandum books), "but defendants stated, it was always considered that the last-mentioned amount was advanced and allowed to the testator's sons to assist them in commencing business, as he had always promised to do, and in satisfaction of their share of the stock and effects in their previous partnership with the testator, they not having received any part or share of such stock and effects in 1850, upon such dissolution."

To his son Mark Heap various amounts in money and goods at different times between 1850 and 1853, not exceeding 200*l.*, particulars of part whereof, amounting to 114*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, were to be found in the testator's private memorandum books.

To his son Frederick various amounts in money and goods between 1850 and 1855, not exceeding 100*l.*, particulars of parts whereof, amounting to 53*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, were to be found in the testator's private memorandum books.

To his son Edward, to pay for wool, 52*l.*, and sundry items appearing in memorandum books against his said son, amounting to 2*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, making altogether 54*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*

On the 29th of July 1856, a decree was made in the cause, directing, amongst other things, an inquiry as to any sums paid by the testator after the date of his will to or for the use of any of his children, and the circumstances under which such payments were made, and whether the same were intended by him to be portions or advancements in life of such children respectively.

The chief clerk found that the several sums mentioned in the schedule to the answer of the defendants were paid by the testator for the benefit of the respective children therein named, under the circumstances therein stated, and that they were not intended by the testator to be portions or advancements in life of any of the said children.

Mr. Bagshawe, sen. and Mr. Bagshawe, jun., for the plaintiffs.—The sums received by the testator's sons and daughters were portions given for their permanent advancement; such was the nature of a marriage portion, and also of sums given to promote or further the sons in business. The testator's accounts, though confused, were sufficient evidence of such an intention. The advances, therefore, must be adjusted and taken in satisfaction of their shares under the will.

Ferris v. Goodburn, 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 574.

Lady Thynne v. the Earl of Glengall, 2 H.L. Cas. 131.

Mr. J. Hamilton Humphreys, for John Heap.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Shee, for the defendants.—The advances made by the testator were free gifts, of which no account could be required. The intention of the testator was apparent from his will, which substituted children for their parents if they died before receiving their shares. Jonathan Heap had received 50*l.* only; his testimony with respect to these payments being gifts was therefore disinterested. It required but trifling circumstances to rebut a presumption of these payments being advances. As to the testator's accounts, it was impossible to collect from them any specific intention.

Nov. 20.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The evidence in this case amounts to nothing more than this: that the persons who received the several sums of money believed that they were bestowed upon them voluntarily, and by way of gift. The presumption, however, which arises is, that the sums of money were paid to the parties, who were the testator's children, in satisfaction of the provision made for them by the will; but this does not apply to the small sums given by the testator from time to time; they evidently must be considered as gifts, and it has not been contended that they were advancements. The evidence on which I am asked to act does not rebut the presumption which has arisen with respect to the larger sums; they were given to daughters on marriage and to sons upon their being established in business, and they must be considered as having been paid towards the satisfaction of what the children were entitled to under the will. I have not proceeded upon the authority of Ferris v. Goodburn, but upon the presumption usually made in cases of advancement which can alone be rebutted by evidence; there is, however, nothing but the statements of the parties who received the benefits. They had full liberty to bring forward such evidence as they thought fit, and there is no ground for allowing the inquiry to be kept open. I must, therefore, declare that the 600*l.* and 300*l.* given to the daughters Sarah and Agnes, and the 1,000*l.* given to the sons Mark and Frederick, must be taken as advancements made in part satisfaction of their shares in the estate of the testator.

LORDS JUSTICES. } SUSSEX RAILWAY COM-
Dec. 3, 8. } PANY.

Railway Company—Compulsory Power of purchasing Land—Taking of Soil—"Making and maintaining"—"Necessary for such Purposes."

A railway company had compulsory powers to purchase soil for their works, and to purchase such of the lands delineated in the plans, and within the limits of deviation indicated in the plans and books of reference, and to enter upon, take and use such of the said lands as should be necessary for such purposes. They entered upon a small piece of land belonging to A. B., situate within the limits of deviation, and made a contract with him for the purchase of the soil found thereon for the purpose of making an embankment, forming part of the railway works situate at some distance from the other lands of A. B. After this the company determined on the purchase of this small piece of land in fee simple, and gave the required notices for the assessment of its value. It appeared that the company did not want the small piece of land for any other purpose than that of taking the soil for the embankment. On a bill filed by A. B., one of the Vice Chancellors granted an injunction to restrain the company from taking the piece of land; and on appeal (the motion being turned into a motion for a decree),—Held, that the fee simple of the land was not necessary for the making and maintaining the railway within the meaning of the parliamentary powers of the company, but that the soil alone being wanted, which they might purchase elsewhere under their powers, the injunction must be made perpetual.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, that the defendants, the Mid-Sussex Railway Company, their servants, agents and workmen, might be restrained by the order and injunction of the Court from further proceeding under, or in pursuance of, a notice dated the 27th of September 1858, which had been served upon the plaintiff by the defendants, and from taking any steps to procure the assessment of the purchase-money of the piece of land comprised in such notice, and to carry into effect the compulsory purchase thereof under the powers alleged by the defendants in such notice to have been conferred upon them by their act of parliament.

The facts of the case were the following :—The piece of land referred to in the above-mentioned notice, and which the defendants therein proposed to take under the powers of their act, was within the limits of deviation allowed by the company's act, and belonged to the plaintiff, a farmer, and the owner of a considerable quantity of freehold land in the parish of Horsham. The defendants' line of railway, so far as it abutted upon and passed through the plaintiff's property, was nearly completed, they having already purchased of the plaintiff so much of his land as was necessary for the site of the railway. The land comprised in the notice had, by arrangement with the plaintiff, been previously entered upon by the defendants for the purpose of excavating therefrom soil to a certain depth, to construct the embankment of their railway at a point about half a mile from the land in question. Finding, however, that, unless they were allowed to excavate to a greater depth, they would be unable to obtain from this piece of land sufficient soil for their purposes, the defendants entered into a contract with Mr. Thorpe, the owner of land adjoining to the piece of land in dispute, to convey to him the parcel of land described in the notice after they should have purchased it under the powers given to them by their act, in consideration of his allowing them to excavate the quantity of soil they should require for their embankment from a field belonging to him.

The plaintiff's bill alleged that, under these circumstances, the notice to treat for the purchase of the said piece of land which had been served upon them was not a bond fide exercise of the powers vested in the defendants by their act of parliament, and that the said parcel of land was not required by them for the purposes of their railway within the meaning of the said act, but was required by them merely for the purpose of enabling the company to carry into effect their agreement with Mr. Thorpe.

The prayer of the bill was in the terms of the notice of motion.

The company's act of parliament, 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxxxiii., incorporated with itself the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, and, by the 24th section, after reciting that the plans and sections of the intended line of railway, and of the lands through which it was to pass, had been duly deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county of Sussex, it was enacted that, "subject to the provisions in this act and the said incorporated acts contained, and to the powers of deviation given by the said acts, it should be lawful for the said company to make and maintain the said railway and works on the line and upon the lands delineated in the plans and described in the book of reference, and according to the levels shewn in the said plans and sections, and to enter upon, take and use such of the said lands as should be necessary for such purposes."

The plaintiff moved for an injunction according to the terms of the prayer of his bill, before Stuart, V.C.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Eddis appeared for the plaintiff, citing—

Stamps v. the Birmingham and Stour Valley Railway Company, 2 Phill. 673; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 431.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Waller, for the defendants.

STUART, V.C. made an order in the terms of the notice of motion.

The company appealed, and by arrangement between the parties and leave of the Court, the motion was turned into a motion for a decree.

Some part of the evidence is referred to in the judgment.

The same counsel appeared on the appeal as on the motion in the court below.

Dec. 8.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that the question which was then under appeal before the Court arose upon a motion for an injunction in this case, which, however, by the consent of both parties, had been converted into a hearing of the cause upon the plaintiff's motion for a decree; and it referred to the right of the defendants, the Mid-Sussex Railway Company, to acquire by purchase from the plaintiff the fee-simple of a very small piece of land near Horsham, which was in itself of very little value to either party, but which, from its having been made the subject of this dispute, had acquired an apparent importance. The question was, whether the land was "necessary" for the purposes of the defendants' railway? If it was, their contention was right; but if it was not, they were wrong. It appeared to be conceded that they had no use for the land, strictly speaking; but that all they required it for was, for the purpose of taking the loam or soil, of converting it into a movable chattel for making or repairing an embankment on their line; which embankment, however, was not upon the land in dispute itself, but elsewhere and at some distance from it. He (Lord Justice Knight Bruce) had come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances, the defendants were entitled to buy the soil at a price which might be determined in the manner pointed out by the act of parliament; but this did not authorize them compulsorily to purchase the fee simple. In these circumstances, therefore, the plaintiff was justified in resisting the pretensions of the defendants; and he had done so, to say the least, with as good reason as the defendants could desire. The injunction granted by his Honour would, therefore, be continued; and as to the costs of the suit, his Lordship said that he was unable to convince himself that they ought justly to be refused to the plaintiff.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER stated the facts, and observed that the piece of land in question was, no doubt, within the limits of deviation allowed by the company's act of parliament; but still he thought that it was not required or necessary for making the railway itself, or for any purpose connected with that object. The sides of the embankment, for which it was said that the soil constituting the plaintiff's land was necessary, did not reach to the land; and besides this, as the line of railway had been actually laid down already, how could it be maintained that the land would be wanted for any deviation? By the 24th section of the company's act, it was enacted, "That subject to the provisions in this act and the said incorporated acts contained, and to the powers of deviation given by the said acts, it should be lawful for the said company to make and maintain the said railway and works on the line and upon the lands delineated in the plans and described in the book of reference, and according to the levels shewn in the said plans and sections; and to enter upon, take and use such of the said lands as should be necessary for such purposes."

The act, then, did not empower the company to take all the lands, but "such as should be necessary for such purposes"—that is, for making and maintaining the line. It occurred to his Lordship during the argument—and the point had been taken up by counsel—that the expression "necessary" might mean necessary in the judgment of the railway company. No doubt that was so to a certain extent; for any deviation in the line must be left to the judgment of the company, and to that extent the word must have the construction contended for; but it did not follow that it should have the same construction in all cases, and his Lordship was of opinion that it ought not to do so. If it were otherwise, the company would be entitled to take all the lands mentioned in their plans, which the act clearly did not contemplate. And he was the more satisfied that this was the right view, because it was well established that such acts as the present ought to be construed strictly with regard to the rights of the company. The question therefore was, whether this land was necessary for making or maintaining the railway, not in the judgment of the company, but in the judgment of the Court, on the result of the evidence which had been given before it. It was to be observed that the words were not "to make," but "to make and maintain,"—words which pointed to permanent not temporary usage. He (the Lord Justice) was of opinion that this land was not necessary for "making and maintaining" the line. No witness had gone so far as to say that it was, except the sub-contractor, who, in his first affidavit, merely said that it was "of great importance," but in his second affidavit he went further, and said that it was the cheapest and most convenient land, "and, in fact, necessary" for the company to possess. His Lordship was at a loss to see how it could be necessary; the defendants only wanted the soil, and they had full power to take that under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, without purchasing the freehold. He did not mean to say that a piece of land was in no case necessary to a railway company unless their line passed over it, but in this case it was clear that the defendants only wished to sell the land to another person, Mr. Thorpe, so as to make a new and more advantageous contract with him for the soil. The injunction was therefore most properly granted by the Vice Chancellor, and must be made perpetual. As to the costs, his Lordship was not at all satisfied with the conduct of the company. They suggested at first that they wanted the land for "an extraordinary purpose," in order to bring the case within the powers of the act. But this was not their real object. They wanted no station there. Their real purpose was to re-sell the land to Mr. Thorpe, and there was great reason to believe that their motive all along was to rid themselves of the contract with the plaintiff (a disadvantageous one certainly) for buying the soil at 8*d.* a yard. Looking at their affidavits, and at the whole nature of the case, he was of opinion that all the costs of the suit, including the costs of both motions, must be borne by the railway company. The injunction must be made perpetual.

Devise—Words introduced.

A testator, in 1834, devised a certain sum of money to be secured so as to raise an annuity of 2,000l. for his wife, "and on her decease the sum set apart for such payment to become the property of my son, G. C, so far as he shall receive the interest on the said sum during his life, and on his demise the principal to become the property of any child or children he may leave born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as my said son shall will and direct; but in case of my son dying before his mother, then and in that case the principal sum to be divided between the children of my daughters." This son married and had a son during the life of the testator, and died before the testator:—Held, (affirming the decree of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale dissentientibus) that this son was entitled to the fund, for that the whole context of the will required that "dying before his mother" must be read "dying without issue before his mother."

Two appeals were presented, each set of appellants having the same interest. No costs were given.

This was an appeal against a decree of the Master of the Rolls.

The facts of the case and the terms of the will, the subject of discussion, have already been given in the report of the case below (1). The testator, by his will, dated the 7th of March 1834, had directed certain property to be so secured as to raise an annuity of 2,000l., which he gave to his wife, Hester Carpenter, for life, "and on her decease the sums set apart for such payment to become the property of my son George Carpenter, now Captain in His Majesty's 41st Regiment of Foot, so far as he shall receive the interest on the said sum during his life, and on his demise the principal sum to become the property of any child or children he may leave born in lawful wedlock, and in such sums as my said son shall will and direct; but in case of my son dying before his mother, then and in that case the principal sum to be divided between the children of my daughters." The son George was at that time unmarried, but married a few months after the date of the will and had a son. Having arrived at the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, he commanded his regiment on the 5th of November 1854 at the Battle of Inkermann, and was there killed. The testator died in January 1855, and his wife some time after him. G. W. Carpenter, the grandson and heir-at-law of the testator, was at the time of his father's death about eighteen years of age; he claimed the property under the bequest in the first part of the will. It was contended, on behalf of the children of the sisters, that the testator's son George having died before his mother, the bequest to him became void, and the property went over to the children of the daughters. A suit was instituted by the trustees under the marriage settlement of one of these children to have the trusts of the will declared. The Master of the Rolls held, that the words "without leaving a child" ought to be introduced after the word "dying," and that the grandson of the testator was entitled to the fund. This was an appeal against that decree.

The Attorney General and Mr. R. Palmer (with whom were Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Goldsmid and Mr. L. Bird), for the appellants, contended that the plain literal meaning of the words in this will must be adhered to, and that there was no authority which would justify the introduction of the words "without leaving a child" into the will. Baker v. Tucker, 3 H.L. Cas. 106.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD CHELMSFORD) said, it was impossible to entertain doubt as to the testator's real intention, but his judgment here would proceed, not on any conjectural matter of that kind, but on the words of the will itself. He entirely agreed with the rule of construction stated in Grey v. Pearson, but that rule was only applicable when the language of the will was clear and unambiguous. In cases where that was not so, Courts of construction had a right to introduce words in case of necessity, as stated by Lord St. Leonards in the passage cited from Eden v. Wilson, though, of course, that right was to be cautiously exercised. This was a case in which the intention was so clear that there could be no doubt as to the propriety of exercising it. This was not like a gift to A, and if he should go to Rome, then over, for such an event was wholly collateral to the previous limitations. There was a safe and reasonable principle of construction stated by Lord Brougham in Home v. Pillans, that where there was a clear gift, it could only be retracted by plain and unambiguous words. There was no necessity to overrule the case of Holmes v. Cradock, because that was one of a class of cases in which an interest was to take effect upon an event which never happened, and as it seemed to him, those cases were all inapplicable to the present. The authority to supply words which would make the whole will intelligible and consistent was stated in a large number of cases. The first was that of Spalding v. Spalding, which was adopted in King v. Melling, Kentish v. Newman (3), Hewet v. Ireland and Doe v. Micklem. The case of Targus v. Puget (4), which was a case on the construction of marriage articles, was a strong authority on the same point. Here, too, the event on which the gift over depended was one which affected the father's life interest only, and did not touch the estate of his children. It appeared to him, therefore, that without going out of the will, but on the contrary from an exact adherence to its obvious intention, the respondent must be held to have taken a vested interest in the capital fund set apart for the benefit of the testator's widow during her life, and that the decree of the Master of the Rolls must be affirmed.

He ought to add, that Lord Brougham, who heard this case argued at the time of the argument, entertained the same opinion which he, the Lord Chancellor, had now expressed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The rule had been very distinctly expressed in the case of Eden v. Wilson, that you were not unnecessarily to introduce or interpolate words into a will, but you might do so where the plain and obvious intention of the will absolutely required it. Was such a plain and obvious intention to be found in this will? He thought there was not. Every will must be in writing, and, as a necessary consequence, the meaning must be discovered from the writing itself, aided only by such extrinsic evidence as was necessary in order to enable the Court to understand what the testator meant. None was necessary here. The intention that, unless the son survived his mother, the son's children living at his death should take no part of the money set aside to secure the annuity, could not have been more aptly expressed than by the words here used, and the House was not, therefore, at liberty to depart from those words, and to assume that the testator had an intention the opposite of what he had expressed. If the language admitted of two constructions, a Court might reasonably adopt that which would avoid anomalies and contradictions in the construction of the will; but here there was but one construction to be put upon the words used. There had been cases put in argument to shew that a man might have good reason for introducing such a clause into his will, and that being so a Court must be guided by the words used, and must not presume that such a reason did or did not exist. The gift over, by having put upon it the construction which seemed to him the proper one, would not, as had been argued, deprive the widow of the fund in the event of the son dying in her lifetime, for the will was express that the fund was to go over on her decease, which meant not before her decease. The will might be read as if the testator had said, "I give the fund to my son, but if he dies before my wife then I give it over, and I direct that my son's children shall not take what I have given him absolutely, but that it shall be considered as settled on him for life, and afterwards on any children he may have," and this seemed the fair interpretation of the words which had been used. He had, therefore, come to the conclusion that there was nothing to shew that the words in question were to be construed otherwise than according to their obvious meaning, and that there was nothing on the face of the will to shew that the gift over was only to take effect if the son should have no issue. He had carefully examined all the cases, but the difference of the words in each will was such as to afford little aid in construing any other. The cases of Malcolm v. Taylor and Ellicombe v. Gompertz, which were discussed by Vice Chancellor Wigram in Hillersdon v. Lowe, were cases of what had been called referential construction, and did not apply to a case like the present. Again, in Spalding v. Spalding, the construction was necessary, for on no other than that which had been given could all the provisions of the will have been carried into effect. That was again the case in Home v. Pillans, and all the cases of that class were very ably disposed of by the Master of the Rolls in Edwards v. Edwards. The cases on the construction of marriage articles could afford no guide in construing a will, where the intention of the testator was the chief matter to be considered; whereas, in marriage articles, the Court had always treated a provision for the children as the chief object in view. None of the cases cited appeared to him to render any material assistance in deciding this case, and, therefore, on the short ground that there was no doubt as to the meaning of the words used, considered by themselves, and that there was nothing on the face of the will to point to any other than their ordinary meaning, he was of opinion that the decree of the Court below ought to be reversed.

LORD ST. LEONARDS meant in his construction of this will to abide by the strict rules of law applicable to a case of this kind. He adhered to what he had stated in Eden v. Wilson: they were not at liberty to transpose, add or alter without absolute necessity. The intention to be found on the face of the will could alone justify anything of that kind. To ascertain that, they might place themselves in the situation in which the testator stood. The intention was to be gathered from the whole of the instrument. What was the intention as shewn on the whole of this will? an intention not to be ascertained by conjecture, but by the obvious meaning of the whole context. The property was given to the son's children without any ambiguity, so that if it was to be taken away from them it must be taken away by clear words to that effect. There was no intention shewn to defeat the gift to the issue of the son. Then, if there had been a second gift, and the words were confined to "after the death," that must be considered as "after the death without issue," because of the force of the previous gift, and because in the second gift there was nothing to cut down the previous gift. If the son survived the mother there was no doubt that his children would take: the gift over did not destroy all the interest that had previously been given to them. The testator did not intend that the children of his son should be wholly dependent on their father: he meant to make an absolute positive provision for them, independently of what they might obtain under the gift of the residue to their father. It must be assumed here that the gift was to those children only who were living at the death of their father. But that did not alter the question. The death of their father's mother was immaterial to them, except so far as it was made a condition. Where gifts were intended to be cut down, the words cutting them down were generally introduced by some stronger word than "but," and there must, therefore, be a distinction made between cases where gifts were properly cut down and those where such a result was only to be inferred from imperfect statements of the event on which the testator intended to found the gift over. In this will it seemed to him that the testator intended to cut down the gift to his son's children only in the event of their failing, and of their father predeceasing his mother. He did not mean that the property being once in the son's family it should go over to the children of the sisters, for whom he had already fully provided. It was reasonable that the property should go over if the son did not live and left no children. The case of Mandeville was exactly in point with the present. There the devise was to A. and the heirs of his body; and "if the devisee die, the same lands" to B. in fee, and "the Court held, that the devisee should have an estate tail by the first words, and no estate by the latter words." There was nothing which cut down the first gift. Atkins v. Atkins was there referred to, and it was a most important case, for it shewed the strength of the rule not to cut down a previous estate, except upon clear and express words. The cases of Wallop v. Darby (5) and Luxford v. Cheeke (6) proceeded on the same principle. The case of Spalding v. Spalding was exactly like the present, except so far that this was stronger, for there the heirs took through the father: here they took independently of him. And there the decision went upon the whole context of the will. That case had been, as the Lord Chancellor had already observed, adopted and acted upon in numerous instances. There were a good many other cases which also bore upon this question. Perhaps the most important of them was that of Newburgh v. Newburgh, of which he believed that the only report existing was to be found in the "Law of Property as administered in this House (7)." That case was very fully argued and very carefully considered. Mr. Buller ran his pen through the word "Gloucester" by mistake, and then the word "counties" was altered into "county"; but this House, upon the construction afforded by the other clauses in that will, decided that the words of the gift must be read as including the Gloucestershire estates. That authority was most important on the question of supplying words to complete a defective description of an event, where the general context shewed what that description had really been intended to be. Langston v. Langston, also in this House, bore upon the same point. There, too, an eldest son had been excluded by a mistake in one line of a will; but this House, on the context of the whole will, held him entitled. The case of Doe v. Micklem was important. There the words

(5) Yelv. 209.(6) 8 Lev. 125.(7) Page 367.

"after her death" were supplied by construction. Another case, of Lyon v. Geddes (8), followed the same rule; and so did Pearshall v. Simpson (9). The case of Malcolm v. Taylor was a strong case, and he entirely acceded to the doctrine there, that gifts over, where not clearly expressed to defeat previous gifts, must be taken as gifts in succession. He was here under the necessity of adopting a construction which would cut down a previous gift, or he must supply words according to the general intention. He adopted the latter course as that which was the more consonant with principle and authority. He broke in upon no rule and disturbed no settled axiom of law; on the contrary, he had always endeavoured to keep within those rules, at the same time making them binding so as properly to meet the justice of the case. He was of opinion that the decree of the Master of the Rolls should be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—This case was one of many of a similar nature, in which the mind was imperceptibly tempted to swerve from the established rules of construction by the apparent hardship of the case, and the highly probable conjecture that the testator never could have meant what he had expressed. Nothing could be more reasonable than to suppose that he meant in this case that his son's children should take the property after their father's death, whether he died in his mother's lifetime or not. But the rules which were to govern the construction of wills, as well as of all other written instruments, were clearly established, and it was impossible to overrate the importance of adhering to them. It was better, as Mr. Fearne said, that the intentions of twenty testators every week should fail of effect than that the rules should be departed from, upon which the security of titles and the general enjoyment of property so essentially depended. The question, as Sir J. Wigram correctly stated, in his work on the Application of Parol Evidence to the construction of Wills, was, "not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of his words?" The use of the expression that the intention of the testator was to be the guide, unaccompanied by the constant explanation that it was to be sought in his words, and a rigorous attention to it, was apt to lead the mind insensibly to speculate upon what the testator might be supposed to have intended to do, instead of strictly attending to the true question, which was, what did that which he had written mean? The will must be expressed in writing, and that writing only was to be considered. It was now universally admitted that, in construing that writing, the rule was to read it in the ordinary and grammatical sense of the words, unless some obvious absurdity or some repugnance or inconsistency with the declared intentions of the writer, to be collected from the whole instrument, followed from it, and then the sense might be modified so as to avoid those consequences, but no further. This rule was, in substance, laid down by Mr. Justice Burton, in Warburton v. Loveland (10), and had previously been described by Lord Ellenborough, in Doe v. Jessop, as "a rule of common sense as strong as can be." It had been stated as the "cardinal rule," from which, if we departed, we should launch into a sea of difficulties not easy to fathom, by his noble and learned friend when Lord Justice — Gundry v. Pinniger (11), and as the "golden rule" when applied to acts of parliament, by Chief Justice Jervis, in Matteson v. Hart (12), and by the late Mr. Justice Maule as "the most general of rules, a rule of great utility," in Guthrie v. Cupper (13). Many other cases might be cited, but there was no doubt of the generality and excellence of the rule. It was consistent with this rule that words might be supplied or rejected when warranted by the context of the will, but not merely on conjectural hypotheses of the testator's intention. Fairly applying the above rule of construction, he could not feel a doubt as to construing the words of this will. What the testator had written was perfectly clear from beginning to end. He had stated as distinctly as words could state anything, that the capital provided for the payment of the annuity was to go to the children of his daughters if his son died in the mother's lifetime. No other part of the will was repugnant to this. There was no inconsistency in defeating a prior limitation upon a particular contingency. The word "but" had two meanings, but whether it meant in this case "moreover" or "without this," or "except," the meaning of the words supplied was precisely the same. If the son died in the mother's lifetime the fund was to go over to the daughter's children. The addition to that of died "without issue" was mere conjecture. Conjecture must not be resorted to, for though the testator might have intended to give this fund to the son's children, he might also have intended not to give it to them if certain circumstances occurred, and no Court could found its decision on such grounds. If the condition had been that of his son's not going to Rome or to Florence, or anything of that sort, the House would not have supplied words to convert that absolute condition into one of a mixed or contingent kind. These speculations were vain and idle. If the words were, as they were, clear and intelligible, they must not be deprived of effect, unless an inconsistency in them with the context could be made out with equal plainness. Such an inconsistency between the gift to the children and the condition to take it away he could not see. Nor could the words "subject thereto" be introduced, for they were not in the will, and the words, though not so startling at first sight, were as much a material introduction as the words "without issue." There was no authority to introduce any such words. It was a mistake to suppose, as had been suggested, that if the words were read as they stood, the result would be to deprive the mother of her income should the son die in her lifetime, for the word "then" had other meanings besides "at that time," and must receive that meaning which could not defeat the testator's intention to provide an income for his wife. The citation of cases was generally of little use in the construction of wills which depended on the meaning of words in instruments differing much from each other. But they did not justify the introduction of the words into this will. In Spalding v. Spalding the context of the will plainly required such an introduction. That was not so here, and yet that was the leading case on which the argument was founded. In his opinion the will here was clear, the words used were unequivocal, and the whole context did not contradict those words. He thought, therefore, that the decree of the Master of the Rolls ought to be reversed.

Decree of the Court below affirmed.

A discussion followed about costs. There were two sets of appellants, but both were in the same interest.

Their Lordships at first thought of giving costs out of the estate, allowing only for one set of appellants; but it was suggested that if they gave costs as to one set of appellants only, the second appeal must be dismissed with costs; on which it was ordered that there should be no costs.

WOOD, V.C. }
Nov. 10, 11. } BARCLAY v. MASKELYNE.

Legacy—Revocation—Mistake.

A bequest in a will of specific chattels to H,—Held, not to be revoked by a gift of the same chattels by codicil to other legatees, it appearing that the last-mentioned gift was founded on the supposition that the chattels had been by the will bequeathed to C, and that the bequest had lapsed by his death.

Charles Kelsall, by his will, dated the 5th of April 1851, devised and bequeathed his freehold villa and dwelling-house at Hythe, with the garden and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the household furniture and implements of household, &c., which were then, or should at his death be, in and about his said villa, unto the Hon. Robert Charles Herbert, his heirs, executors and administrators, if he should be living at the testator's death, and if he should be then dead, unto the Hon. William Henry Herbert, his heirs, &c.

On the 1st of May 1855 the testator made a sixth codicil to his will, which, so far as it is material to the present purpose, is as follows:—"This is a codicil to the will of Charles Kelsall, Esq., of Hythe, Southampton, which will is dated April 4th, 1852. I hereby revoke and cancel the legacy of my villa at Hythe, bequeathed in my will to the Hon. Robert Clive and his heirs, he being lately deceased, and my connexion with his family thereby almost null, which legacy is hereby cancelled. I hereby give and bequeath my aforesaid villa at Hythe, near Southampton, with all its furniture, appurtenances and ornaments, both within and without doors, conjointly to the three sisters, Charlotte, Antonia and Agnes Maskelyne, daughters of A. S. Maskelyne, Esq."

The testator died on the 3rd of January 1857, seised of the villa at Hythe, and the garden and grounds belonging thereto, and of no other real estate.

Robert Charles Herbert was still living, and one of the questions which arose upon the construction of the will and codicils was, whether the bequest to him was revoked by the operation of the sixth codicil.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Kay contended, for the substituted legatees, that there was a clear revocation of the gift to R. C. Herbert, either in direct words, or at all events by the operation of the subsequent inconsistent bequest of the same subject-matter to the three Maskelynes. They referred to—

Mr. Daniel and Mr. H. F. Bristowe appeared for the Hon. R. C. Herbert, but were not called upon to argue the case.

WOOD, V.C.—I have had time to consider this point during the argument, both of yesterday and to-day; and though this case may be new in some respects, it is on the general principle that it must be decided. Whatever degree of doubt may be cast on one's mind as to the intention in the codicil, I think there is not sufficient indication of intention to overcome the clear and certain, and express gift in the will. That is the point one has to try in all these cases, where difficulties arise between a will and a codicil. The great value of the case of Hearle v. Hicks consists in the enunciation of the principle by the House of Lords, although the particulars of that case cannot be applied to any other; but there Tindal, C.J., in delivering the opinion of the Judges, commences with that proposition and terminates with it. Each of the Judges had a different reason for coming to a particular conclusion. Tindal, C.J. says, "The general principle upon which this opinion proceeds may be stated thus:—The testator does by his will shew a clear and manifest intention to devise the Plomer Hill Estate to his wife for life, or during her widowhood. If such devise in the will is clear, it is incumbent on those who contend it is not to take effect, by reason of revocation in the codicil, to shew that the intention to revoke is equally clear and free from doubt with the original intention to devise; for if there is only a reasonable doubt whether the clause of revocation was intended to include the particular devise, then such particular devise ought undoubtedly to stand." So that, although I should arrive at the conclusion that there was a reasonable doubt on the codicil, I should not say that it was the intention, under the circumstances, to revoke this gift, if it amounts only to doubt; or whatever reasonable degree of doubt there may be, still, as it is only a doubt, and the devise itself is plain and clear, that devise must stand. "Upon the whole," says the Chief Justice at the conclusion of his address, "although these and, perhaps, other difficulties may be urged against the construction above proposed, we think the onus probandi of shewing that the devise to the wife is included in the clause of partial revocation, is cast upon those who claim under such revocation, and that it is not shewn with sufficient certainty that this devise to the wife is included in such clause; on the contrary, that upon the proper construction of this codicil, the intention appears to have been that the devise to the wife should not be revoked by the codicils." So far as his own mind went, he was not even in a state of doubt, the conclusion to which he came being, that the devise was not revoked. The case here stands thus:—There is a devise, plain, clear and explicit, and also a specific legacy of the furniture, &c. to the Hon. Robert Charles Herbert, with a gift over in the event of his predeceasing the testator. Then the codicil appears to begin with a wrong reference as to the date of the will, because it refers to the will as being dated the 4th of April 1852, the will being in fact dated the 5th of April 1851. The first suggestion is, that there may be another instrument, in which there may have been some gift of this property to the Hon. Robert Clive, which instrument is not forthcoming; and in that case you would have a clear and express gift of the property to the Maskelynes in the subsequent part of the codicil, and it would be perfectly consistent with the revocation of some anterior gift to Robert Clive, which has by some means become inoperative. I think, on this part of the case, dealing with the personalty, I must conclude from the probate that there is a will, with a clear and express gift to Robert Herbert; that there is no evidence before me whatever, except this statement and recital, which of itself cannot establish the fact that there ever was any such will, because none such is forthcoming, and none such is suggested. The letter which Mr. Kay was about to read to me only tells Mr. Clive that he has, by some will or other, made him a gift—it might contain quite as wrong a reference as the codicil itself—and no one has suggested that there was any intermediate will prepared between the date of the will and the date of the codicil. Therefore I think I must take it to be an erroneous reference to the will, and I cannot deal with it in any other way. Then, the way in which the testator revokes the legacy is this:—"I hereby revoke and cancel the legacy of my villa at Hythe, bequeathed in my will to the Hon. Robert Clive and his heirs, he being lately deceased, and my connexion with his family thereby almost null, which legacy is hereby cancelled. I hereby give my aforesaid villa at Hythe" to the other legatees. Mr. Willcock says, first, here is a clear and express gift to the Maskelynes; and if there is a clear and express gift in a will to A, and a clear and express gift of the same subject-matter in a codicil to B, it passes the property to B, because the later will has effect, the two being inconsistent. That is perfectly true where there is a bequest simpliciter; but the question is, whether there is here a bequest simpliciter of the villa to the Maskelynes, or whether it is not coupled with that introductory part, which tells you in plain words, that he thinks that by the death of the previous legatee he has now got a clear field for the disposal of his property. One might guess what he would have done if he had known all the facts, by his saying, his connexion with the family is now severed. If those words were out, it would only come to this: a plain case of a gift to A. by will of a specific chattel, and then a codicil saying, "Whereas I have given X. a specific chattel, and X. is now dead, therefore I give all this property to B. instead of X," there being no gift to X. at all, but a gift to A, and A. being alive at the death of the testator. It is almost too clear for argument; it is not the case of a gift of the same chattel to one person by will, and then to another by codicil; but the gift by the codicil is prefaced by the statement that some person is out of the way, and the object of the gift by will being at an end, he now feels himself at liberty to dispose of it to somebody else. You might imagine the case of a gift to John by will, and then by a codicil, after a recital of a gift of the same thing to Henry, and that Henry has displeased the testator, a gift to somebody else. Nobody would contend that the gift to John was displaced, because he only proceeded in mistake. A new gift, standing alone without any preface, would pass to the last legatee; but being prefaced by that which shews clearly that the second legatee is only substituted because the first is out of the way, there being no such person as is referred to as the first donee, it cannot be held to deprive the person who would take under the first instrument, because the testator did not intend to regard the fund as in his own disposition until the legatee was out of the way. I think it is very probable, as Mr. Kay has suggested, that if it had been told the testator, "You did not give the property to Robert Clive, but to his nephew," he might say, that it was given to the nephew in consideration of his regard and esteem for the uncle; but as the uncle was now dead, and he did not much care about the other members of the family, he revoked the gift. That is all very possible by way of conjecture; but after all, it comes to no more than raising a reasonable doubt, that if every circumstance had been present to his mind, and he had not made, as he has made, a plain and palpable mistake, he might have been induced to make a different disposition of the property from what he has made. I then fall back on the principle laid down in Hearle v. Hicks, and it appears to me to be going a great deal too far to say, that a gift to A. is revoked by a subsequent gift to B, prefaced by the recital that the first gift was to X, and that X. is out of the way. At most, I have only entertained a certain degree of doubt as to what might have been the testator's intention; but nothing like that sort of doubt which can make me say, that the plain and distinct gift in the will is revoked.

Demurrer—Supplemental Bill—Change of Solicitor.

After a decree in an administration suit some of the plaintiffs filed a supplemental bill against their co-plaintiffs and the defendants, alleging generally that it was inconvenient that they and their co-plaintiffs should continue to be represented by the same solicitor, and praying that the suit might be carried on between the parties to the supplemental bill in the same manner as it was carried on between the parties to the original suit. On demurrer for want of equity,—Held, that the bill could not be sustained.

This was a demurrer for want of equity.

The plaintiffs, by their supplemental bill, stated that, in February 1856, they, together with certain of the defendants, filed their original bill against the other defendants for the administration of a testator's estate, and that a decree was made in January 1857 for establishing the will, and carrying the trusts thereof into execution.

The bill then stated, that circumstances had arisen which rendered it inconvenient and undesirable that the plaintiffs in the supplemental suit should continue to be represented in the original suit by the same solicitors as the defendants, the co-plaintiffs in the original suit, and they had accordingly instructed Messrs. Boys & Tweedie to act as their solicitors in the further prosecution of the said suit; and it prayed that the said suit might be carried on and prosecuted between the parties to the supplemental bill in the same manner as it was carried on between the parties to the original suit.

Mr. W. M. James and Mr. E. F. Smith, in support of the demurrer, cited—

Winthrop v. Murray, 7 Hare, 150.

Holkirk v. Holkirk, 4 Madd. 51.

Langdale v. Langdale, 13 Ves. 167.

[Wood, V.C. referred to Ward v. Ward (1).]

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Osborne, for the plaintiffs.—If there is anything irregular in the bill the proper course would be to move to have it taken off the file, and not to demur to it. There are matters in conflict between the present plaintiffs and their co-plaintiffs in the original suit, which make it necessary that they should be represented by separate solicitors, and this bill has been framed on the precedent of English v. Baring (2).

WOOD, V.C. (without hearing a reply).—I do not think the plaintiffs have stated any case upon which the bill can be supported. The bill merely alleges that circumstances have arisen which render it inconvenient and undesirable that the plaintiffs herein should continue to be represented in the said suit by the same solicitors as their co-plaintiffs in that suit, but what those circumstances are is not stated. In English v. Baring, which was unopposed, there was an allegation of fraud, and also an averment that the co-plaintiff availed himself of the iniquity. This case appears to me exceedingly wide of any such case as that. Here is no allegation at all, except the general allegation of inconvenience, &c. It is not easy to see how the interests of the co-plaintiffs can become adverse, though of course that may be; and when it happens, that may perhaps be a ground for filing a supplemental bill, but here the grounds are clearly insufficient.

The demurrer will be allowed, and I do not think I ought to encourage such a bill by giving leave to amend.

THE ATHENÆUM LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY V. POOLEY.

Joint-Stock Company, Debentures of—Fraud—Notice.

Debentures purporting to be those of a joint-stock company completely registered under stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. were issued by the directors of the company, pursuant to a resolution passed by a meeting of the shareholders, but which meeting was not an extraordinary general meeting duly convened and constituted according to the provisions of the deed of settlement of the company, and not a meeting, therefore, having power to increase the capital of the company by the issue of debentures or otherwise. The issue was procured by the contrivance of the chairman of the board of directors, and the debentures were given to P, an intimate friend of his, upon terms which were fraudulent as against the shareholders. P. afterwards transferred them to his broker B, to secure the balance of his account current with B, and B. subsequently transferred them to L, who being a customer of B. took them upon his recommendation as an investment at the price alleged by B. to be the price current in the market. L. had no notice at the time of the circumstances under which the debentures had been issued, but the debentures had on the face of them a false recital, that they were given to P. by the direction and consent of the proportion of shareholders empowered by the deed of settlement to issue them. Having paid the purchase-money to B, L. at once took the transfers from P. to B. and from B. to himself to the office of the company, and on the next day they were returned to him by the secretary, with the seal of the company affixed, and signed by the secretary, by whom the debentures had been also signed on their issue. L. made no inquiry to ascertain the circumstances under which the debentures had been issued; but two half-yearly payments of interest upon the debentures were subsequently made to L. by the directors. Neither these payments nor the circumstances of the issue of the debentures were ever made the subject of a report to a meeting of shareholders until they were ascertained and repudiated by a finance committee appointed by the shareholders to inquire into the affairs of the company. Vice Chancellor Stuart decided that the company were entitled to an injunction restraining L. from proceeding in an action commenced by him against the company to recover the sums made payable upon the debentures:—Held, on appeal, affirming that decision, that the shareholders were not bound by the debentures, and that the purchaser took them subject to the equities of the first obligee; that a person buying debentures of a joint-stock company is bound to ascertain whether they are tainted with fraud or irregularity; and, lastly, that the facts of the assignment having been registered and of interest having been paid made no difference unless the shareholders could be shewn to have acquiesced.

By the deed of settlement constituting the above-mentioned society, being an indenture bearing date the 2nd of May 1851, and expressed to be made between the several persons whose names were or should be thereunto subscribed and seals affixed, except William Lacy Howard, of &c., of the first part, and the said William Lacy Howard of the second part, after provisions in the usual form constituting the said society a joint-stock company within the meaning of the acts of parliament relating to the registration, incorporation and regulation of joint-stock companies, under the name of the "Athenæum Life Assurance Society," for the carrying on the usual business of life assurance, and of an Annuity, Endowment, Loan and Reversionary Society, at 30, Sackville Street, Piccadilly, in the county of Middlesex, with a capital of 10,000*l.*, in 10,000 transferable shares of 1*l.* each, and fixing the first Wednesday in the month of May in each year for the holding of the ordinary general meetings of the shareholders, and empowering the directors to call extraordinary meetings as they should think fit, or on the written requisition of any five or more shareholders, holding together 100 or more shares, and authorizing the requisitionists to call such meetings if the directors should neglect or refuse to call them, it was by the seventh clause of the said deed provided, that in case at any general meeting, ordinary or extraordinary, fifty shareholders, holding together 500 shares, should not be present and proceed to business within one hour after the time fixed for the meeting, no business should be done, but the meeting, if convened only on special requisition, should stand absolutely dissolved, but in every other case should stand adjourned to that day week, at the same hour and place, and so on from week to week, from day to day, or hour to hour, as often as the same should happen, until at some such meeting the required number of shareholders holding such shares as aforesaid, should be present, and proceed to business within one hour from the time fixed for such meeting. By the twelfth clause it was provided, that it should be competent for any extraordinary general meeting, and no other, and such meeting and no other was thereby empowered by a majority, which should consist of at least two-thirds in number of the shareholders of the society for the time being, or of the holders of policies of the society for life, and for not less than 500*l.*, each on the participating scale, (and on which two annual premiums at the least should have been then paid,) and also of two-thirds in number of the shareholders, and the said qualified holders of policies present personally or by proxy at the meeting, and which shareholders should hold together at least two-thirds of the shares in the capital stock of the society, which for the time being might have been subscribed for, by any resolution or resolutions to increase at any one time, or from time to time, the capital stock of the society, by the creation of new or additional 1*l.* shares, provided, that such addition to the capital did not exceed in the whole the sum of 990,000*l.*, and also to empower and require the directors to borrow and take up on mortgage of the real estate, or chattels real belonging to the society, or on such other securities as to such meeting might seem fit, any sum or sums of money which such meeting should deem expedient, and which the directors for the time being were not authorized to raise under the power in that behalf thereafter contained (being the power given by the thirty-fifth clause of the deed), not exceeding in the whole the sum of 50,000*l.* By the twentieth clause it was provided, that the common seal of the company should not be affixed to any policies or other documents of the company, except by the order of three directors, signed by them and countersigned by the manager, or, in his absence, by such officer as the directors should appoint. By the twenty-first and twenty-fifth clauses it was provided, that there should not be less than six nor more than twenty-one directors of the society, each of whom should at the time of his election and from thence during his continuance in office, hold at least 100 shares of 1*l.* each, fully paid up in the capital of the society, and that Josiah Bartlett, of &c., Henry Sutton, of &c., and the other persons therein named, should be, and they were thereby appointed the first directors of the society, and that three directors should constitute a board, and be competent to exercise the several powers and authorities thereby conferred on the directors generally. By the thirty-fifth clause it was provided, that the directors should also have full power and authority on behalf of the society to receive, and with the consent of an extraordinary general meeting in the manner thereinbefore provided and hereinbefore mentioned, to borrow, on mortgage or otherwise, and also (at their own absolute discretion), and in the usual and ordinary course of the business of the society, to invest, lay out, or advance at interest on government securities, or on such personal or other security as they should think fit and advantageous, and they lawfully might, such monies or such parts of the monies and funds of the said society as they should think expedient.

The society was completely registered on the 14th of May 1851, and the above-named Josiah Bartlett was elected chairman of the board of directors.

On the 16th of May 1851 a meeting of the shareholders of the society was held, at which the said Josiah Bartlett presided as chairman, and at which the following resolutions were, amongst others, passed:—

1. "That the capital stock of this society be increased from 10,000*l.* to 100,000*l.*"

3. "That the appointment of Henry Sutton, Esq., as manager, be confirmed, as settled by the board of directors on the 19th of April 1851."

4. "That the directors be hereby empowered to borrow any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in amount the present increased capital of the company, on debentures under the common seal, or on such other security as to the society shall seem fit."

This meeting was attended by less than fifty shareholders, there being then only twenty-nine shareholders who had signed the deed of settlement, of whom several were infants, and no holder of a policy attended it, there being then no such policyholder existing.

In pursuance of the fourth of these resolutions, J. Bartlett and the other three directors of the society caused debentures to be prepared under the common seal of the society, and proceeded to borrow money upon such debentures.

In June 1854 Alexander Gopsell Pooley, a friend of J. Bartlett, was the holder to a considerable amount of Westminster Improvement bonds, issued at 5*l.* per cent. interest, under the powers or provisions of the Westminster Improvement Act, 1845, by the Westminster Improvement Commissioners.

In the months of June and July 1854, J. Bartlett, professing to act upon a report to be made by a committee of directors, called "the finance committee," repeatedly and warmly urged his co-directors to authorize him to purchase Westminster Improvement bonds for the society, to the extent of 10,000*l.* and at their full value, and represented that, as interest at 5*l.* per cent was then payable on the bonds, they would be a most advantageous investment, and might be turned to useful account by the society, particularly as he could obtain them upon payment of not more than 4,500*l.* in cash to the vendor, who, for the residue of the purchase-money, would be willing to take debentures and shares of the society; and the directors would be able to raise upon the bonds when so purchased a large sum of money, which would enable them to extend their business, by advancing money as loans to parties who would effect policies with them, and thus the payment of 4,500*l.* in cash would enable the society to command a much larger capital.

In further pursuance of this plan, J. Bartlett, on the 14th of July 1854, represented to his co-directors that he had agreed to purchase Westminster Improvement bonds to the extent above mentioned on behalf of the company; and although there had been no resolution of the board authorizing any such purchase or agreement, his co-directors were induced to consent to the same being completed. J. Bartlett thereupon represented to his co-directors that A. G. Pooley was the person from whom he could effect the purchase of the bonds upon terms so advantageous to the society.

His co-directors thereupon, upon the persuasion of the said J. Bartlett, and upon the faith of the truth of his representations, allowed seven debentures of 500*l.* each, bearing date respectively the 19th of July 1854, to be issued under the company's seal in favour of A. G. Pooley; and these debentures, together with shares to the amount of 2,000*l.* in the capital of the society, and a cheque on the society's bankers for 4,500*l.* were delivered to Bartlett for Pooley, in payment of the consideration agreed to be taken by Pooley in payment for the said Westminster Improvement bonds to the amount of 10,000*l.*, which bonds Bartlett undertook to obtain from Pooley, and which he accordingly, a few days afterwards, obtained and brought to the office of the society and deposited with the manager. Each of the debentures so issued and given to Pooley was in the following form.

"Athenæum Life Insurance Society.

"By virtue of the deed of settlement of the Athenæum Life Insurance Society, bearing date the 2nd of May 1851, and registered pursuant to the acts for the registration, incorporation and regulation of joint-stock companies, and by the direction and consent of more than two-thirds of the shareholders of the said company present at a meeting convened for the purpose, the said society, in consideration of 500*l*. advanced to them for the purposes of the society by A. G. Pooley, of &c., do hereby covenant with the said A. G. Pooley, his executors, administrators and assigns, to repay the same to him or them, or as he or they shall direct, on the 23rd of December 1858, with interest thereon in the mean time at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum, to be computed from the 19th of July instant, and payable half-yearly, on the 1st of January and the 1st of July in each year, so long as the said sum of 500*l*. shall remain unpaid to the said A. G. Pooley, his executors, administrators or assigns, by the said society, the first payment of such interest to be made on the 1st of January next; but if at any time before the expiration of the period above mentioned any portion of the said sum of 500*l*. shall be repaid, then such interest shall be payable only on the portion remaining unpaid; and the covenant on the part of the said society to pay such interest is, nevertheless, only on condition that the stipulations following be complied with:—

1. The holder of this debenture is in all cases, when required by the manager, to produce the same to him for inspection;
2. This debenture to be delivered up to the society on repayment of the principal.

"Given under the common seal of the society this 19th day of July 1854.

"J. Bartlett, Chairman.

"Henry Sutton, Manager."

The seal to the debentures was affixed "in the presence of F. G. Tomlins, secretary."

In September 1854 Josiah Bartlett received the Westminster bonds so purchased from the company's office, and had never since returned them, alleging that he had raised money upon them for the purposes of the company.

On the 29th of December 1855 a meeting of shareholders was held, to investigate the circumstances under which the debentures given to Pooley had been issued, and in January 1856 Bartlett and the other three directors of the company resigned their offices as directors. In October 1854, Alexander Gopsell Pooley transferred the seven debentures to one Ebenezer Ball Brown, a money-dealer and stockbroker, the transfer purporting to have been made in consideration of 3,500*l*.; and on the 7th of December 1854, the said debentures were transferred for value, by Brown, to the defendant Richard Holmes Laurie, to whom interest thereon was paid by the directors, in January and July 1855; but upon Laurie applying for payment of interest in January 1856, the company declined, and had ever since refused to pay such interest. Laurie thereupon commenced an action against them, in the name of Pooley, on the 5th of March 1856. The company thereupon filed the bill in the present suit, alleging that the issuing of the debentures to Pooley was ultra vires of the directors, and that the whole was a scheme got up by Bartlett and Pooley for the purpose of defrauding the society; that the debentures were invalid, whether in the hands of Pooley or in those of Laurie, and whether Laurie had or had not notice, at the time of his purchase, of the circumstances under which the debentures had been issued. The bill prayed, under the above-mentioned circumstances, for a declaration that the seven debentures were invalid, and incapable of being enforced against the company, and that they might be given up to be cancelled; for an injunction to restrain Pooley and Laurie from proceeding with the action commenced by or in the name of Pooley against the society; that Pooley and Bartlett, or one of them, might be decreed and ordered to make good to the plaintiff the sum of 4,500*l*. so obtained from the company as aforesaid, with interest at 5*l*. per cent. from the 19th of July 1854; that Pooley and Bartlett, or one of them, might also be decreed and ordered to deliver up to the plaintiff the said 2,000 shares in the capital of the company, or to make good to the plaintiff the value of such shares; or otherwise that Pooley or Bartlett, or one of them, might be decreed and ordered to restore and replace to the plaintiff the Westminster Improvement bonds, or make good to the plaintiff the full present value of such bonds.

On the 12th of June 1856 an order for an injunction, restraining A. G. Pooley and Laurie, their solicitors, &c. from proceeding with the above-mentioned action in the name of Pooley, and from bringing any other action against the society or the shareholders until the hearing of the cause.

On the 12th of July 1856 an order was made for winding up the affairs of the society, under the provisions of the Winding-up Act.

From the evidence in the cause the following facts were shewn:—On the 19th of July 1854, the market value of Westminster bonds was 800*l.* for every 1,000*l.*; but it was deposed by Pooley that this was only when the bonds were paid for in cash; but that he was constantly selling them at par, when the consideration was given partly in cash and partly in securities. Pooley admitted the receipt of the cheque for 4,500*l.*, which was cashed by the society's bankers on the same day in seven 500*l.* Bank of England notes and other monies. Of these notes one was proved to have been paid, later on the same day, into the private account of Josiah Bartlett, at his bankers'. Pooley shortly afterwards deposited the seven debentures with Ebenezer Ball Brown, to secure money on a running account between himself and Brown, who was at that time his broker. Subsequently, and in December 1854, E. B. Brown was asked by Laurie, for whom he was in the habit of acting as broker, whether he had any good securities upon which he could recommend Laurie to invest a sum of money of about 3,000*l.* Brown thereupon said he himself had some debentures of the Athenæum Life Insurance Society for 500*l.* each, upon which the society paid 5*l.* per cent. interest, and which he could recommend as an eligible investment. Laurie, relying upon this recommendation, on the 7th of December 1854, agreed to purchase of Brown seven of such debentures for 500*l.* each for the sum of 3,220*l.*; and on the same day he paid the said E. B. Brown the said 3,220*l.*, and Brown duly executed to him a transfer of the seven debentures, and handed the same over to him. Such deed of transfer was then taken and deposited by Laurie at the office of the said society, and was duly registered by Frederick Guest Tomlins, their then secretary. On the 8th day of the same month of December the said transfer was returned to Laurie, with the following memorandum or certificate stamped or written thereon, and signed by the said secretary, that is to say, "Athenæum Life Assurance Society, registered. F. G. Tomlins, Secretary. Dec. 8, 1854."

Beyond this Laurie made no other inquiry as to the validity of the bonds.

No application was ever made by Brown or Laurie to inspect the deed of settlement of the society, either at the office of the society or at the General Registration Office of Joint-Stock Companies. Pooley, however, saw the deed previous to taking the debentures, but looked at it only to ascertain the names of the subscribers, but not to ascertain whether the meeting of the 14th of May 1851 was duly constituted for the purpose of issuing the debentures. It appeared that a balance-sheet had been made out every year for the inspection of the shareholders of the society, except during the year 1855. The books of the society were however balanced in that year, and in them, as so balanced, would appear the account of the above-mentioned transaction of the directors in Westminster Improvement bonds.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the plaintiff, contended that the meeting of May 1851 was not such a meeting as was required by the deed of settlement to sanction the increase of the capital of the society by the issue of debentures. There were not, as the deed required, fifty shareholders at least present at the meeting; but, as shewn by the evidence, not more than ten were there, a number far below two-thirds of the number of shareholders then existing. The meeting, moreover, in passing a resolution to increase the capital by 100,000*l.*, had acted in excess of the power given by the deed to a duly constituted extraordinary general meeting of increasing the capital by 50,000*l.* It had acted in excess of such power also by giving its debentures to Pooley as the price of Westminster Improvement bonds at par, such bonds being at the time at a large discount in the market. The debentures, moreover, were not in the form required by the deed of settlement. They were not sealed as the deed required; no order for such sealing having been signed in conformity with the provisions of the deed by three directors, and countersigned by the manager of the society. The two directors and the secretary who had signed the debentures were not the authorized agents of the society for issuing such debentures. The whole transaction was the result of a fraudulent scheme formed by Bartlett and Pooley, to palm the Westminster Improvement bonds upon the society upon terms advantageous to Pooley. This was plainly shewn by the circumstance that Bartlett had received one of the 500*l.* Bank of England notes paid by the society's bankers to Pooley. The debentures were, therefore, void ab initio as against the shareholders. That being so, the payment of interest upon them in January and July 1855 was insufficient to confirm the issue of them; and no report of such issue had ever been made to and confirmed by any subsequent meeting of shareholders. Of the invalidity of the debentures notice must be presumed as against Pooley, at the time he negotiated the transaction with Bartlett; and Laurie, though personally innocent, could not stand in a better position than Pooley. Deriving title from Pooley, he was affected by all the equities to which Pooley was subject. The recital in the debentures affected every holder with notice of what was necessary for the validity of the debentures, and ought to have put Laurie upon inquiry whether the meeting mentioned in such recital had been duly convened and constituted. As Laurie had neglected to make such inquiry, he had only himself to blame for the loss which he had incurred. They cited—

Cator v. Burke, 1 Bro. C.C. 434.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Craig and Mr. Locock Webb, for the defendant Laurie, submitted that in Agar v. the Athenæum Life Assurance Society (1) judgment had been given in favour of a bond fide holder for value of debentures of the society, issued in the same form as those above mentioned, the Court of Common Pleas holding that the society was bound by its common seal affixed to the debenture; and they contended that in the face of that decision it was immaterial whether the meeting which had authorized the issue of the debentures was formal or informal, or what was the consideration paid, or what the nature of the transaction which had given rise to such issue. They argued also, that after the registration of the transfer by their duly-authorized officer, and payment of interest upon the debentures to Laurie, the society were estopped from objecting to such debentures, on the ground of their alleged original invalidity.

Mr. De Gex appeared for the defendant Pooley.

Mr. F. O. Haynes, for the defendant Bartlett.

Mr. Malins, in reply, said, that in Agar's case the money-consideration given for the debentures had been paid at the office of the society, and that that circumstance was sufficient to distinguish that case from the present.

STUART, V.C. said that, as then advised, he was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain any action at law. For any relief beyond that he could not see any ground, and if it was asked, he should require to hear counsel upon it.

(1) 4 Jur. N.S. 211; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 95.

Mr. Malins said his client would be satisfied with an order for a perpetual injunction in restraint of further proceedings upon the debentures.

STUART, V.C. said he could not see any case for further relief than that, and having regard to the extraordinary conflict of authority upon the question before him, it was not without great doubt and difficulty that he had arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to any relief at all as to the debentures in question. Those debentures had clearly not been issued in a manner authorized by any provision of the deed of settlement of the society, and therefore not in a manner which could make them binding upon the shareholders as between themselves and the directors. The deed of settlement required that for such a purpose an extraordinary meeting, attended by at least fifty shareholders, should be called. But the issue of the debentures in question had been made pursuant to a resolution purporting to be that of a meeting of shareholders held on the 16th of May 1851, only a fortnight after the society had been completely registered, and when there were not fifty but only twenty-nine shareholders of the society, and of these twenty-nine several were infants, and therefore incapacitated. The society was registered pursuant to the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The object of registration under the statute was to enable those who dealt with the society to inform themselves of what the powers of the society enabled them to do, of the amount of the capital of the society, and of the mode of dealing prescribed by the deed of settlement to the directors as necessary in order that their contracts should be binding upon the shareholders. In the judgment of Lord Wensleydale in the case of Ernest v. Nicholls, his Lordship, after noticing the provisions of the Registration Act and that the act required the clauses of the deed of settlement to be registered so that all the world might have notice who were the persons authorized to bind the shareholders, had used the following language:—"The stipulations of the deed which restrict and regulate the authority of the directors are obligatory on those who deal with the company, and the directors can make no contract so as to bind the whole body of the shareholders, for whose protection the rules are made, unless they are strictly complied with. The contract binds the person making it, but no one else." And there were other passages in the report of his judgment to the same effect. If that was to be taken as the law upon the subject, no question could arise upon the present case, for it was clear beyond argument that the debentures were not issued by the directors in pursuance of a general meeting and so as to bind the shareholders. A difficulty, however, was occasioned by the fact, that the Full Court of Appeal in Chancery had, in Greenwood's case, taken a different view of the effect of the Registration Act as applied to contracts of directors alleged to be binding upon shareholders. In the report of his judgment in that case, Lord Cranworth was represented as saying, "It is clear that the liability to creditors is not materially affected, and the legislature has not only not exempted the shareholders from their ordinary obligations as partners, but has expressly enacted that they shall remain liable, subject only to a limitation as to three years." Under the embarrassment occasioned to him by this conflict of judicial authority, he (the Vice Chancellor) considered himself bound to follow the view taken by the House of Lords, and to hold in the case before him, that those who purchased in the market the debentures of the society were legally bound to take every reasonable precaution to satisfy themselves of the validity of the documents which they made the subject of their purchase. The case of Agar v. the Athenæum Life Assurance Society had also been referred to as an authority against the plaintiffs' case. There it had been held, by the Court of Common Pleas, that, as the debentures of this society, issued in manner above mentioned, recited that money had been borrowed, or at all events paid, for the purposes of the society, and the debentures purported to bind the society, the official manager, as representing the society, was estopped from proving anything contrary to what was recited in the document. Agar's case, however, was clearly distinguishable from the present, to an extent which rendered it altogether without weight as an authority to influence the Court in deciding upon the present case, for if the persons of the name of Agar who advanced their money in that case and paid it to the bankers of the society had been the defendants in a suit in this court, constituted like the present, the Court would have been bound to refuse the official manager, as representing the shareholders of the society, any relief, until he had restored to the defendant Agar that money which they had paid into the hands of the bankers of the society. The question to be decided in the present case, however, was, whether Mr. Laurie, an innocent purchaser of these debentures in the market, was to be prevented from pursuing his legal remedy, if he had one, upon these debentures, on the ground that the shareholders of the society had an equity to be relieved from any obligation in respect of them. A bona fide purchaser for value, no doubt, always appeared with a strong case in this court, but it was clear he could be in no better situation than the person against whom he made his demand, when, as in the present case, that person, having been deceived as well as he, was equally innocent with himself. There was a feature, moreover, in this case which did away with much of the difficulty which otherwise might have pressed upon the mind of the Court. Mr. Laurie unquestionably had given value for these debentures, but, having regard to the circumstances under which his purchase was made of Brown, it appeared that Brown must be viewed as the agent of Laurie in the transaction, and that Brown, as regarded the duty of inquiring into the validity of the debentures, was under a stricter obligation than the ordinary law of notice would have imposed upon Mr. Laurie himself. From the account of the transaction between Brown and Laurie, as given in their answers, it nowhere appeared that Brown had made any inquiry whether these debentures had been authorized by an extraordinary general meeting of the society previously advertised and called for the purpose, by which means alone could validity have been given to the debentures. It had been said that Brown was himself a purchaser of the debentures for value.

The bona fides of his purchase appeared, however, to be open to suspicion. The debentures had been issued to Pooley, from whom Brown was alleged to have purchased them, by the unauthorized act of the directors, and they purported to be issued in consideration of money advanced by Pooley, when in reality no money had been advanced, but the only consideration paid for the debentures by Pooley consisted of a certain amount of Westminster bonds, which had turned out to be worthless. But it was said that the officer of the society, at the public office of the society, had received notice of a transfer from Pooley to Brown, and subsequently of a transfer from Brown to Laurie, and that, as evidence of such notice, there were affixed to the certificates of transfer the seal of the society and the signature of the secretary, whose name had been also affixed to the debentures; and it was asked, how could any one be protected, if this was not sufficient to protect the right of a purchaser? The answer to this was, that Mr. Brown and Mr. Laurie and everyone dealing in the debentures of this society, must be taken to have known that they could have only been issued under extraordinary powers. Having that notice, they were bound to make inquiries to a reasonable extent, to satisfy themselves that those extraordinary powers had been duly exercised. So far as appeared from the evidence, no such inquiries had been made. All that had been done was to take the purchased debentures to the office of the society in order that the transfer might be registered, and upon that the registration had been made by that very officer whose name was affixed to the debentures themselves, unauthorized as the issue of such debentures had been by the shareholders. Under such circumstances, it was impossible for the Court to consider, in favour of Mr. Laurie, that these debentures were binding as against the shareholders. There must, therefore, be a decree to the effect that the injunction be made perpetual, but the decree to be without prejudice to any proceeding that the defendant Laurie might be advised to take against the directors who signed the debentures, or against Mr. Brown and Mr. Pooley, from whom he had derived his title.

Dec. 4, 11, 13.—From the above decision Mr. Laurie appealed.

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. D. Lewis supported the decree of the Vice Chancellor, relying, in addition to the cases cited in the court below, on—

Horton v. the Westminster Improvement Commissioners, 7 Exch. Rep. 780; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 297.

Bryson v. the Warwick Canal Company, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 711; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 138.

The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 El. & B. 327; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 317.

Mr. Locock Webb (with Mr. Bacon and Mr. Craig), for the appellant, referred to Greenwood's case, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 459; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 966.

No reply was called for.

Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—It is true that these debentures were irregularly and improperly issued; it is true that the Westminster Improvement bonds were irregularly and improperly received; it is true that the legal validity of the debentures is, at least, questionable; but it is also true, as the evidence strikes my mind, that the debentures were obtained by Mr. Pooley through the fraudulent combination between him and Mr. Bartlett to—I may as well use the word—cheat the company. I am not sure that I should not come to that conclusion independently of the tracing of the 500*l.* note. The tracing of the 500*l.* note into the private account of Mr. Bartlett, at his bankers', on the very day in which it was paid by the cheque drawn on the company's funds by Hopkinson, puts an end to all possibility of doubt. In my opinion, it was a most wicked transaction; and, therefore, if Mr. Pooley were alone concerned in this, no question could arise for a moment. Mr. Laurie appears to have bought the debentures innocently, but very imprudently, and I dare say in the belief that they were good security, and without any notice to him of anything whatever to the contrary. Unfortunately, he has bought what the English law calls "a chose in action," and it is too clearly settled to admit of question or argument that a person buying a chose in action, which can only be put in suit in the name of the original holder from whom he buys, must abide the case of the person from whom he buys, in whose name it is put in suit at law. Of course, there may be instances of exception, arising from conduct on the part of the alleged debtor, and if in the present case inquiries had been made in the proper quarter, before Mr. Laurie's money had been paid, it is possible he might have stood in a better position; he pays his money first and then does not inquire, but applies to have his assignment registered at the office of the company, and it is registered, and he then receives a dividend or two. Of course, these acts did not induce him to part with his money, for he had done so before; and these acts of confirmation on the part of the company amount to nothing, for they were acts done under the same influence and direction as the other acts were done, and without any knowledge of the real circumstances of the case on the part of those who alone are affected by it, and therefore the right to relief is clear. If the Court were not to interfere, recovery might be had in the name of Mr. Pooley upon these debentures, when they are affected by fraud. It is said, and perhaps accurately, that this is one of those frauds which might be tried at law; especially it might be tried at law now, when equitable defences are allowed, but it is neither the habit nor the duty of this Court upon questions as to which it exercises an original jurisdiction, to abandon or delegate the exercise of that jurisdiction in cases where the facts require it, it being a jurisdiction which it is as competent to exercise in general, and certainly in cases of this description, as any other Court or tribunal. The decree, therefore, appears to me to be plainly right, subject to these observations—one almost merely a point of form—namely, the question whether the latter part of the injunction does not in words go too far. The second remark is, that it may be possibly right to direct an inquiry whether the company had received any benefit from the Westminster Improvement bonds. It is not likely, but perhaps it would be too much to say it would be impossible. The third observation relates to Mr. Pooley's costs. I do not understand why he was not ordered to pay the costs; and speaking for myself alone, I am disposed to give the costs against him, if, as the matter stands, the course of the Court allows it.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This case has appeared to me to be one of considerable hardship upon the part of Mr. Laurie: I have, therefore, given great attention to the arguments which have been adduced on his behalf, and have thought it right to look into all the evidence which has been laid before the Court in the cause. In the result I really feel no doubt that the decree in this case, so far as it goes, is perfectly right. It appears that these debentures have been held valid at law, Mr. Agar, who advanced 4,000*l.* upon the debentures, having recovered upon them in a court of law: and if the case now before us was in my judgment to be determined upon the validity or invalidity of these debentures at law, I certainly should have required further time to consider the case, with reference to what fell from the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, and what fell from one of the learned Lords in the House of Lords in the case of Ernest v. Nicholls, where there may, prima facie, appear to be some difference between the expressions which fell from the Judges in those two cases. In my opinion, it is unnecessary to decide any question upon the validity or invalidity of these debentures in their original creation. This case seems to me to depend upon the question of the fraudulent issue, and not of the fraudulent creation, of the debentures, because it is plain that though these debentures may have been well created, they may have been fraudulently issued. Now, in that view of the case, the transaction in question stands thus: Mr. Pooley having some Westminster Improvement bonds, the directors of this company agreed to pay him 4,500*l.* in cash, which was the full amount of the cash or nearly the amount of the whole cash which the company had at that time at their bankers, to give him a sum of 3,500*l.* secured, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., by the debentures of the company, payable in the year 1858; and to give him also 2,000 shares in the company, as paid-up shares, upon which 1*l.* per share was to be taken to have been paid up. And it is an undoubted fact that these Westminster bonds were, at that time, of the value of 8,000*l.* only. Therefore there is a payment of 4,500*l.* in cash, a debt of 3,500*l.* created against the company, and 2,000 shares in the company, allotted to Mr. Pooley for property of the value of 8,000*l.* only. Now it is said that these 2,000 shares were worth nothing. That they are worth nothing now is pretty plain, because what follows upon them is liability and not profit; but what was the value of these 2,000 shares at the time, to be issued to other independent persons who might have taken, or thought it right to take, shares in the company at that time there is nothing whatever to shew; and it cannot, I think, be assumed that there was no value in these 2,000 shares when Pooley agreed to accept them in consideration of the transfer made by him of the Westminster Improvement bonds. Now it is said, however, that this was a transaction within the powers of the directors, which are given them by the deed of constitution of this company, and two clauses in that deed are particularly referred to as having given the directors power to enter into this particular transaction, the first of those clauses being, I think, the 2nd clause, and the other the 35th. By the 2nd clause of the deed, powers are given to the company in these terms: "That the business of the society shall be to make and effect all or any assurances on lives or survivorships, or any contingencies relating to or connected with lives or survivorships which may be effected according to law, and also to grant, purchase, sell and re-sell, endowments or annuities either for lives or for years, or on survivorships, and either immediate or deferred, reversionary or contingent, and also life, reversionary and other personal estates and interests, and to advance money by way of loan on personal security, and generally to carry on the business of life assurance, and of an annuity, loan and reversionary interest society in all their respective branches and departments, or in such of the said branches or departments, to carry on such business respectively." And it is argued, that upon the words "to purchase, sell and re-sell life, reversionary and other personal estates and interests," power was given to this company to deal in the purchase of Westminster Improvement bonds. It is quite plain to me that the true meaning of those words, "or other personal estates and interests," must be controuled by the general words which follow, "to advance money by way of loan on personal security, and generally to carry on the business of life assurance and of an annuity, endowment, loan and reversionary interest society," within which business will not fall any dealings in Westminster Improvement bonds, or other personal estates and interests. Unless that construction be put upon the deed, it does not seem to me that there is any limit to the powers which it is said this clause would give to the company. They might carry on business according to the argument in any species of dealings in chattels which could possibly be conceived to exist. It is quite plain, I think, that that was not the true construction of the deed. Then, the 35th clause is in these terms: "That the directors also shall have full power and authority, on behalf of the society, to receive and (with the consent of an extraordinary general meeting in the manner hereinbefore provided) to borrow on mortgage, or otherwise, and also (at their own absolute discretion), and in the usual and ordinary course of the business of the society, to invest, lay out, or advance at interest on government securities, or on such personal or other security as they shall think fit and advantageous, and they lawfully may, such monies, or such parts of the monies and funds of the said society as they shall think expedient." And it is said that this gives them a general power to borrow money upon any security. But suppose it to do so, is this a transaction of borrowing money? The only possible way in which it can be treated as a transaction of borrowing money is, that there was a borrowing of 3,500*l.* from Pooley upon the debentures. And that is not the real nature of this transaction. The real nature of this transaction was a purchase from Pooley, by means of the debentures, of the Westminster Improvement bonds. There was no other borrowing of money as connected with that purchase. It was not the case of a loan of money upon security.

Well, then, was it the case of an investment within the meaning of the latter part of the clause—"To invest, lay out, or advance at interest on government securities, or on such personal or other security as they shall think fit and advantageous, and they lawfully may, such monies and such parts of the monies and funds of the said society as they shall think expedient"? Plainly it was not an investment of the monies of the company, for the company had not monies which were required to be invested. It was a transaction of purchase, and not of investment; it was a transaction of purchase, and not of loan: and therefore it in no way falls within the provisions of the clauses either of the 2nd or the 35th sections of the deed. Now it is said, again, that if it was in the power of the directors, the mere circumstance that the directors made a bad bargain in making a purchase of these Westminster Improvement bonds would not avoid it, and I agree that this is so; at least, I think that because of the mere fact of the directors of the company having power to purchase property, and making a bad investment of the property, it could not afterwards probably be said, on the part of the shareholders of the company, that because that investment turned out to be bad, therefore the shareholders were entitled to impeach the transaction. But, still, the whole question results in this: was there or was there not a power to do what was proposed to be done? If it appears that these clauses do not apply, the whole argument on that point falls to the ground, and I think, therefore, that this was not a transaction within the power of the directors of the company. That, however, might not perhaps be sufficient to decide the case, because if not within the power of the directors, still, if the act done were merely one which would be prejudicial as between the directors and the shareholders, it may well be that that is a transaction which may stand as to strangers, following the decision of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, but it cannot stand as to strangers if it was a fraud upon the shareholders of the company. And we must consider, therefore, whether there was or was not in this case any fraud intended or practised upon the shareholders of the company. And what are the facts? Why, that of this 4,500*l.*, which was paid by the directors of the company for the purchase of those Westminster Improvement bonds on the 16th of July 1854, 500*l.* in the identical notes in which the money is paid is traced to the chairman of the company on the very day on which the payment is made by the company. Now, it is impossible, I think, for any man to conceive that there was not a fraud practised by these directors upon the company; and it seems to me, therefore, that within both the principles of the case of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, and the more extended principles (if they were intended to be more extended) of the case of Ernest v. Nicholls, it is impossible that this transaction can stand either at law or in equity. Mr. Bartlett has put in an answer to the amended bill, in which he says that the transaction of the loan was a separate and distinct transaction; but I asked in the course of the argument,—and I heard no answer to the question,—Is it to be believed, or can any man reasonably be called upon to believe, that Mr. Pooley would have made that loan to Mr. Bartlett of the sum of 500*l.*, unless Mr. Pooley had been intended to receive, and as part of the same transaction was to lend Mr. Bartlett 500*l.* for the accommodation of Mr. Bartlett? and if that was the transaction, beyond all question it was a fraud, and a gross fraud, upon the company. The transaction of the loan may be distinct in form, but certainly it cannot, in my judgment, with the evidence before us, be taken as distinct in substance. Well, then, the question resolves itself into this, whether, if the transaction was fraudulent as between Pooley and the company, Mr. Laurie can be in any better position? Now, prima facie, he certainly cannot be so, because I take no principle to be better settled than the ordinary principle of this Court, that the assignee of a chose in action must take, subject to all the equities which affect the assignor. Mr. Craig has attempted to draw a distinction between those cases, and says that it depends, in a court of equity, on the question whether inquiry has been made or ought to have been made or not. I cannot find any authority in which any such principle has been laid down. The principle has been universally recognized, and if we were to break in upon it now, nobody could see the mischief which would be done by breaking in upon the settled law; and the principle is founded upon very good ground, for otherwise, it would be competent, in any case of fraud, for a man, by fraud, to obtain a legal right, and having obtained a legal right, to assign it in equity, which he may well do to a person who has no knowledge of the fraud, and then to say, “Now that third person may bring an action in the name of the original obligee, and bringing that action in the name of the original obligee, a Court of equity ought not to restrain the action. Thereby, of course, the original person who has been defrauded would be made subject to that liability, which had been imposed upon him by reason of the fraud.” That is a principle which I think would be very difficult to maintain. Now, no doubt, notwithstanding the rule may be that the assignee should take, subject to the equities which attach upon the assignor, parties may have so dealt as to have created equities against themselves, and to prevent the rule from applying in this court of the equities which attach upon the assignor being binding upon the assignee. There may have been such dealings between the assignee and the original party liable as may render him liable to the assignee, though he would not have been liable to the assignor. And it is in that view that I have to consider the question, whether the circumstance of this assignment of these debentures having been registered, or of the dividend having been paid upon the debentures, can have any operation as against the shareholders of the company: for, undoubtedly, if these shareholders had stood by and said, “We recognize that transaction,” at the time when the assignment was made; or if they had said, “We paid a dividend, knowing the fraud which has been committed against the company, we, nevertheless, think it better for the company to submit to that demand”; if there were a universal acknowledgment on the part of the shareholders that it was right and better for the interests of the company to submit to the demand than to resist it, then, indeed, these shareholders may have created an equity against themselves which would prevent them from availing themselves of the ordinary rule of the Court, that an assignee is to be bound by the equity against the assignor. But let us consider these questions separately. Take the case of registration. What more is there in the registration than an entry made by the officers of the company of the fact of the debt having been transferred? That entry is, under the controul of the directors, made by the officers of the company in the books of the company, accessible, no doubt, to the shareholders, but never communicated to the shareholders, not the subject of any report or of any recognition by the shareholders at large. It is a case, therefore, in which the entry of the transfer could be no more binding upon the shareholders of the company than the entry of the debentures themselves. And if the shareholders could not be bound by the entry made by the directors, or under the order of the directors, in the books of the company, of the debentures themselves, neither, as I conceive, can they be bound by the entry of the assignment of the debentures in those books. The directors, if they do not appear to bind the company by granting the debentures, could not have power to bind them simply by entering those debentures in the books of the company. Then, as to the payment of the dividends. It struck me at first that, possibly, some such case as this might have arisen upon the payment of the dividends, that the payments of these dividends might have been reported to the shareholders and affirmed by a general meeting; and I do not mean to say one word as to what the effect of that would have been if it had appeared in the report of the directors that there had been a borrowing of money, and that interest had been paid upon the money so borrowed. I leave that question entirely open. I believe there are decisions upon it, but I am not at the present moment aware what those decisions may be. But, in this case, it is plain that these payments of interest on these debentures were never entered in any report which was made by the directors of this company, and were never, in any way, communicated to the shareholders of the company, for, upon examining the evidence of Mr. Whitehead, this transaction taking place in July, it is to be collected that the report was made up for the year 1854 only down to the period antecedent to July 1854, and that the transactions of 1854, as to those debentures, would be entered in the accounts of the company for the year 1855. There is no report made by the directors in that year. Then, how does the case stand? Simply thus—that the trustees (for these directors must be considered in the character of trustees) have improperly borrowed money, and have improperly paid interest upon the money so borrowed, without the knowledge of those for whom they were trustees. If the cestuis que trust could not be bound by the original loan, neither could they be bound by the payment of the interest upon the money so borrowed. I think, therefore, the decree is right, subject to the question which my learned Brother has suggested, if it is desired to say anything upon it. There is a little difficulty about it.

Mr. Malins (on the question suggested by Lord Justice Knight Bruce, whether the plaintiff should have the costs of the suit against Mr. Pooley,) contended that, as the whole matter was before the Court of appeal on a re-hearing, Mr. Pooley ought to come forward to protect his own interests.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The plaintiff himself does not appeal. It is true that the appeal of one defendant opens the whole case as to that defendant, but I am not sure that it opens it as to the other defendants, so as to subject them to costs. If that were so, it would lead to this consequence, that at every appeal all the parties must appear.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Speaking in the name of justice, I should like to decide so about the costs. My mind has a singular proclivity towards it, but I am afraid it can hardly be done.

The deposit was ordered to be paid to the plaintiff, but no costs of the appeal were given against the appellant.

Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Particulars of Sale—Depreciatory Condition.

*A testator directed his estates to be sold, and after the decease of his wife gave 14,000*l.* out of the proceeds to different legatees, including 8,000*l.* to be divided between his four nephews, or such of them as should be living at the decease of his wife, but if the fund should not amount to 14,000*l.*, then all the legacies were to be reduced pari passu. The four nephews mortgaged their interest in the 8,000*l., with a power to the mortgagees to sell upon non-payment of the money, subject to such special conditions as they should think proper. The money not being paid, the mortgagees sold the property by auction, as a sum payable out of the residue, but without stating that it was liable to abatement, and one of the conditions of sale was that if the vendors should be unwilling or unable to satisfy any requisitions made by the purchaser, they should be at liberty to rescind the sale :— Held, that this condition was not depreciatory ; that the mortgagees were justified in selling under such a restriction ; and that the omission to state in the particulars that the 8,000*l.* was subject to abatement was not a mis-statement calculated to mislead the purchaser.

James Reade, by his will, dated the 10th of August 1844, after certain specific bequests to his wife, gave, devised and bequeathed all his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates (except the leasehold house thereinbefore bequeathed to his wife), and all personal estate and effects not thereby or otherwise disposed of, unto Thomas Dixon, Henry Blanchard and William Reade, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns respectively, upon trust to sell or otherwise convert into money his real and personal estates and effects, as they should think most advantageous, and upon trust that his trustees should, in the first place, pay or discharge all his debts, &c., and should invest all which should remain of the said monies, after satisfying the purposes aforesaid, in their names, and should, subject to an annuity to the testator's brother, John Reade, during his life, pay the dividends, interest and annual produce of the said trust funds, or permit the same to be received by his said wife and her assigns during her life, and should after her decease (subject to the payment of another annuity to his nephew, Richard Reade, for his life, but which annuity never took effect by reason of the death of Richard Reade in the testator's lifetime), by sale or other conversion into money of a sufficient part of the said stocks, funds or securities, levy and raise the sum of 14,000*l.*, and stand possessed thereof upon trust as to 8,000*l.* part thereof, for and to be equally divided between his four nephews, George Reade, William Reade, Redmond Reade and James Reade, the sons of his brother Redmond Reade, or such of them as should be living at the decease of his said wife ; and as to three several further sums of 2,000*l.*, further part of the said 14,000*l.*, in trust for certain other nephews of the said testator ; and the said will contained a declaration that if the residuary trust fund should not be sufficient to satisfy the whole of the said sum of 14,000*l.*, the said sums of 8,000*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 2,000*l.* and 2,000*l.* should abate pari passu ; and subject to raising the before-mentioned sums, the testator bequeathed his residuary estate in trust for all his nephews and nieces (except two therein named) who should be living at the death of his wife ; and the testator thereby declared that in case all his said four nephews, the sons of his late brother Redmond, should die in the lifetime of his wife, the said sum of 8,000*l.*, the trusts whereof for the benefit of the said four nephews were thereinbefore declared, should not be raised, but should be merged in his residuary estate.

The testator died on the 5th of November 1852.

On the 8th of June 1853 a policy of assurance was effected by the said four nephews of the testator, George Reade, William Reade, Redmond Reade and James Reade, for the sum of 6,000*l.*, payable to the longest of the lives of them, against the life of Arabella Phillis Reade, the testator's wife, and it was declared by the policy that if all the four nephews should die in the lifetime of the said A. P. Reade, and the policy should then remain in force, the directors of the assurance company should pay to the said William Reade, his executors, administrators or assigns, within three months after proof of the deaths of all of them, the sum of 6,000*l*.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 8th of June 1853, in consideration of the sum of 5,400*l*., the said George Reade, William Reade, Redmond Reade and James Reade, assigned and transferred unto Francis Faulkner and F. Faulkner, their executors, administrators and assigns, among other things, all and every the share and shares, as well original as accruing, to which they were or should become entitled under the will of the said James Reade, the testator, in the principal sum of 8,000*l*., part of the 14,000*l*. therein mentioned, and of and in the stocks, funds and securities, upon which the same should from time to time be invested, and of and in the dividends, interest and annual produce thereafter to accrue due in respect of the same shares or any of them, or any part thereof, and also the said policy of assurance, No. 3,503 in the books of the Metropolitan Life Assurance Company, together with the said sum of 6,000*l*., and all principal and other sums of money which should become due or recoverable upon the said policy, either by way of bonus or otherwise; to hold the same unto the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators and assigns, subject to a proviso for redemption and re-assignment therein expressed, on payment of the sum of 5,400*l*., with interest at 5*l*. per cent. per annum. And the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, jointly and severally covenanted to pay the said sum of 5,400*l*., together with interest at the rate aforesaid, in manner therein mentioned. And the said indenture also contained the following clauses: "Provided also, and it is hereby agreed and declared between and by the parties to these presents, that if default shall be made in payment of the said sum of 5,400*l*., or the interest thereof, or any part thereof respectively, contrary to the proviso or agreement for payment of the same, then and in such case it shall be lawful for the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, at any time or times thereafter, absolutely to sell and dispose of the same parts or shares, principal and other sums of money, dividends, interest, policy and premises, or any part thereof, either together or in lots, and either by public auction or private contract, to any person or persons who shall be willing to become the purchaser or purchasers of the same, or any part thereof respectively, for the best price or prices in money that can be reasonably obtained for the same, and subject to such special or other conditions of sale as the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, shall think proper, with full power to buy in the same or any of them, at such public auction or auctions, without being answerable for any loss, expense or diminution in price consequent thereon, and to rescind the contract or contracts for sale thereof, and to re-sell the same from time to time; and for the purpose of effecting such sale or sales, disposition or dispositions, to enter into, make and execute all such contracts, agreements, acts, deeds, conveyances, assignments, surrenders and assurances as they, the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, shall think proper. And it is hereby agreed and declared, that all contracts, agreements, acts, deeds, conveyances, assignments, surrenders and assurances which shall or may be entered into, made and executed, either with or without the concurrence of the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, as they, the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, shall think proper, shall, whether the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, their or any of their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, shall or shall not join therein or assent thereto, be to all intents, effects and purposes whatsoever valid and effectual to bind the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade respectively, their and every of their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and all persons claiming and to claim by, from, through, under or in trust for them or any of them; provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby agreed and declared between and by the parties to these presents, that the power of sale and disposition hereinbefore given shall not be exercised by the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, until the expiration of three calendar months from the time when notice in writing requiring payment of the said sum of 5,400*l.* and interest, shall, by the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, have been given to the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, or some or one of them, or some or one of their executors, administrators or assigns, or left at his or their usual or then last or last known place or places of abode; and it is hereby agreed and declared that the receipt or receipts in writing of the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators or assigns, for any money to arise from the said sale or sales, disposition or dispositions, or which shall be otherwise payable to them under or by virtue of these presents, shall effectually discharge the person or persons to whom the same shall be given from being answerable or accountable for the misapplication or non-application, or from being in anywise bound or concerned to see to the application of the money therein respectively mentioned to be received; and also from being bound or concerned to inquire either as to the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, disposition or dispositions, which may be made by virtue of these presents, or into the fact of such notice having been given as aforesaid; it being the intent and meaning of all the parties to these presents, that any such sale or disposition shall not be voidable or void by reason of the same having been unnecessary and improper, or for any want of the notice hereinbefore required; but that the remedy, if any, of the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, their and every of their executors, administrators or assigns, shall be only for damages against the person or persons exercising such power of sale."

The said indenture also contained a declaration that the balance of the monies to be produced by any sale or disposition, after payment of the said sum of 5,400*l.* and interest, and the costs and expenses, should be paid to the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade equally, if they should then be all living, and if not, then to such of them, or the executors, administrators or assigns of such of them as would under the will of the testator have been entitled to receive the said parts or shares and principal monies thereby assigned; and each of them also, the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenanted with the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for further assurance of the premises to the said Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner, their executors, administrators and assigns.

No part of the principal sum of 5,400*l.* was paid pursuant to the covenant contained in the said mortgage; and on the 28th of January 1856 Francis Faulkner and Frederick Faulkner duly gave to the said G. Reade, W. Reade, R. Reade and J. Reade written notice that they required immediate payment of the sum of 5,400*l.* and interest, and that in the event of the same not being paid at the expiration of three calendar months from the receipt of such notice, the power of sale given by the said indenture would be exercised and put in force by them. The receipt of such notice was duly acknowledged in writing by the said G. Reade and W. Reade, on the 13th of January 1856, and by the said R. Reade and J. Reade on the 8th of February 1856, but no part of the said principal sum was paid pursuant to such notice. On the 14th of July 1857, the sum of 8,000*l.* and the policy of assurance for 6,000*l.* were put accordingly up for sale by the plaintiffs by public auction, the plaintiffs at the same time putting up for sale the interest of the mortgagors in the residuary estate of the said testator, J. Reade, which interest was also included in their mortgage-deed, under certain printed particulars and conditions of sale. The manner in which the property was specified in the particulars of sale is fully set forth in the judgment of the Vice Chancellor. Amongst the conditions of sale was the following (the ninth):—"That in case any objection or requisition be made in respect of the title or otherwise, which the vendors shall be unwilling or unable to remove or satisfy, the vendors shall be at liberty to rescind the sale on returning the deposit, without interest or costs, notwithstanding any steps taken by them in the mean time to clear up any such objection or comply with any such requisition."

When the sale took place, Mr. J. Clayton, as the agent of the defendants, bid for and became the purchaser of the reversionary sum of 8,000*l.* and of the policy for 6,000*l.*, at the price of 4,310*l.*, and paid the deposit of 862*l.* in part payment of the purchase-money, and also signed an agreement, dated the 14th of July 1857, in conformity with the conditions of sale. The abstract of title was duly delivered within the specified time, and the following requisition was returned by the defendants' solicitors, in the form of an extract from counsel's opinion upon the abstract:—"First, if it is intended that the sale should be effected by the mortgagees of the 8th of June 1853, under the power of sale contained in the mortgage-deed, such power authorizes the mortgagees to sell under special conditions; but, notwithstanding that, I think they have exceeded their authority in selling under such a condition as the ninth, which stipulates that in case any objection or requisition be made in respect of the title or otherwise, which the vendors shall be unwilling to remove or satisfy, the vendors shall be at liberty to rescind the sale. A Court of equity would consider such a condition to have a depreciating effect, and to be an improper condition for mortgagees to sell under, and therefore, I think the concurrence of the mortgagors should be required. Secondly, the particulars of sale do not state that the 8,000*l.*, the reversion in which is offered for sale, is liable to abatement in case the residuary property should not prove sufficient to realize 14,000*l.*, and the purchasers reserve their right to object to complete on that ground."

There were other objections, of a secondary nature, which were not now in question.

On the 27th of July the following answers were sent by the plaintiffs' solicitors to the two before-mentioned requisitions:—"First, it is intended to sell under the power. The sale is with the concurrence of the mortgagors, who will not, however, be parties to the deed. Secondly, the lowest value of the residuary estate is 25,000*l.*"

A correspondence then ensued between the respective solicitors, the result of which was that the present suit was instituted against the purchasers for a specific performance of the contract, and it was alleged that the plaintiffs had been put to considerable expense by the refusal of the defendants to complete the purchase.

It was now agreed between the parties that the only questions to be argued should be those which were raised upon the two requisitions made on behalf of the defendants.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Rendall, on behalf of the plaintiffs, contended that the mortgagees were justified under the terms of their power in introducing the ninth condition of sale; it was not depreciatory, but such as any vendor would insert if selling his own property, and was calculated to avoid litigation and expense. As to the second point, it was submitted that there was no mis-statement nor any statement calculated to mislead. The nature of the charge was sufficiently pointed out, and the purchaser might have concluded that the 8,000*l.* was liable to abatement in case the residuary property did not realize the sum of 14,000*l.*

Mr. Baily and Mr. G. M. Giffard, for the defendants, submitted that such a condition as the ninth was depreciatory. The purchaser might raise any objections, and might go on negotiating for a considerable time, and the vendors might be fully able to answer the requisitions made, but at any moment under this condition they might turn round and say, "Though we are able to give you the information and to clear up all doubts about the title, still we are unwilling to do so, and therefore we choose to cancel the agreement." This would evidently have the effect of making purchasers bid less for the property, and the mortgagors might file a bill to upset the sale on that ground. As to the second point raised, it was also clear that the liability to abatement was not set out in the particulars, and the purchasers were therefore buying a thing which was of less value than what was stated, and consequently, on that ground, they were not bound to complete the purchase.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a bill by the vendors against the purchasers for specific performance, and the parties have agreed that the case shall be dealt with by the Court on this footing,—namely, that no matter should be considered in controversy between them except those arising upon the first two requisitions of counsel upon the abstract; and, therefore, if I am of opinion that neither of the two objections is sufficient, then there is to be a final decree for specific performance. Upon that footing, I proceed to express my opinion upon the two objections. The first objection turns upon the fact, that the sale in question is made by the plaintiffs, not in their character of absolute owners of the property, but as mortgagees under a power, which renders it necessary to consider how far the sale has taken place under such circumstances that the mortgagors cannot impeach the sale after it has been completed. The objection, as stated in the opinion of counsel, obviously turns entirely upon this, that although it is true the vendors have a power of sale, and even a power of sale with special conditions, still the ninth condition is of that nature that, if the mortgagors, without joining in the sale, afterwards should endeavour to set it aside, they will either succeed in doing so or a doubt arises whether they will succeed, which is quite sufficient for the objection. This objection, therefore, turns upon the rights of third persons, who are not parties to the contract. The nature of the second objection is this, “that the vendors have purported to sell a reversionary interest in 8,000*l.*, and the particulars of sale do not represent what is the fact appearing from the will, that the 8,000*l.* is not only liable to abatement in case the property upon which it is charged should not amount to the value of 8,000*l.*, but they do not disclose the fact that it is liable to abate pari passu with three other charges of 2,000*l.* each, so that, if this property should fall short, not of 8,000*l.*, but of 14,000*l.*, there would then be an abatement of the 8,000*l.* The ground of this second objection is of a totally different character from the first objection. It has no reference to the question whether third parties might impeach the sale after it is made, but on the ground that the purchasers have been misled, that is, they were led to suppose they were buying a thing of considerable value without reference to its liability or non-liability to abatement, and they found they had bought something of much less value; and that this was occasioned by the omission of a true or full representation in the particulars of sale. Now, the right of the mortgagors was contingent. There were four of them, brothers, of the name of Reade, and in the event of any one of the four being alive at the death of the testator's widow, who was tenant for life, then that one would have a right to receive 8,000*l.*, with a liability to abate pari passu with three other charges, out of the testator's residuary property; therefore, the 8,000*l.* was contingent upon some one or more of those four brothers surviving the widow; and besides that interest they had an interest in the reversion. That is the nature of the second objection.

As to the first objection, the mortgage gave a power of sale which was to arise upon non-payment of the mortgage-money, and after notice had been given that the mortgagees intended to exercise their power of sale. It is not in controversy but that a proper notice was given in writing requiring payment of the mortgage-money, and also that on non-payment of the money a notice of sale was given three months before the sale. There was then a power of sale, and that power authorized special conditions. The language is this: they are to be at liberty to sell either by public auction or private contract to any person or persons who shall be willing to become the purchaser or purchasers of the same, or any of them or any part thereof respectively, for the best price in money that can be reasonably obtained for the same, and subject to such special or other conditions of sale as they, the mortgagees (that is, the Faulkners), their executors, administrators or assigns, shall think proper, with full power to buy in, and so on; that this sale may take place either with or without the concurrence of the mortgagors, or any of them, and shall, whether the mortgagors shall or shall not join therein or assent thereto, be to all intents and purposes valid and effectual. That is the effect of the clause, and at the end of that portion where it is stipulated that the power of sale shall not be exercised until after three months' notice, come these words:—"It being the intent and meaning of all the parties to these presents that any such sale or disposition shall not be voidable or void by reason of the same having been unnecessary and improper, or for want of the notice hereinbefore required, but that the remedy (if any) of the said G. Reade, W. Reade, Redmond Reade and J. Reade, their and every of their executors, &c. shall be only for damages against the person or persons exercising such power of sale." The mortgagees put up the property for sale under special conditions, and this first objection is, that one of these conditions (the ninth) is such a condition as would render the sale—at least it is doubtful whether it would not—render the sale void against the mortgagors, so that the mortgagors could after the sale file a bill or take proceedings for the purpose of setting aside the sale. Now the ninth condition is this: "In case any objection or requisition be made in respect of the title or otherwise, which the vendors shall be unwilling or unable to remove or satisfy, the vendors shall be at liberty to rescind the sale on returning the deposit, without interest or costs, notwithstanding any steps taken by them in the mean time to clear up any such objection or comply with any such requisition." It is said that that condition is depreciatory; that is to say, that its tendency is to operate in two ways. First of all, its tendency is to diminish the number of persons who will be willing to bid; and secondly, even to those persons who do come and are willing to bid, it will be an inducement not to give so high a price as they would if such a condition were not imposed. Now that is the way in which the condition is said to be depreciatory. Let us consider for a moment what is the obligation of a mortgagee selling under a power of sale; or, which is the same thing in other words, transposing the two, what are the rights of the mortgagee with respect to a power of sale exercised by him, and more especially when the mortgagor has given to the mortgagee express power to sell upon special or other conditions that the mortgagee may think fit. I am by no means disposed to say this, that any condition, whatever its nature, would be justified under that permission, that is, for the imposition of special conditions; but this I do say, the effect of that clause, in my opinion, is this, that any condition, special or otherwise, which a prudent and reasonable owner of property, if he were the absolute owner and were selling his own property, would impose, is such a condition as is entirely justified by that clause. Even without that clause in the power of sale, authorizing, in express terms, the insertion or imposition of special conditions, what are the relative positions of mortgagor and mortgagee, when the mortgagee is selling? The mortgagee is certainly not a dry trustee; he stands in a different position from a trustee. However, he may be a trustee in some sense, or perhaps, to speak more correctly, may become a trustee; still the mortgagee does not stand in the naked position of a trustee. A mortgagee has his rights; he has a beneficial interest, and that interest is the realizing of his security; in other words, getting paid his mortgage-money, interest and any costs he may incur. That is his right; but this Court will not allow him to exercise that right without a due consideration of the interest of the mortgagor; and undoubtedly the interest of the mortgagor, which the mortgagee, in my opinion, is bound to attend to, requires that the sale shall take place as beneficially to the mortgagor as if the mortgagor himself were selling the property. The object of the mortgagee is, of course, to realize the utmost amount from the property; but this must be borne in mind—it does not follow, that by certain conditions the effect of which would be that you realize the utmost at the sale, that, therefore, it is necessarily the best for the mortgagor; for the conditions may be such that, after selling for what is a good price, you may incur immense expense and, after all, fail in enforcing the contract, which would be to the detriment of the mortgagor or the person interested in the sale. It does not follow, therefore, because your conditions do in any respect tend to depreciate the sum which may be bidden, that therefore because it is depreciatory in that sense it is a condition which is to the detriment and disadvantage of the mortgagor; because, if such a condition were to the detriment and disadvantage of a mortgagor when a mortgagee is selling under a power of sale, it would be equally to the detriment and disadvantage of an absolute owner selling, and yet we find that when an absolute owner is selling now-a-days, at least now that these matters are much more minutely provided for than they used to be even in our own personal recollection, it is a very ordinary, reasonable, wise, cautious and prudent clause for an absolute owner to introduce when he is selling; and not only is it so much considered a reasonable clause for an absolute owner to introduce, but many leading conveyancers, without saying all, of the first eminence, consider it extremely proper to be introduced when a sale is being made by a mortgagee under the ordinary power of sale. Now, what I have to suggest as the strong impression upon my mind is this, that the question is not simply whether the clause, or any given clause or condition, may tend to diminish either the number of bidders, or the sum which any given bidders, or any set of bidders, might be disposed to bid, and so make a condition necessarily on that account an improper condition as between mortgagee and mortgagor; but it is this, if it tends to the detriment of the mortgagor, so it would tend to the detriment of an absolute owner, or if it would be prudent in an absolute owner, it is not imprudent as regards a mortgagor. Now, in the sense of being depreciatory, let it be considered for one moment, why is a condition said to be depreciatory? Because, as I have said, it tends either to diminish the probable number of bidders, that is, to deter persons from bidding, or in so far as it tends to deter those who do bid, from bidding up to so high a figure. And why has it that tendency? Because it tends to cripple what would without such condition be the right of the purchaser. If you consider for a moment, every condition which tends to put any fetter upon a purchaser which he would not be subject to without it, is a depreciatory condition. I referred, in the course of the argument, to the other conditions, which are not objected to at all. Those conditions surely are as depreciatory as the condition in question, and more stringent conditions perhaps one scarcely ever saw introduced into conditions of sale. Let us take the fifth. In the ordinary course the purchaser would have a right to require a sixty years' clear title produced. But what says the fifth condition? "Any covenant for production of deeds or documents which the purchaser may be entitled to require, shall be prepared by the solicitors, and at the expense of the purchasers." That would not be the case under ordinary circumstances. It would be at the expense of the vendor. Here is a fetter—a cripple upon the purchaser; but the condition goes on, "all attested and other copies and abstracts of or extracts from deeds, wills, or other documents, and generally all statutory declarations, certificates and documentary or other evidence or information not in the vendors' possession, which may be required by the purchaser, either in verification of the abstract or otherwise, shall be obtained, made and furnished by and at the expense of the purchaser." Just contrast that with the rule of the Court, where there is no condition at all. But what is really the effect of the fifth, and the other conditions? It is not objected that they are incomplete; no fault is found with them. It is admitted that they are not objectionable. Why? Because they are extremely reasonable; they are such as an absolute owner—who certainly has, as much as these mortgagees have, an object in getting the utmost they can get for the property—would use, and absolute owners are in the habit of introducing such clauses; therefore, although depreciatory—that is, although they have the tendency of depreciation to which I have adverted—they are not on that account clauses which are objectionable, either in the case of an absolute owner trying to get the best price he can, or in the case of a mortgagee who is bound to get the best he can. Now, with regard to this ninth condition, undoubtedly the effect of it is this, that after any amount of negotiation, and after any objections or requisitions, and after any attempts that may have been made to answer those requisitions, the vendors would have the right to say, "Well, you make requisitions; I do not say whether I am able or not, but I am unwilling to satisfy your requisitions, and therefore I rescind the contract." It would give that power; and, no doubt, that is a power which might be exercised most capriciously and absurdly. An absolute owner might, after going on for half-a-year as these parties were going on, writing letters backwards and forwards to their solicitors, in the end say, "Well, now I have got the power to answer your requisitions, I can tell you exactly what you want, but I do not choose to do it." And it might be capriciously and absurdly exercised when the condition was imposed by an absolute owner. But what is the purpose of such a clause when an absolute owner is selling? The great object of an absolute owner, when he is selling the property, is to place the matter in such a manner and form as that he may escape the liability of a Chancery suit. For really, as things have gone, people on selling property have a very fair chance, under ordinary circumstances, of involving themselves in a Chancery suit for specific performance, either by themselves against the purchaser or by the purchaser against themselves. That is the feeling people have; and therefore a vendor casts about, and says, "How shall I escape this? Not merely because I may, when the Chancery suit is determined, be found not to have a good title—not merely upon that ground, but because, even if I succeed and get a decree for specific performance, and have my title established, beyond the costs I may get from my adversary—if I get them at all—I shall have to pay my own solicitor his extra bill of costs between solicitor and client, which will be a very serious diminution of the purchase-money, besides the vexation and delay which will take place." It is very natural that a vendor should say, "I must try and discover some means of escaping from this liability, risk and chance"; and therefore it is that this clause has been devised. The clause, as originally devised, was this, that when the vendor is unable to answer the requisitions, or to satisfy the objections, then he shall have power to rescind the contract. That was evidently with a view to escape the risk I have mentioned—a suit, and the loss of that which is to the detriment of the vendor or the owner of the property. In practice it is found that your saying you are unable does not shew that you are unable. You may tell the purchaser that you are unable to answer his requisitions, but he has a right to say, "I know you are able; and I insist upon it that you are able, and if you are able, you are bound to do it; and therefore I shall file a bill against you in order to compel you to do it." So that that clause with the word "unable" did not, when it was tried, succeed in accomplishing the object intended. The conveyancers then considered—How shall we mend this? Here is a hole which we must repair in some way; and then they devised the addition of the word "unwilling." And it is the only word, when you come to consider it, which can accomplish the object you have in view; namely, to give the vendor a power of saying, "Rather than involve myself in litigation, rather than run the risk of loss which I shall sustain, even if I succeed, and still more if I fail, I will give up the contract and put an end to it. It is true I shall have incurred a certain amount of expense in the discussion, but it is better for me to lose that which I must lose in any event, whether I enforce the purchase or not, than run any risk." That was found to be for the advantage, on the whole, of vendors who are absolute owners. Why is it less to the advantage of mortgagees, where the mortgagees are selling under a power of sale? Let it be remembered that if the mortgagee, acting properly, acting as a reasonable owner would do, puts up the property for sale and the sale goes on, and there is a long negotiation, as there has been in this case, which of course increases expense, and then a suit—even if the vendor succeeds in enforcing the contract, the vendor, that is, the mortgagee, would have a right as between himself and the mortgagor to make the purchaser pay all the expenses which were properly incurred in the sale. But if, on the other hand, he does not succeed in enforcing the contract, if he has acted properly, the mortgagor, that is, the mortgaged property, must bear all the expense occasioned by that litigation; and therefore it is for the benefit of the mortgagor, just as much as it is for the benefit of a careful and prudent absolute owner, that such a clause, even though it may be said to have a depreciatory effect, should be introduced. And, indeed, as it has been pointed out in Hobson v. Bell, that distinction was drawn—that is, there may be conditions which are depreciatory, but not so depreciatory as to be improper between mortgagor and mortgagee. The tendency (which I quite admit) of this clause is to deter purchasers; its tendency, not its necessary effect—because I believe, in point of fact, it has very little effect,—but admitting that its tendency, giving due meaning to the word “tendency,” is to deter purchasers from bidding so high as they would; admitting that, still it is not so depreciatory as to be improper, provided it is upon the whole a prudent, wise and proper thing, when an absolute owner is selling. Hobson v. Bell, I think, tends to shew that if the case be as I have stated, such a condition may be prudent and proper with respect to the sale of property by mortgagees. After all, though that may be the opinion of the Court, still, the principle of the Court is, not to throw a doubt upon the title of the purchaser; and of course that principle I must act upon. And, moreover, I adopt fully and entirely the view which was taken by Turner, L.J., when Vice Chancellor, in the case of Pyrke v. Waddingham. I adopt this principle in order to determine what sort of doubt, or what degree of doubt, is to bring you to the conclusion that the title is doubtful, so that you ought not to enforce it upon the purchaser. Now the question I have to ask myself is this—supposing that this sale is completed, and that after the whole thing is settled, a bill were filed by these four brothers, or by any of them, or by any of the assignees of any of them who have become bankrupt, against the purchaser, on the ground that this condition was an improper condition as regards themselves, have I any doubt whether they would succeed or fail in their object? and whether I think it is a matter of reasonable doubt that any Court will give them relief. What relief would they seek? They would say that they were entitled to recover the property upon paying the mortgage-money. I confess I cannot entertain a doubt upon that subject. I have been very much impressed with the observations that were made by the Master of the Rolls in that case of Hoy v. Smythies. I entirely accede to the force of those observations. I have made the same observations myself repeatedly, that I wonder people should go and bid at sales where they are hampered by all sorts of conditions, and perhaps this condition one of them. I confess my own feeling is, that it is a reasonable condition. The great object of this vendor is to avoid litigation; and I am sure that is my object; and therefore, if I make requisitions which he is unwilling to answer, although possibly he may be acting from mere caprice, and after leading me a long dance for six months, he may turn round and say capriciously, “I will not inform you.” I will not suppose that any man would act upon that principle; it is contrary to his interest to do so; he gets nothing by it; and I will not assume it; but I confess my own feelings would be that it was not a very strong objection, or, indeed, any objection at all. I do not think it would deter me from bidding what I thought to be a fair value, even if there were not that consideration. That is my feeling about it, but that may be personal to myself. I do not put that forward strongly ; but this I do feel, I wonder that people should be willing to bid with such very peculiar and stringent conditions, which, from their peculiarity, make it extremely difficult to put a construction upon them. On the other hand, I have some feeling with regard to this—I wonder that people should go and take shares in a joint-stock bank ; I consider it almost a mark, I was going to say, of insanity ; at all events, if you ask me whether I would allow the property of a ward of Court in chambers to be laid out in such a manner, I should say, most unquestionably not. I may have that feeling ; but the question is, what is felt and thought upon the subject by mankind ? How does it operate ? How do mankind, who look to their own interest, view it ? Now what do we find with regard to this condition ? First of all, it is not uncommon now to introduce it when a sale takes place by a vendor who is absolute owner, whose wish and sole object is to get the best price he can ; that is, to get, when the whole thing is completed, the utmost amount of money into his pocket. And then I find this, that conveyancers of the first eminence, and conveyancers who have not only considered the matter in their practice, but who have deliberately considered the matter with a view to put in print and publish their own views and sentiments of what they find to be, what they know to be the practice, and what they consider to be the right practice—I find that the leading conveyancers, in their published treatises—which, although not authorities for this Court to act upon in its decisions, are entitled to great respect and consideration, as pointing out the practice—consider it to be a reasonable and proper condition to be introduced, when a sale takes place by the mortgagee under a common power of sale without any special clause about conditions. Can I conceive, in that state of things, where these sales have taken place over and over again, and even after this sale had taken place, if a bill were filed by the mortgagor against the purchaser to recover the property, that any Court would give relief ? I confess I cannot bring myself to that conclusion. It appears to me to be a reasonable clause. That it is depreciatory in the sense in which every condition which restricts or fetters the rights of a purchaser can be considered depreciatory, I admit. But that it is reasonable and proper, and therefore not so depreciatory as to be improper against the mortgagor, I also believe. Therefore, adopting as I have said the principle to its fullest extent as laid down by Turner, L.J., in the case of Pyrke v. Waddingham, I ask myself whether I think any Court would give such relief ? I do not think it would.

Now I do not rely upon this, but at the same time I think I may mention this other circumstance, which I think would operate as a special circumstance in the present case to prevent any relief being given, which would be this, upon the question whether it was a proper or an improper condition to introduce as between mortgagor and mortgagee where the mortgagee is selling : we have here one of the mortgagors concurring in this very condition being introduced ; I do not mean to say that would bind the others—I think it would not at all—still it would be a circumstance to shew that one at least of the mortgagors considered it to be a reasonable condition ; but that, as I said before, I do not rely upon, and in the absence of that circumstance I should come to just the same conclusion. Being of that opinion with regard to the objection, it is not necessary that I should go into the question which has been raised, whether that objection has been waived. I am of opinion that it has not been waived ; but whether it has been waived or not, it appears to me that it is not a sufficient objection. Nor do I go into the question whether there has been any concurrence of the other mortgagors. For the same reason I do not go into that. At the same time, if I were asked to express any opinion upon it, I should say, certainly I am of opinion that there has been no concurrence of the mortgagors.

I come now to the other objection, which is of a totally different character. Here, as I have said, the objection is, whether there is anything in the representations made by the particulars to mislead a bidder or to lead this purchaser to suppose that he was bidding for an article which he has not got ; that is, bidding for an article without certain restrictions, when, in fact, those restrictions do exist. Now, it appears to me that there is really nothing in that objection. The objection is this: it appears by the testator's will, that he gives a sum charged on all his property, real and personal, which he had given to his wife for life, and directs it to be sold, to raise a sum of 14,000*l.* Of that 14,000*l.*, 8,000*l.* is to go to these four Reades, or such of them as should be living at the death of the wife. Then, that left 6,000*l.* of the 14,000*l.*: 2,000*l.* of the 6,000*l.* were given to one, under a similar condition upon the contingency of his surviving the widow; and another 2,000*l.* to another, and another 2,000*l.* to a third, under similar contingencies; and the residue of the property, subject to the charge of those sums, amounting to 14,000*l.*, is given to certain nephews, amongst whom are these four. Now, the only question is as to the 8,000*l.*, which was the subject of the first lot. It is clear, then, upon that, that the 8,000*l.* and the three sums of 2,000*l.* each would, in the absence of any declaration on the part of the testator one way or the other, be chargeable pari passu, and if there were a deficiency of the fund, if the fund did not produce 14,000*l.*—which it might not—then the 8,000*l.* and the three sums of 2,000*l.* each would abate pari passu, according to that gift. The testator added a clause that they should abate; but if there were no such clause, they would equally abate. I do not apprehend that there can be the least doubt upon the construction of the will in that respect. There was nothing whatever in the will to make the 8,000*l.*—I mean independent of the direction that they should abate—payable in priority; but at all events, the testator said that they should abate pro rata in case the fund did not produce 14,000*l.* Now, let us see what is the effect of the representation made by the particulars of sale—that is, do the particulars of sale so describe the property as to lead any one fairly to conclude that the 8,000*l.* as put up for sale was 8,000*l.* not liable to abatement pari passu with the three sums of 2,000*l.* each? If they do, then would come the question, Were you, the purchaser, misled? The purchaser here, I must bear in mind, is a company, and of course a company acting carefully, a reversionary interest society acting carefully and deliberately in all their purchases, acting under the advice of most competent persons, both legal and what I may call financial, of a person accustomed to the business of an actuary, and acting under the most careful deliberation and the best advice—but does their solicitor, or anybody on their part, who of course advises them; does their actuary, does any one of their directors, does their managing director or their managing person, suggest that when he looked at these particulars he thought that what was put up for sale was 8,000*l.* not liable to abatement with the three other sums? There is not a word to such an effect. Still I must look to see whether the words used are calculated to mislead. Now, first of all, in what may be called the title-page of the particulars and conditions of sale, there is this description of the property: "Important reversions on the death of a lady in her sixty-seventh year." Now, if you stop there, you would say these reversions are not contingent at all. But, of course, you must look to the will; you must not conclude that they are not contingent; you must read the whole of the particulars of sale. Then the title-page goes on: "Particulars and conditions of a sale of a reversion to a certain sum of 8,000*l.*, and to a sum of about 4,000*l.*, payable on the decease of a lady in her sixty-seventh year, which will be sold by auction," and so on, at such a place. Now, here we have a reversion to a certain sum of 8,000*l.*, and to a sum of about 4,000*l.* What is that sum of about 4,000*l.*? Clearly, upon the face of the particulars, it is this: as I have said, the four mortgagors, the four Reades, and some other nephews of the testator, are entitled among them to his residuary property, upon a certain contingency,—that of their surviving the widow. Now, taking the number of nephews—I do not mean to say it is set out in the particulars of sale, because the number of nephews is not set out—but taking the number of nephews, they estimate the chance of these four nephews to be 4,000*l.* No doubt it was roughly taken in this way: "Here is property worth 24,000*l.* or 25,000*l.*, and here is 14,000*l.* of charges; that would leave 10,000*l.*; and here are ten nephews, and if each survive he will have about 1,000*l.* Here are four selling their chance, and that amounts in a rough way to 4,000*l.*" Understand me; I am not saying that all that is set out, but that is obviously what it amounts to. Let me see what is meant by "a certain sum of 8,000*l.* and a sum of about 4,000*l.*" Certainly it does not mean that it is not liable to contingency at all, because it says in the next line but one, contingent upon one of four younger lives surviving her, that is the lady of sixty-seven; so that it does not mean it is not contingent; but what does it mean? It means that whereas the 8,000*l.* is a fixed sum, the 4,000*l.*, which is the other lot, is not a fixed sum; that it is an uncertain sum; it is a share of residue which is uncertain, and that is the meaning of the word "certain" in the first page. But now let us come to the particulars themselves. Lot No. 1. is described thus:—"A reversionary absolute sum of 8,000*l.* cash." Now, there it is called an absolute sum, not a certain sum. Absolute does not mean that it is not liable to contingency, because it is expressed to be liable to contingency. Then, what is meant by absolute? It is meant that it is a fixed sum; it is a fixed sum in contradistinction to the second lot, which is uncertain and not fixed, because it is a share in residue which is not only liable to charges, but liable to expenses, costs, and so on. "A reversionary absolute sum of 8,000*l.* cash, payable on the decease of a lady in her sixty-seventh year, less the legacy duty, in case (here is the contingency enunciated) four persons, aged respectively forty-two, thirty-six, thirty-eight and twenty-seven, or any of them, shall survive her." Then we come to this: "This sum of 8,000*l.* is charged by the will of the late James Reade, Esq., of Berkeley Street, Portman Square, on the property mentioned below in favour of his four nephews named in his will, together with a policy of assurance that was to secure a certain sum in the event of all or one of the four surviving the widow." Then, according to this title-page, one would not have known how the 8,000*l.* was created, how it was secured upon the property. It might have been under any unknown circumstances; but here we have the fact that it is a charge under a gentleman's will, and it is a charge on the property which is mentioned below. There is no mention there of any other charge; and if that were all, and there were nothing more in the particulars, undoubtedly it would have represented that there was 8,000*l.* chargeable upon this property; and no mention being made of any other charge, it would be fair to conclude upon the reading of this, that it was 8,000*l.*, and if the property amounted to 8,000*l.* you will get paid; but in the second lot of the very reversionary interest of these four persons in the residue of the property subject to this charge we have a further description. Lot 2 is described as "the contingent shares of the same four persons in the produce of the residuary property of the above-named testator. The property is not divisible until the death of the widow of the testator, now in her sixty-seventh year. It consists of the several particulars mentioned below." Then it goes on to say what the property is subject to. The property is subject, besides the life interest of the testator's widow, to the two following contingent charges: first, the above sum of 8,000*l.*, payable in the event above referred to; and, secondly, three other sums of 2,000*l.*, payable in case any of the children of the testator's brother John Reade, of whom there are four now living, shall survive the widow of the testator; making 14,000*l.*, and which sum, that is, 14,000*l.*, is a first charge upon the testator's estate." What is represented there is this, that this property, this lot 2, which we are now selling, is the contingent share of these four persons in the residue, after satisfying that charge of 14,000*l.*, which consists of four portions, a charge of 8,000*l.* and a charge of 2,000*l.*, and two other charges of 2,000*l.* each. What is the effect of that? Is it that the 8,000*l.* is to be paid in priority to each of the 2,000*l.*, or one of the 2,000*l.* to be paid in priority to another of the 2,000*l.*? Anybody reading this would come to the conclusion, as the advisers of this Reversionary Interest Society did come to the conclusion, that they were buying that charge of 8,000*l.* subject and liable to abatement pari passu, and having no priority over the three sums of 2,000*l.* each. Then it goes on to describe the property which is the subject of this charge, that is, amounting to 14,000*l.*, and the residue of which constitutes lot 2.

There is a freehold and copyhold house, and there are various shares in divers railway companies; and there is a small sum of 3*l.* per cent. annuities. Now, I confess it does appear to me, that it is impossible to suggest that there is anything upon the face of these conditions to mislead anybody, or to lead any one not only to the conclusion but to the suspicion that it was meant to be represented that the 8,000*l.* was prior in point of charge to the sums of 2,000*l.* each. It is true that the particulars do not set out the clause in the will which expressly provides that there should be no priority, but an abatement pari passu in the event of the property not producing 14,000*l.* It does not set out that, it is true; but it sets out that which produces precisely the same effect. It sets out that here is, by the testator's will, property which is described now as consisting of such and such particulars, which is charged with 8,000*l.* and three sums of 2,000*l.* each, making 14,000*l.*, and that 14,000*l.* the first charge; and then, subject to that, they are selling the second lot, the shares of these four persons. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the second objection is not maintainable; and therefore the decree must be prefaced with what is stated to be the agreement between the parties, upon which I have undertaken to express my opinion upon the two points. The decree must be for specific performance, and for the payment of the residue of the purchase-money, with the consequential directions as regards costs. It appears to me, without imputing anything wrong to the purchasers, who are, of course, desirous of having a complete title, that they have raised objections which are not tenable, and I think I am bound to make them pay the general costs of the suit.

His Honour afterwards said, that the portion of the costs occasioned by the evidence as to the value of the testator's property, and by the contention raised as to the loss of interest, should be paid by the plaintiffs as not being strictly necessary for the decision of the question between the parties.

 } CHAPTER OF WESTMINSTER.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Corporation Lands—Dividends—Purchase-Money.

A railway company, under the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, took lands belonging to a corporation, which were then let on lease. The value of the reversion was alone assessed, it being understood that rents were to be paid to the corporation during the existence of the leases. Upon a petition by the corporation, asking for the investment of the purchase-money,—Held, that the purchase was made as of property in possession, and that the dividends were payable to the corporation, and ought not to be accumulated up to the falling in of the reversion.

The Hampstead Junction Railway Company was incorporated by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. ccxxii.; it included the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The term for making the railway was also extended by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. lii.

The company required, for the purposes of the railway, several pieces of land in the parish of St. John's, Hampstead, of which the Dean and Chapter of Westminster were seised in fee, one containing 8 a. 0 r. 32 p.; this (inter alia) was demised by an indenture dated the 26th of December 1808, to Thomas Roberts, for three lives, and the life of the longest liver of them, at a yearly rent of 1*l.* 12*s.* Another piece contained 1 a. 3 r. 3 p.; and this, on the 13th of October 1855, they agreed to demise, with other lands, to Henry Davidson, for ninety-nine years, at an aggregate yearly rent of 23*l.* 10*s.*

The dean and chapter and the company, in consequence of differences as to the value, appointed an arbitrator to determine the amount to be paid by the company for the absolute purchase of the land, and as compensation for damage or injury likely to be sustained by the execution of the works, as well as by the severance of the land from the other parts of the estate.

The arbitrator assessed and awarded, to be paid by the company, 3,300*l.* for the absolute purchase of the 8a. Or. 32p., subject to the lease, and 105*l.* for the 1a. 3r. 3p., subject to the lease agreed to be granted. He also awarded 3,700*l.* as the amount to be paid to the dean and chapter for compensation for damage and severance in respect of the 8a. Or. 32p. He also stated that he had fixed the several sums on the principle that the respective leasees were to continue paying to the dean and chapter the whole of the rents reserved by the leases during the remainder of the terms existing therein.

The railway company paid into court the sum of 7,105*l.*, the amount of the sums awarded, and also a sum of 529*l.* 1s. 3d. for interest on the purchase-money.

The dean and chapter, by their petition, now asked that the 529*l.* 1s. 3d. might be paid to them, and that the 7,105*l.* might be invested, and that the dividends accruing thereon, from time to time, might be paid to them.

Mr. R. Palmer, for the dean and chapter, in support of the petition, referred to Ex parte the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester (1).

Mr. Speed, for the company. — The petitioners are to receive the whole reserved rent during the continuance of the leases; it would seem, therefore, that the dividends to accrue from the sums to be invested ought to be accumulated until the expiration of the existing terms.

Nov. 24.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

—I must consider the value of the property to have been computed as if the purchase was made of property in possession; and adopting the principle of those cases which hold that where the reversion is taken by the railway company the person entitled to the reversion shall only take so much of the rents and so much of the dividends as correspond to the amount which they would have received if the matter had remained unconverted, and also that the rest is to accumulate for the purpose of making payments at the end of the term of what would have been the absolute value of the property, I am of opinion that this is not a case of that description, but that it is a case where,

having regard to the agreements that were entered into for letting the property on building leases, and obtaining the surrender for that purpose, it must be treated as property bought in possession, and, consequently, that the Dean and Chapter of Westminster are entitled to the dividends upon this fund. I concur in the cases, and do not mean in any respect to disturb them by what I now state.

KINDERLEY, V.C. } THORNER v. WILSON.
Nov. 8.

Annuity—Upon what Property chargeable—Mixed Fund for Payment of Debts—Charitable Devise.

*A testator devised certain estates in fee, subject nevertheless, and he thereby charged the same estates with the payment of an annuity of 80*l.* a year. He also devised other estates to trustees upon trust to sell and apply the proceeds arising from such sale, together with his personal estate, which he bequeathed to them, in discharge of his debts and legacies; and if any surplus should remain, the testator directed the same to be paid to the then minister of a Catholic chapel, to whom he gave and bequeathed the same:—Held, that the annuity of 80*l.* was a charge upon the corpus of the estates; that the fund for payment of debts and legacies was a mixed fund; and that the devise of the surplus of the proceeds arising from the sale of the property to the Catholic minister was void under the Statute of Mortmain.*

A question was raised in this case upon the construction of the will of John Mount, dated the 30th of December 1843. The testator being seised and possessed of freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates, and also of personal property, gave to his wife Margaret the use of the dwelling-house in which he then resided, together with the furniture and appurtenances, for her natural life; and after her decease he gave and devised the same to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Lawkland, in the parish of Clapham, in the West Riding of the county of York, and his successors, ministers of the same chapel, for ever, as an addition to the stipend of such chapel. And he gave and devised to Thomas Wilkinson, minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, and to his successors for ever, all those his estates called Stock's Mill, with the cottages adjoining, Small Tree, with the cottages adjoining, and Red Tree, with the cottages adjoining (except the close of land thereafter devised to William Allen), with one Mossdale, in Craka Moss, all situate in the township of Skelsmere, in the parish of Kendal, in the county of Westmoreland; also one other Mossdale in Doate's Moss, in the parish of Arton, subject, nevertheless, and he thereby charged the same estates with the payment of 80*l.* a year to his said wife, for her natural life, which was to be in lieu and satisfaction of all dower which she might be entitled to out of his estates; and he directed that the same should be paid to her by two equal half-yearly payments on the days therein mentioned; with power of distress. He also gave to the officiating minister of the said Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, for and during the term of seven years next after his decease, the rents and profits of all those the said testator's two allotments, called "Lord's Allotment" and "Commissioner's Allotment," situate in the said township of Skelsmere. He gave and devised unto Richard Wilson, of Kendal aforesaid, gentleman, and William Ellison, of Sizer, in the said county of Westmoreland, gentleman, all that his estate called "Bowstone," situate in the parish of Strickland Kettle, in the said county of Westmoreland; and also the said two allotments, called "Lord's Allotment" and "Commissioner's Allotment," subject to the said term therein of seven years; to hold the same, with the appurtenances, unto them the said Richard Wilson and William Ellison, and the survivor of them, their or his heirs and assigns for ever, upon the trusts following, (that is to say,) upon trust that they the said Richard Wilson and William Ellison, and the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, should absolutely sell and dispose of the same premises at such time and manner as therein mentioned, and should apply the money arising from such sale or sales, together with his personal estate, which he thereby bequeathed to them, in satisfaction and discharge of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies thereafter by him bequeathed, and if any surplus should remain, the said testator ordered and directed the same to be paid to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal aforesaid, to whom he gave and bequeathed the same, and who he thereby declared should be his residuary legatee.

The testator died in December 1843, leaving the plaintiff, his sister, and heiress-at-law and sole next-of-kin, him surviving. The bill prayed that it might be declared that the gifts to the Roman Catholic priests were void, and that the trustees who had taken possession of the estates might be ordered to give them up to the plaintiff, and for an account and receiver.

The case came on for argument on the 26th of April 1855, (reported in 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 667), when the Vice Chancellor decided that the three gifts to Catholic priests, that is to say, the devise of the dwelling-house to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Lawkland, his successors, ministers of the same chapel, for ever, as an addition to the stipend of such chapel; and the devise to T. Wilkinson, minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, and to his successors, for ever; and the gift to the officiating minister of the chapel at Kendal, of the rents and profits of two estates for seven years next after his decease, were all void under the Statute of Mortmain, as being intended solely for the benefit of the church and not of the individuals; but as regarded the residuary devise, His Honour said, it was useless to express an opinion until the accounts had been taken. That question was, therefore, reserved; and the accounts having now been taken, the matter came on again for argument, upon the questions, whether the annuity of 80*l.* per annum to the testator's wife was a charge upon the corpus of the estate, whether the money applicable to the payment of debts and legacies was a mixed fund, and whether the gift of the surplus of the proceeds arising from the sale of the estates to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal was a good beneficial gift to such minister.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Sidney Smith appeared for the plaintiff; and cited Foster v. Smith (1).

Mr. Anderson appeared for one of the defendants.

Mr. Wickens, for the Crown, cited Roberts v. Walker (2) and Boughton v. Boughton (3).

Mr. Shapter and Mr. Wakefield, for the representatives of the minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, cited Cable v. Cable (4).

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—With respect to the gift to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, it is clearly a devise to a charity. There are previous gifts of the same nature, which I have already decided to be void under the Statute of Mortmain, and I see no reason to question the correctness of that decision. The testator has devised his Bowstone estate and other property, subject to the term of seven years, to trustees, upon trust to sell the same and apply the proceeds, together with his personal estate, in discharge of his debts, testamentary expenses and legacies, and if any surplus should remain, the testator directed the same to be paid to the then minister of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kendal, to whom he gave and bequeathed the same, and the testator makes him his residuary legatee. Can there be any doubt that the intention was to benefit the minister, that is, the chapel, by giving so much to the person who should be the then minister thereof? The question, whether there is a charitable gift, depends not merely on the fact that there is a gift to an individual described as the minister, but upon the question whether the testator designates the individual, or gives the legacy to the person who happens to fill the office. A gift to a minister—quâ minister—is a charitable bequest. Instances were put in the course of the argument of a gift to the Court of Chancery, to the Attorney General, or to the Queen. But those instances do not apply, for they are not and cannot be charitable objects. But here I think the intention clearly was to benefit the minister and chapel; and it was not a personal bequest, with a mere description of the individual. Had there been a gift of 1,000*l.* to the person now minister, &c., that would have been different; as the testator might not be acquainted with his name, and could only describe him by his office. It may be observed, also, that the surplus cannot be realized until seven years after the testator's death; that, I think, renders the case still more conclusive. As to the trust for sale, I am of opinion that the testator meant to make a mixed fund, and not a fund in aid of the personalty. He gave the estate to be sold, and then proceeded thus:—"And should apply the money arising from such sale or sales, together with his personal estate," &c.; that is, he constituted a mixed fund, composed of the two classes of property. There must, therefore, be an ascertainment and apportionment of those classes. Then, as to the charge of the 80*l.* annuity. If the testator had given real estate and charged it absolutely, without adverting to the rents and profits, either with a gross or an annual sum, that would have been a charge upon the corpus. If the testator had been told that the rents would more than produce that sum, he might have said, "Well, then, pay it out of the rent;" but as the case stands, the gift is an absolute gift of the estate, charged with so much, and the person who takes the devise must take it so charged.

Principal and Surety—Right of Surety to have the Shares of the Receiver, a Party to the Cause, applied in discharge of Payments made by him—Mortgage to Surety.

B. B. was entitled as heir-at-law to shares in the estate of S. B., under administration in this court. He also became entitled, by purchase from parties interested, to other shares. He was appointed receiver of the rents, and gave the usual security. B. B. became a defaulter, and his sureties were compelled to pay the full amount of their recognizances, which was not sufficient to satisfy the deficiency. One of the Vice Chancellors decided that, inasmuch as the parties to the suit other than B. B. were entitled to say that B. B. should take nothing until they were paid in full their shares, and as the money paid in by the sureties was applicable to make good those shares as far as it would go, the sureties had an equity to be re-couped all they had paid out of the shares of B. B. after these shares had made good all that remained due to the other parties after exhausting the money paid in by the sureties. B. B. had executed a mortgage to the sureties of all his shares as heir-at-law, but "not the shares he had purchased." He became bankrupt, and his assignees sold these shares, and the Vice Chancellor decided that the purchaser from the assignees could not stand in a better position than the assignees, who took only subject to the same equity as B. B.:—Held, on appeal, that the decision was correct, the mortgage making no difference in the rights of the sureties.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, made on the 27th of March 1857, on further directions, and on two petitions in the above-named cause, and eleven other causes arising out of the same.

The appeal was presented by Mr. Glover, a surety for William Barnard John Brandon (hereinafter in this report called Barnard Brandon), the receiver in the cause and a party interested under the will of Samuel Brandon, the testator in the cause, the administration of whose estate was the object of the original suit. The appeal was against one clause of a voluminous decree, and the question raised will appear from the following abridgment of the judgment of the Vice Chancellor. After disposing of other parts of the case, his Honour proceeded to say:—"The question I have now to dispose of is of a novel kind, not novel with respect to the general principles upon which the question has been argued, but with respect to the application of those principles. The question is as between the assignees in bankruptcy of Barnard Brandon, the receiver in the cause, and his surety Mr. Glover. Barnard Brandon, the receiver, was entitled as heir-at-law of the testator to real estate undisposed of by the will, and to certain shares and interests of parties who were interested under the will. In April 1839 Barnard Brandon was discharged from being receiver, and an account was directed of the monies in his hands, to whom the same belongs, and in what manner and to whom the same ought to be paid, or for whom the same ought to be invested. In January 1840 Barnard Brandon became bankrupt. In pursuance of the order of 1839, the Master made his report, not satisfying all the inquiries, but finding that 6,277*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.* was due from the receiver. Upon that report a petition was presented in July 1840, by the parties beneficially interested, for the sureties to pay in the amount found due, and a cross-petition by the sureties was presented, on the ground that, as Barnard Brandon was himself interested in some portion of that balance, the sureties, though they might be liable to pay what was necessary to satisfy the interests of the parties other than Barnard Brandon, ought not to be liable to make good that portion of the balance which would be beneficial to Barnard Brandon. On these petitions coming on in November 1840, an order was made on that against the sureties: they were ordered to pay in 4,415*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*," which they subsequently did, and ultimately the amount arrived at 4,700*l.* paid by the sureties.

In order to simplify this statement, it may be right to say that Mr. Glover, one of the sureties, became solely entitled to or interested in respect of the whole 4,700*l.* paid in. The amount of the recognizances executed by each of the sureties was 4,762*l.* Mr. Barnard Brandon, on the 3rd of September 1830, had executed bonds to each surety to indemnify him from all losses by reason of his suretyship. On the 4th of June 1839 Mr. Barnard Brandon executed a mortgage to the sureties, which recited, among other things, the bonds of indemnity to them, the mortgagor's title to certain leasehold estates, his title to certain of the testator's real estates not devised by the will, and his title to certain shares under the will; that there was due from him as receiver about 5,000*l.*, which the sureties were liable to pay, and then reciting, "And whereas the said Barnard Brandon being minded and lious to indemnify and save harmless the said, &c. (sureties, Mr. Glover among them), and each of them, from and against all losses, costs, charges, damages and expenses to arise or be occasioned from or by reason of their having entered into the before-mentioned recognizances, hath consented and agreed to convey, assign and assure unto the said (sureties), their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all the freehold estates and parts and shares thereof to which the said Barnard Brandon is or may be entitled at law or in equity as heir-at-law of the said Samuel Brandon, but not any such shares or interests as the said Barnard Brandon may have acquired by purchase, and his share and interest in the rents and profits thereof; and also the said factory and premises held by the said Barnard Brandon under the said indenture, &c., and the engines, machinery, fixtures, utensils and things therein or thereupon, upon the trusts," &c. after declared.

The deed then witnessed, that Barnard Brandon conveyed "all and singular the messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of freehold nature or tenure, and parts or shares of messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of freehold nature or tenure of which he, the said Barnard Brandon, is or may be seised, or to which he is or may be entitled as the heir-at-law of the said Samuel Brandon, but not otherwise," to hold the same upon the trusts after declared. And it was further witnessed, that he assigned the leasehold premises and plant, machinery and fixtures upon the same trusts. The trusts were for sale at the discretion of the sureties, and after payment of the expenses of sale to retain and reimburse themselves "all such monies respectively as they respectively, or any of them, shall or may have paid under or by reason of the said suretyship, with interest," &c., and all sums they may have to pay by reason of their having executed the said recognizances. "Provided also, &c. that the total amount of the money secured, or to be ultimately recoverable upon this deed or security, shall not exceed the sum of 5,000*l*." The judgment of the Vice Chancellor then proceeded as follows:—"In the year 1843 the assignees of Barnard Brandon put up the interests of Barnard Brandon for sale in six lots, and at that sale one of the lots was purchased by Mr. Glover himself, the surety, and afterwards the other lots were sold to other individuals, and among them to two solicitors, who were the solicitors to parties in the cause." * * "The sureties are ordered to bring in, in addition to the 4,415*l*. 2*s*. 7*d*., that which will make it up the full amount of the penalty of their recognizance, 4,760*l*. They will, therefore, have paid in the whole they were liable to pay, and that sum is a sum which will not satisfy the rights and interests of the parties other than Barnard Brandon. If Barnard Brandon, or the assignees of Barnard Brandon, or the purchasers from those assignees, would be entitled to any portion of the money actually paid in by the sureties, I should consider that the sureties had a direct and original equity against Barnard Brandon himself, and against Barnard Brandon's assignees, and against the purchaser of Barnard Brandon's interest, to get back so much of the 4,700*l*. as appears to belong to Barnard Brandon. But that is not the case. The question now raised and to be determined, is this:—have the sureties an original and direct right against those shares irrespective of the right which they may have to stand in the shoes of what are called the creditors, according to the common equity as between surety and principal. I think there is no such clear and original right. If a surety pays the debt of his principal he has no lien upon any particular property belonging to that principal. He may bring an action to recover and may obtain judgment against any property of the principal, but he has no equity whatever by the mere fact of his paying that which the principal ought to have paid, and for which the surety was merely a surety. Now, in this case, Barnard Brandon—and I will view the matter as if Barnard Brandon had never become bankrupt, and as if these shares had never been sold by his assignees—is entitled to certain interests, and it appears to me that as Barnard Brandon has no interest in the particular sum of 4,700*l*. paid in by the sureties, there is no right in the surety by any direct or original equity to come upon the property which Barnard Brandon is entitled to, although it consists of his shares and interest in property which is administered in this suit. The next question then is, has he the right? Has he a right to apply to this case the well-known common principle, that when a surety pays the debt of his principal he has a right to require that the creditors to whom he makes the payment shall give him the benefit of all those securities of which the creditor might have availed himself as against the principal debtor? That principle is a well-known principle, and has appeared to be so clearly just, that, by a very recent act of parliament (1) more force has been given to it by making it available, even in those cases where the surety has not taken the precaution of protecting himself as a surety before the passing of that act might have done. But now, by that act, a surety may (I may say under all circumstances, speaking generally) have the benefit of those equities, of those securities, which the creditor was entitled to. That principle being a clear principle,

(1) 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97.—This statute was referred to by the counsel for the sureties in consequence of the argument of the counsel for the purchasers from Barnard Brandon's assignee, that there was no principal debtor in the present case. The act is entitled 'An act to amend the laws of England and Ireland affecting trade and commerce,' and the 5th section enacts as follows:—"Every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt or perform such duty, shall be entitled to have assigned to him, or to a trustee for him, every judgment, specialty or other security which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty, whether such judgment, specialty or other security shall or shall not be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt or performance of the duty, and such person shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, and to use all the remedies, and, if need be, and upon a proper indemnity, to use the name of the creditor in any action or other proceeding, at law or in equity, in order to obtain from the principal debtor, or any co-surety, co-contractor or co-debtor, as the case may be, indemnification for the advances made and loss sustained by the person who shall have so paid such debt or performed such duty, and such payment or performance so made by such surety shall not be pleadable in bar of any such action or other proceeding by him: Provided always, that no co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, shall be entitled to recover from any other co-surety, co-contractor or co-debtor, by the means aforesaid, more than the just proportion to which, as between those parties themselves, such last-mentioned person shall be justly liable."

founded on natural justice, recognized by the act of parliament which I have referred to, is it applicable to the present occasion? I think it is. I think that the surety has that right. What is the position of things? The surety is the surety for the due accounting of the receiver. It is true that he is not a surety giving a security directly to the parties beneficially interested, but the Court in taking possession of the property by its receiver requires recognizances to be given by the sureties, in order to secure to the parties beneficially interested that which the receiver may himself fail to make good, and it is only for the benefit of the parties interested that, in appointing a receiver, the Court requires recognizances from sureties at all. The suretyship, therefore, is for the benefit of the parties beneficially interested. The parties beneficially interested, then, supposing there were no sureties at all, or supposing the sureties had become bankrupt or insolvent and nothing could be got from them, have a right, as it appears to me, by the common equity administered in suits, to say, that Barnard Brandon shall not receive anything in respect of these shares until he has made good his deficiency as a receiver, there being a balance of 6,000*l.* or so due from him, and he being entitled to shares of the property, shall not receive anything in respect of his shares until that deficiency is made good; or, in other words, there is an equity with parties beneficially interested in those shares in which the surety has no beneficial interest, to make the shares of Barnard Brandon applicable to make good the receiver's deficiency. That appears to me to be a clear equity, in fact, a security which is possessed by the persons beneficially interested. The surety now makes good to those parties, by payment into court to the extent of his recognizances, that which he was surety for, and it appears to me that I should be crippling the effect of that general equitable principle if I did not apply it to this case. It appears to me that, although, if the fund paid into court by the sureties is not sufficient to satisfy the claims of the persons beneficially interested, other than Barnard Brandon, the persons beneficially interested have a right, before the sureties can get anything, to be re-couped all that is coming to them, so far as the money of the sureties will suffice to pay this debt (the liability of the receiver), they are entitled, subject to the prior equity of the parties beneficially interested, to the extent of full satisfaction of their claim, to stand in their shoes as against the shares of Barnard Brandon, assuming as I have been hitherto assuming that Barnard Brandon was still here, and that he had never become bankrupt. Does that equity apply as against the assignees in bankruptcy of Barnard Brandon? I think it certainly does. I think that the assignees in bankruptcy can stand in no better position than Barnard Brandon himself, and that, whatever equity Barnard Brandon's shares would be liable to in his hands, they remain liable to in the hands of his assignees. Then comes the question, whether the persons who purchased the interests of Barnard Brandon from the assignees stand in a better position than the assignees themselves. It appears to me that they do not. I think that persons who purchase the interest of a person who claims a certain share or interest in a fund administered in a suit in this court, whether they purchase direct from him or from his assignees in bankruptcy, do not stand in any better position than he himself would have stood in. In fact, Barnard Brandon's interest is entirely equitable, as the interests of all the parties are. They are purely equitable. It is not like the case of a person acquiring a legal interest on payment of a valuable consideration without notice of an equity; he may be entitled to stand in a better position than a person having a beneficial interest. But here all the interests are simply equities. It was originally an equitable interest in a fund to be administered in this suit. The interest of Barnard Brandon is liable to an equity as regards the other persons beneficially interested, and I think, as the sureties stand in the place of those persons, the sureties are entitled to those equities; it passes to the assignees liable to that equity, and it appears to me that the parties purchasing from the assignees are liable to the same equity (2)."

(2) The 74th clause of the order consequential on the decision was as follows:—"It is declared

From the foregoing decision of the Vice Chancellor the purchasers of three lots at the sale by the assignees appealed, the other lots having been purchased by Mr. Glover, the surety, himself; he being also, as before stated, solely interested in the fund paid into court in discharge of the recognizances.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Hardy, for the appellants, relied upon the fact that in the mortgage of 1839 the security as to the property in the suit was expressly limited to the shares of Barnard Brandon as heir-at-law of the testator; and, further, that there was other property of Barnard Brandon included, shewing beyond contest that both the receiver and his sureties were content with the mortgage security in lieu of any right or title they might have through any equity of the other persons beneficially interested under the will. It was, in fact, an abandonment and relinquishment of the general right of a surety in favour of a particular security. They also insisted that, as there had been several occasions on which the claim the sureties that, after making good to the other parties interested in the said testator's estate, the whole deficiency and loss occasioned by his default as receiver, the shares and interests in the said testator's estate to which the said William Barnard John Brandon is so entitled as aforesaid, are (subject, nevertheless, as provided by the 11th clause of this order) liable as between his sureties and the purchasers of such shares and interests respectively to make good to the said sureties, as the sureties of the late receiver William Barnard John Brandon, the said sum of 4,415*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, paid by them into the Bank, to the credit of the nine first above-mentioned causes, on the 5th day of April 1841, with interest thereon from that date, at 4*l.* per cent. per annum, and the said sum of 346*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, when so paid in, as thereby directed, with interest thereon after the rate aforesaid, from the day of such payment into the Bank, and any costs properly incurred by them as such sureties, but that the freehold shares which the said William Barnard John Brandon took as the said testator's heir-at-law, and the rents which have accrued due thereon since the 23rd day of April 1839 (after satisfying certain costs), are by force of the said indentures of mortgage of the 3rd and 4th days of June 1839, first applicable towards making good the sums which the said sureties are so entitled to be re-couped as aforesaid, and that any deficiency after the application of such freehold shares ought to be made good from and out of the shares to which the said William Barnard John Brandon became entitled as purchaser, rateably and according to the values of such several purchased shares respectively at the date thereof."

now made might have been urged, they must be taken to have acquiesced in this view of a substituted security. Clause 74. of the order of the Vice Chancellor was all that was appealed from.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The appellants raise the question, what is the effect of the mortgage? or rather they say that the taking of a specific security is an abandonment of the general right of a surety.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The cases as to the rights of sureties do not depend on contract.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Cracknall supported the order of the Vice Chancellor.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I do not see where there is any contract of relinquishment by the sureties, nor do I see what there is in their conduct to shew any acquiescence. A surety may have a right to two securities, one specific and the other general. The appeal seems to me to wholly fail.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The sole question on this appeal is, whether certain shares in the testator's property purchased by his heir-at-law, who was the receiver in the cause, are liable to the sureties of the receiver to make good sums which they are liable to pay, in consequence of the default made by the receiver, in the account passed by him, he not having paid the balances into court. Now, these purchased shares have been declared to be liable to the parties in the cause for portions of that balance due from the receiver for which the sureties are not liable, their recognizances not extending to the full amount which was due from the receiver; and from that part of the decree there is no appeal. We must, therefore, consider that these shares were liable for the sums due from the receiver to those parties. The sureties have paid to those parties portions of the sums which were due to them, and the consequence is, that the sureties must be entitled to stand in the place of the parties for the amount which they have paid to them, and therefore we must consider that upon this decree, prima facie, the sureties would be entitled to the right against these shares of the estate. Then, it is said, supposing the sureties to have had that right, they have taken security upon some shares which descended to the heir-at-law, and have excluded from that security the shares which were purchased by the heir-at-law; it is to be inferred from that, that they meant to abandon any security which they might have upon the purchased shares: in fact, to take it upon the descended shares. But it is to be observed, that the sureties having paid the money would have a right; they had not at that time paid the money—when they had they would have a right as against the purchaser. To hold that deed to operate as a release of that right is, I think, going much too far, when we consider that there are not to be found in the deed any words whatever which could purport to release that right if the sureties were called upon to pay. It is very possible at the time of the execution of the deed the parties might have thought that the purchased shares could not ultimately be made liable, and the receiver may have objected to include in the security the purchased shares, and therefore the parties may have meant to leave the shares upon that deed, subject to such priorities as the law would ultimately create upon them; and I do not think that, from the mere fact of the purchased shares being excluded from the security, it can be held that they were exempted from the general liability which the law imposes on them. It seems, therefore, that this decree is perfectly right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

After some discussion on the form of the order, it was drawn up as follows:—Vary clause 74. by declaring that all the other property included in the mortgage of 1839, as well as the shares of the receiver, Barnard Brandon, as testator's heir-at-law, included therein, is subject to the same liability as those shares are thereby declared liable to. The costs of the respondent, by arrangement, were ordered to be paid by the deposit, and the remainder of them out of the purchased shares.

 Nov. 4, 5, } WARE v. THE REGENT'S CANAL
 6, 15. } COMPANY.

Statute — Construction — Injunction — Canal Company.

By an act obtained by the Regent's Canal Company they were empowered to make and maintain an enlargement of a certain reservoir in the lines and upon the lands delineated in the plans of such enlargement, deposited with the clerk of the peace, shewing the lines, with a section shewing the levels thereof:—Held, that the sections, as well as the plans, were incorporated in the act, and prescribed a vertical as well as a lateral limit within which the works were to be kept.

By act of parliament a canal company were empowered to construct a reservoir, raising the water to a certain height. If by exercising their powers to the extreme limit, the effect would have been to cover with water other lands than those the company had taken,—semble, that the landowner might compel the company to purchase these lands, if the company's compulsory powers have not expired; but that if the compulsory powers have expired, the company will be restrained by injunction.

Where, however, a company having power by act of parliament to raise an embankment to a certain height exceeds that height, a neighbouring landowner is not, on account of the possibility of injury to his lands, entitled to an injunction against the company; but the right to such injunction is in the Attorney General on behalf of the public.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, who had dismissed the bill without prejudice to any action which the plaintiff might be advised to bring.

The defendants, who were incorporated for the purpose of making the Regent's Canal, were in 1851 desirous of enlarging a reservoir belonging to them, which was constructed across the valley of the Brent, penning back its waters; there being an overfall which discharged the water rising above a certain height. The requisite notice was accordingly given, and the plans and sections were deposited with the clerk of the peace. These plans and sections indicated the difference between the then line of top water and the intended line, the latter being 35 feet 9 inches. After the act had been obtained, the company proceeded under it to take some lands of the plaintiff's, who was a lessee of land at Hendon, and the price was settled by arbitration, by which also the plaintiff was awarded a sum for the damages to be sustained by the execution of the works, not including, however, any damage which might arise from flooding land belonging to the plaintiff and not taken by the company. In 1853 the reservoir was completed, the top of the embankment having been made 2 feet 6 inches higher than was shewn in the deposited sections; and the overfall having been constructed so that by means of moveable stop planks inserted in grooves the top-water level might be raised to the height of 36 feet 9 inches above the datum line. The evidence shewed that if the water was kept up in the reservoir 35 feet 2½ inches above the datum line, it did not flow over any of the plaintiff's land not comprised in the notice to purchase; but that if raised to 35 feet 9 inches it would. On one occasion, at least, the defendants used the stop planks and raised the water to its maximum height, when a portion of the plaintiff's land was slightly flooded, but to what extent by reason of the company's acts, and how far in a natural manner owing to the peculiar character of the valley, was not clear from the evidence. At other times there were occasional floods, as to the cause of which the evidence was conflicting. The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain the company from permitting the embankment to remain as constructed, or of any greater height than shewn in the deposited plan and section; and also from permitting the overfall to continue as constructed, or so as to admit of the top-water level being raised to more than 35 feet 9 inches above the level of the datum line.

*Sir R. Bethell, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. T. Stevens, for the plaintiff, the appellant.—*This Court is called upon to interfere by injunction in consequence of the defendants having exceeded the powers conferred upon them by their act of parliament. The principles upon which the Court acts in such cases are stated by Lord Cottenham, in Frewin v. Lewis (1), where he says (p. 254):—"So long as those functionaries strictly confine themselves within the exercise of those duties which are confided to them by the law, this Court will not interfere. The Court will not interfere to see whether any alteration or regulation which they may direct is good or bad; but if they are departing from that power which the law has vested in them, if they are assuming to themselves a power over property which the law does not give them, this Court no longer considers them as acting under the authority of their commission, but treats them, whether they be a corporation or individuals, merely as persons dealing with property without legal authority. That distinction, which is very obvious, sufficiently explains all the grounds on which this Court ever interferes with the acts of bodies constituted as these Commissioners are. Many cases have come judicially before me in which I have been called upon to act upon this principle; more especially in the instance of railway companies, canal companies, and other bodies incorporated by acts of parliament, as to which, while the Court avoids interfering with that which they do, while keeping within the limits of their jurisdiction, it takes care to confine them within those limits; and if, under pretence of an authority which the law does give them to a certain extent, they go beyond the line of their authority, and infringe or violate the rights of others, they become, like all other individuals, amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court by injunction." It was the right of the Court to interfere to prevent the consequences of unskilful operations. The 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was not applicable where the thing done was in transgression or excess of the parliamentary authority. If the thing done had been rightfully and skilfully done, any damage sustained must be sought for at law; but if the thing was done unskilfully, the party complaining had a right to come to this Court and have it restrained.—

Sir R. Bethell, in reply.—There were three grounds of injunction for the preservation of property: first, in the case of nuisance, where the remedy at law was insufficient; second, where there was danger of destruction of property, as in the powder-mill case—Crowder v. Tinkler (5); third, where it was necessary to restrain corporations within the exercise of the powers conferred upon them—Frewin v. Lewis. There might be a contract by the legislature on behalf of the public and also on behalf of individuals; and the test as to the latter was the necessity of their consent to the act proposed to be passed.

Nov. 15. — The LORD CHANCELLOR (after fully stating the facts) said—The defendants contend that they are not bound to adhere to the level shewn on the section, and that they are only limited to the line of lateral deviation indicated on the plan. In support of their argument, they rely principally on The North British Railway Company v. Tod, in which the House of Lords decided that the plans deposited under the Standing Orders prior to the introduction of the bill were not to be regarded, except so far as the representations they contained were incorporated in and made part of the act of parliament. This being the law thus finally settled, the question in each case as to the obligatory character of the plans and sections, is either wholly or in part dependent on the construction of the act authorizing the execution of the works. By the 4th section of the Regent's Canal Act the company are empowered to make and maintain an enlargement of the reservoir in the lines and upon the lands delineated in the plans of such enlargement, deposited with the clerk of the peace, shewing the lines, with a section shewing the levels thereof. It must be borne in mind that in conferring powers for constructing the reservoir or for keeping up a head of water, the most important circumstance with regard to owners of adjoining land is the height to which the water is to be penned or kept up. When the legislature, therefore, permits a work to be done on a plan, and describes the plan as shewing the lines, with a section shewing the levels, it appears to me to be a clear indication that the works are to be executed on the lines and according to the levels which the promoters of the undertaking have themselves proposed in their deposited plans and sections. It was said, on the part of the defendants, that it never could have been the intention of parliament to anticipate the judgment of the engineer as to the works which, in the course of construction, might be found to be necessary; that this would require an extent of scientific investigation to which parliament was incompetent; and that, therefore, the usual course was to refer in general terms to the plans and sections, so as to leave a latitude of deviation in the execution of works to meet the exigencies that might arise. In answer to this reasoning, it is to be observed that the plans and sections are always the result of scientific judgment applied previously; that the investigations before parliamentary committees proceed on the proof by engineers of the sufficiency of their plans for the proposed works, and those plans are required to be deposited with the clerk of the peace, in order that they may be inspected by parties interested, who are thus enabled to ascertain by scientific witnesses how far they are intended to be affected by the proposed works. There is always, therefore, a presumption of intention on the part of the legislature that the works should be executed according to the deposited plans; otherwise the parties interested, instead of being informed, would only be deceived by what they represented. None of the cases militate against the construction which I am disposed to adopt. In The North British Railway Company v. Tod, the language of the plaintiffs' railway act was very nearly similar to the 4th section of the Regent's Canal Act; but the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act incorporated into the main part of the railway act, in the 11th section, contains a provision that "in making the railway, it shall not be lawful to deviate from the levels of the railway as referred to the common datum line described in the section approved of by parliament, and as marked on the same, to any extent exceeding in any place 5 feet," without consent. There was no doubt that the levels were to be observed according to the deposited plans and sections, but the whole question turned upon what was the meaning of the word "levels," as used in the act; and the House of Lords came to the conclusion that the legislature, by the term "level," intended to refer not to the surface line, but to the datum line, and to the line of railway to be measured and ascertained with reference to its distance from the datum line. The case of The Queen v. the Caledonian Railway Company is distinguishable from the present. There, a railway company, before applying for a bill, deposited with the clerk of the peace plans and sections of the proposed line, and cross-sections, shewing the manner in which the roads were to be carried over the line by a bridge, and also indicating the proposed inclination of the altered line of road. The deviation act incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, and one of its clauses enacted, "that it should be lawful for the company to construct the bridge for carrying the railway over any roads or for carrying any roads over the railway, of the heights and spans and in the manner shewn in the section deposited." The whole question turned upon the words, "in the manner shewn in the section." The Court was clearly of opinion that there was no obligation beyond the heights and spans of the bridge, as delineated in the plans; that these were mentioned in the enactment, but nothing was said as to the widths and inclinations of the roads. There appears, then, to be no authority to prevent me from coming to the conclusion that the sections as well as the plans are incorporated in the Regent's Canal Act, and prescribe a vertical as well as a lateral limit within which the works are to be kept. The sections then being incorporated in the act, the company became empowered to raise the water to a permanent height of 35 feet 9 inches above the datum line, but not beyond. In arguing against the obligatory effect of the section, the defendants were compelled to concede that they were not at liberty to raise the water even to the height of 35 feet 9 inches, if it would have the effect of flooding more lands than the company had taken under their act; but holding as I do that the legislature has conferred on the company the power of raising water to this height, the question arises, what would be the rights and liabilities of the company, if, on their going to the extreme limit of their powers, the effect would be to cover other lands than those they have taken, but which they have power to take under the act? If this had taken place during the period when the compulsory powers of the company could have been exercised, I apprehend the plaintiff might have obtained relief through the aid of a Court of equity, and have compelled the company to purchase these additional lands; but if lands they had no power to take are permanently flooded there can be no doubt that the owner might have obtained an injunction to restrain the permanent taking and occupation of his land. If, therefore, I found upon the evidence that the company had permanently submerged any lands of the plaintiff, beyond those they have purchased, as it is now too late for them to take additional lands, I should feel bound to grant an injunction to restrain the company from taking and using what they were not entitled thus to appropriate to themselves; but I find no evidence at all of any such permanent overflowing of any part of the lands of the plaintiff. Instances were given of occasional floods that spread over the plaintiff's lands, but I have great difficulty upon the evidence in attributing these floods to the defendants' reservoir in a manner unauthorized by their powers. If any damage had resulted to the plaintiff's land from the excess of their powers by the company, although the plaintiff might maintain an action at law, I should not hesitate to grant an injunction to restrain the excess of the powers of the act of parliament if the damage had resulted from an imperfect or defective execution of works. Granting such a case to have been made by the bill, I should have been unwilling myself to assume the responsibility of deciding such a case, and should have left the plaintiff to law; but if the damage to the plaintiff's lands was the inevitable result of the proper execution of the works, causing an occasional flooding, in contra-distinction to a permanent submerging, he must be left to his remedies under the 68th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, which would apply to this case according to Broadbent v. the Imperial Gas Company. But the plaintiff insists on his right to an injunction, on the ground that the defendants have violated the act of parliament by raising their embankment higher than the maximum height, and also by having constructed the overfall in such manner as to be capable of raising the water above the level indicated in the section, and he contends that this of itself gives him a right to an injunction, even if he should be unable to shew that he has sustained injury, by the transgression of the prescribed limits. But I cannot consider that such an abstract right belongs to the public, who happen to be within the range of possibility of injury, which must be always an uncertain and indefinite criterion. Where there has been an exercise of powers in excess, or beyond the powers given by an act of parliament, I apprehend that no one but the Attorney General, on behalf of the public, has a right to apply to this Court to check the exorbitance of the party in the exercise of the powers confided to him by the legislature. If an individual sustained no damage, and there is no reason to apprehend that he will sustain damage, notwithstanding his being nearer to the possible cause of injury than the rest of the public, he has no peculiar position or claim to entitle him to become the redresser of a public grievance, or to complain of the disregard of the provisions of an act of parliament. The language of Lord Eldon in Blakemore v. the Glamorgan-shire Canal Company, certainly appears to sustain the proposition of the plaintiff to its fullest extent, but I adopt the interpretation of that language by Baron Alderson in Lee v. Milner, and with him I say that these acts "ought to be treated as conditional powers given by parliament to take the lands of the different proprietors through whose estates the works are to proceed. Each landowner, therefore, has a right to have the powers strictly and literally carried into effect as regards his own land, and also to require that no variation shall be made to his prejudice in the carrying into effect the bargain between the undertakers and any one else." The words "to his prejudice" may mean not only to his possible but actual prejudice; and Lord Eldon himself seems to have qualified and explained the generality of his own language by one of the issues in Blakemore v. the Glamorgan-shire Canal Company. I do not think, therefore, that I ought to interfere by injunction, unless the plaintiff satisfies me that the excess in the height of the works has occasioned damage, or is likely to produce damage which cannot be otherwise redressed. Now, the only permanent excess of height is to be found in the embankment, which has been made 2 feet 6 inches higher than is represented in the parliamentary section. The defendants' evidence states that the existing height of the embankment is absolutely required for the security of life and property, having regard to the height which the Regent's Canal Act empowers them to put water in the reservoir. I cannot see how the height of the embankment per se can injuriously affect the plaintiff, the arrangements at the overfall being the only means by which the defendants can raise the level of the water. These were brought into operation in March 1855. If the plaintiff had come immediately after the flooding of his lands by thus raising the water by means of the overfall, he might possibly have had some ground to ask the Court to interfere for his protection, not merely against the threatened mischief, but against mischief actually produced, with the means and opportunity of repetition; but I have no evidence to satisfy me that there has been at any time since either an user or any intention to use the works so as to prejudice the plaintiff. On the contrary, the weight of the evidence inclines me to the opinion that the company have always kept the water down to 32 feet. Upon the question whether I am to grant the injunction, I cannot help being influenced by the delay that has occurred, although not amounting to absolute proof of acquiescence.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Broker—Deposit of Securities—General Lien—Evidence—Custom of Brokers.

Bonds, payable to bearer, and passing by delivery only, were deposited with bankers for safe custody, and the bankers afterwards fraudulently deposited them with their brokers as a security for money advanced, and became bankrupt :—Held, that the bonds were subject to the general lien of the brokers for all money advanced by them to the bankers, and not merely for the advance made upon the security of those particular bonds.

Semble—The Court will take judicial notice of the custom of brokers as part of the general custom of merchants.

The facts of this case are stated in the judgment.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Martineau appeared for the plaintiffs ; and Mr. Rolt, Mr. Speed and Mr. W. W. Cooper, for the several defendants.

Dec. 3.—WOOD, V.C. — In this case the bill is filed on behalf of a number of proprietors of certain Dutch bonds, which, or bonds of a similar description, were deposited in the banking-house of Messrs. Strahan & Co. for safe custody. The question that arises is, whether or not a large number of those bonds, having been sent by Strahan & Co. to their brokers, the Messrs. Peppercorne, with the direction to raise money to the extent of 25,000*l.*, and the bonds themselves having realized a greater amount than that, the bondholders are entitled to say that the surplus shall be paid over to them, irrespective of a balance which is alleged by the Peppercornes to be due to them in respect of their business transactions with the bankers. That is the point to which this case is entirely reduced, because the question with reference to the matters of account between the bankers, to which a great portion of the bill is directed, especially as regards a certain sum of 2,000*l.*, is not ripe for discussion ; and more especially as the defendants, having taken the view that it is a matter of account, have not entered into any evidence on that particular point.

The facts are shortly these :—Messrs. Strahan & Co. had deposited certain securities for the raising of money with their brokers, some of which were their own securities, and some belonged to other people. The course of dealing with regard to securities upon which money was to be raised from time to time by their brokers, seems to have been this : they sent securities of different characters, sometimes India bonds, sometimes Exchequer bills ; and on those securities money was to be raised. The practice, according to the whole evidence, not disputed on either side, was, that with regard to particular securities of this description, the advance was supposed to be made till the next settling day in the Stock Exchange, and if the money were not paid, or if further time were not granted, it was then competent to the broker to sell the securities so deposited, in order to realize the advance so made. With regard to the transaction, also, there is no dispute upon this point, that as between Messrs. Peppercorne and Messrs. Strahan & Co., although Messrs. Peppercorne from time to time procured these advances from other quarters upon the security of the bonds, yet they stood in the relation of principals on all occasions as between themselves and Strahan & Co. The advance was taken as an advance from them to Strahan & Co., and received by Strahan & Co. as such. It is also in evidence that on certain occasions, when Messrs. Peppercorne conceived they had a greater amount in hand than necessary for their security, they returned the surplus securities, whatever they might be, and were content with retaining those securities which would exactly realize the particular amount to be raised. It further appears that these bonds were pledged by Strahan & Co. exactly as if they were their own property, although it is quite true they belonged to their clients. It was a fraud which they were committing in so dealing with the property ; but at the same time, as between themselves and Messrs. Peppercorne, it is not suggested that the latter were aware of the bonds being other than the property of the bankers themselves, or that they were in any way bound to deal with them as if they belonged to other persons than the bankers.

Then, as regards the particular transaction in question, it is shortly and correctly stated in the bill to be this—I should mention that these bonds were payable to bearer:—On the 2nd of May 1854 Messrs. Strahan & Co. deposited with Messrs. Peppercorne 108 bonds for 108,000 guilders, being part of 588 bonds mentioned in the bill as a security for 5,000*l.*, and on the 6th of March 1855 they deposited the remaining 480 bonds for 480,000 guilders; and it appears from a document which is in evidence, that on the occasion of this second deposit Messrs. Peppercorne were instructed by a letter from Messrs. Strahan & Co., of the 5th of March 1855, to “raise 25,000*l.* on 500 Dutch bonds, 2½.”

Now, with regard to the authority of Messrs. Peppercorne to deal with this property, it was stated that they sold some of those bonds at a time when they were not justified in selling them. In reference to that, there is an entry in the books of Messrs. Peppercorne, from which it appears that they continued the accommodation in respect of this transaction to the 31st of May, whereas some of the bonds were sold before that period; and further, that interest was charged in respect of the debt, that is to say, of the advance which they had undertaken to make, at a time when some of the bonds were sold, and then that interest ought not to have been charged. The bill does not seek any remedy in respect of that; it is merely introduced with reference to the general lien now claimed. The bill does not seek to avoid any of these transactions; but they are brought forward in aid simply of the argument that the Messrs. Peppercorne were not at liberty to deal with these bonds except for the particular and specific purpose for which they were deposited. The transaction, then, is simply reduced to this. The bankers send securities to a broker for the purpose of having money raised upon them, and, I think, upon the evidence in this case, with full power in the brokers to sell them at the time when the money ought to become payable, namely, either at the settling day, or at such other time as the parties by agreement have arranged; and having sold those securities, they are to reimburse themselves, of course, their lien; the question being, whether, if the securities are more than enough for that purpose, they are entitled to retain those which remain for the purpose of their general balance. I ought also, perhaps, to mention as a part of the transaction that there were two modes of dealing between the banker and the broker. There was in respect of the general account a daily arrangement and settling, apparently on account of shares bought and sold and the commission upon those shares so bought and sold by the brokers for Strahan & Co., the brokers understanding with reference to all these transactions that they were solely for the advantage of the bank. They went daily to Strahan & Co., who, no doubt, would have large dealings while they were in credit, in respect of purchases and investments desired to be made by their several customers. They went daily to take their instructions and the accounts were settled and balanced day by day, so far as that part of the transaction went, and the commission upon the whole thing charged with respect to those transactions. Besides that, there is one other fact, and one other fact only, to notice, which is, that these loans on securities would bear different rates of interest in respect of the particular security being or not being such as the broker approved of in respect of the advances to be made. This, however, does not touch the question of the general lien, as, to what is to be done after the special purpose is answered for which the security was deposited; whether, having these securities, and there being more than enough to answer the special purpose, the surplus is subject to the general lien, for nobody disputes in this case that the property was available for the payment of the special debt that had been contracted. Now, the case referred to in the course of the argument, and which may be said to comprise the whole of the law upon that subject, because every authority of importance is cited in that case, is Brandao v. Barnett (1), in which the question was simply this—a person deposited Exchequer bills with his own bankers, keeping them in a box of which they had the key ; being obliged from time to time to have those Exchequer bills exchanged for other like bills, he handed them over to the bankers for the mere purpose of having them so exchanged, and the conclusion of fact that the Court arrived at was, that that intent was fully understood by the bankers. Even upon that state of facts, it appears that there was considerable difference of opinion in the courts below, the Court of Queen's Bench having decided against the lien, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber in favour of it. The point there raised was, putting the case exceedingly high, that if there be, for any purpose of business, securities deposited in the ordinary course of business with a banker, then he has upon those securities so deposited with him a lien for the balance of his general account; and the circumstance in that case of the Exchequer bills being delivered for the purpose of obtaining other Exchequer bills in the place of them was of itself a dealing with the Exchequer bills in the ordinary course of business of bankers for their customers; and therefore the lien attached before the duty of returning them to the box for the purpose of being locked up. The House of Lords came to the conclusion, that they were handed over for the sole specific and special purpose of being exchanged for other Exchequer bills and returned to the box, and that being the case, they were never in the hands of the bankers but for that particular purpose; and that particular and special purpose of putting them back in the box would clearly have placed them as much out of the controul of the bankers as they were when originally in the box; that it was a mere substitution of the one for the other, the necessary consequence of that particular security requiring the change to be made, just as if the bankers had been the messenger or any other person chosen to attend and obtain the new Exchequer bills and return them to the box; and in a case of that description it was impossible the lien could be sustained. It does not appear to me that the present case goes to anything like the length of the circumstances of that case. Here the brokers were in the habit of making advances to the bankers in respect of securities deposited with them, and I have the evidence of a large number of very eminent brokers as to what the course of dealing in such transactions is. The evidence given by Mr. Mortimer, the broker to the Court of Chancery, is this:— he says, “ Where lenders or other brokers hold securities deposited by the same borrowers at several times and on distinct occasions, and choose to close their account, or their account is closed by circumstances, such as the borrower stopping payment, the lenders have a lien upon all the borrower's securities in their possession, until the balance due to them from the borrower on every account is paid, and they have the right to sell a sufficient portion of the securities to cover any such balance. In fact, all securities in the hands of lenders at the time of closing an account are applicable, not only to the particular sum advanced at the time of the deposit of particular securities, but to whatever balance may be due from the borrower to the lenders at the time that the account is closed.” Similar evidence is given by every one of the eminent brokers who are called; and, indeed, it would appear that the Court would require no evidence of the practice of brokers in this respect, considering it as settled. I think some expressions with regard to the general lien on business transacted with brokers will be found in the authorities upon the custom of bankers, and I confess I have never felt any doubt or difficulty on the case before me. The transaction is simply this. The shares are sent to the brokers with the direction to raise so much money; and they get the money. That appears to be the ordinary transaction with the broker: a common business transaction, not like buying and selling shares, on which he charges a commission, but a business in which brokers are in the habit of largely engaging as a part of their general business. Being so sent, no doubt, in this case,—I will say no doubt, because it is not a question which arises here,—the broker, in the first place, does that which he is directed to do; and he might hold these shares, as I understand the evidence, until he acquired a right to sell them, which right he does not acquire until the settling day, or such other day as may be given.

The question still remains, when he sells them, is he bound to sell simply as many as will raise the particular sum in question, or, having them deposited in his hands for the general business, is he not entitled to a general lien for whatever balance may be due to him? When the shares are deposited with him nobody can tell what may be the exact amount required of those shares; they are perpetually fluctuating in price; and although there is evidence that, according to the natural course of dealing, the broker, when he found he had more than enough for the purpose, from time to time would send back the securities, one cannot infer from that that he did waive, in respect of other transactions, his right to insist on the general lien. The whole of the shares being deposited, nobody knowing what the exact number required may be, on account of the fluctuating value of the property, I apprehend all those shares are deposited in the first instance for the purpose of having the specific object attained, and there is nothing to prevent the general lien attaching. The doctrine laid down by Lord Campbell in Brandao v. Barnett is clearly this, that the special contract is only exclusive of the general lien when it is inconsistent with it. If there is any specific contract in respect of a chattel which is inconsistent with the general lien on the chattel, then, of course, the doctrine of general lien is excluded; and so it might possibly be, if before the right to sell accrued, the banker tendered the whole money; some question might arise as to whether there was not a special contract there, implying that the shares were to be returned in the event of the money being replaced. The question would still be open, whether there would not be a right on the part of the lender to say, something more must be done before the shares are returned; but at the same time, after the shares have become due nothing of that kind can arise inconsistent with the general lien, because the two things are perfectly consistent, that you shall be bound to apply the property according to the special contract in raising the money, and you shall have a lien on the surplus in respect of your general balance.

All the authorities are stated in Brandao
NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

v. Barnett, and one of the strongest possible character, which was a good deal referred to in the course of the argument, and as to which no dissent was expressed, was Davis v. Bousher (2). There the customer was in the habit of depositing bills and acceptances of various customers with the bankers, in order to have money advanced on them. The bankers looked at the bills, and if they liked the security they made an advance in respect of the acceptances; if they did not like them they declined the advance. And this occurred: a large parcel of bills was sent: on some they advanced, and on others they declined to make any advance; yet the Court held, in that case, that they were entitled to a lien on those in respect of which they had not advanced for any deficiency upon those on which they had advanced. That is, perhaps, the strongest case in favour of this lien. Then, again, there was a case of Bolland v. Bygraves referred to in Brandao v. Barnett, where Lord Tentarden at Nisi Prius laid down the rule to be, that a banker who stands in this relation to a customer has a lien on any security which may be placed for any purpose in his hands. It was attempted by the counsel to extend it to bills locked up in a box, which the Court thought was pressing it much further than the nature of the case warranted; but I can have no doubt that it must apply to securities placed as these were for the purpose of having the money raised.

The Solicitor General relied a good deal on the difficulty this would cause in business transactions, if, where a customer requests his bankers to sell stock or shares for him, on the bankers placing them in the hands of brokers for sale, they are entitled to treat them as subject to their general lien against the bankers; but this is an inconvenience which might arise in all matters where confidence has to be reposed. In this particular case the Peppercornes themselves say they occasionally raised money by again depositing these shares with other people; and a third or fourth deposit of that kind may occur, the general lien of the depositee arising in each case; and no doubt all this is an inconvenience.

nience which may arise from the confidence which one person has to repose in another. Whether, if Strahan & Co., in dealing with their brokers, had said, "We are instructed by our customers to sell these shares; sell them for us," the general lien could have been asserted, is another question. The broker there would take with the knowledge that they were the property of a third person, and not of the bankers; but so long as persons do leave it with bankers to deal with property as they think fit, and bankers have to deal with it as their own, I can only regard it, as between the two persons in litigation before me, as being the property of the brokers, and they have in the property so deposited every right which they would have in an ordinary case of securities left with them for the purposes of an advance, and on the margin of which securities, after satisfying the advance, they must plainly have their general lien. Therefore, the decree I propose to make is this:—Declare that the defendants, the Peppercornes, are entitled to retain the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of the 588 Dutch bonds in the pleadings mentioned, after payment of the money advanced by them on the security of such bonds, in satisfaction of such money, if any, as may be due to them on the result of the account hereinafter directed of the general dealings and transactions between the defendants and the firm of Strahan, Paul & Bates. Direct an account of the monies received by the same defendants in respect of the sales of the said Dutch bonds, also an account of what was due to them for principal monies and interest in respect of monies advanced by them on the security of bonds, and let the same be deducted from the amount of the proceeds of the sale. Also an account of what, if anything, was due on the balance of the account of the general dealings and transactions with the firm of Strahan, Paul & Bates at the time of the bankruptcy of the last-mentioned firm. Upon further directions these accounts will be dealt with. Then, in taking such accounts no settled accounts to be disturbed—that I think right with reference to the daily dealings, whatever the effect of it may be,—with liberty to either side to surcharge and falsify, and liberty to apply. I do not think it necessary, at present, to deal with the question of the particular costs of the plaintiffs making out their title. My impression is, that the plaintiffs will ultimately have to pay their own costs of making out their title as the owners of these bonds; but, as the whole matter must come back again on further directions, I shall reserve them for the present.

Practice—Abandoned Summons, Costs of.

Where a summons, taken out at chambers, was adjourned into court, and then abandoned by the plaintiff, the defendant was held entitled to the taxed costs of such summons.

Mr. Malins (with whom was Mr. Wood) applied, on behalf of the defendant, for the costs actually incurred relating to a summons which had been taken out at chambers, by the plaintiff, for a special jury in this case, under the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, and which summons had been adjourned into court, but had been abandoned by the plaintiff.

Mr. Bacon said he had received instructions in the cause, although he was not instructed to appear on the present motion, and suggested that it was not the practice of the Court to give the costs actually incurred of an abandoned summons.

STUART, V.C.—If a summons comes on in chambers, and is abandoned, justice and the course of practice require that the person summoned to chambers should, when the summons against him is abandoned, be indemnified in respect of the costs of that proceeding. When the summons is adjourned into court the same practice must prevail. As to abandoned motions there was a general order, which has not yet been extended to abandoned summonses. By a general order of Lord Eldon's (5th of August 1818), it is prescribed that, if affidavits have been filed in support of a motion which is abandoned, the costs shall be taxed and paid to the other side by the party giving the notice of motion and not moving; but neither 40s. nor any other sum has been fixed by the practice of the Court as the costs of an abandoned summons. Lord Eldon's order of the 5th of August 1818 (1), was intended to prevent a party who had been put to great expense being sent away with 40s. as an indemnity for that expense. If, therefore, I find a summons abandoned in chambers, or abandoned in court, I can understand no other practice, and I have heard of no authority for any other course of practice, than that a person summoned to oppose a summons, and being told, after he has incurred considerable expense in preparing to oppose it, that it is abandoned, must have his taxed costs. I do not know why I heard anything stated about the nature of the summons, because that has nothing to do with it. If I found a case made that required me to summon a jury, I might, in the exercise of my discretion, if I thought it necessary, summon a jury, or take any other means that the legislature has armed me with, to endeavour to do justice between the parties. The legislature, which has prescribed these means of justice, has given the Judges a discretion. I think the defendant is entitled to the taxed costs of the summons.

Joint-Stock Companies Acts—Winding up—Jurisdiction of the Court.

Where a company has been registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of 1848 and 1849 as an unlimited company, and subsequently registered under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. as a limited company, the Court of Chancery has power to make an order for the winding up of the whole transactions of the company.

The Plumstead, Woolwich and Charlton Water Company was originally registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of 1848 and 1849, and was subsequently registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, as a company with limited liability. A petition was now pending in the Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of winding up those transactions of the company which had taken place subsequently to its registration as a company with limited liability; and a petition had also been presented to this Court for winding up those transactions which had taken place prior to that time. It was now asked that the petition to this Court might be amended so as to make it apply to all the transactions of the company, both before and subsequently to the registration under the stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, on the ground that extreme inconvenience and expense would be caused if the company were subjected to the double procedure of two winding-up orders in different courts.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Lewis, in support of the application, submitted that the Court had power to make this order, and they cited the 59th and 60th sections of the act, which were in the following terms:—Section 59. "The provisions of this act relating to the winding up of companies shall apply to all companies registered under the act, 8 Vict. c. 110, and entitled 'An act for the registration, incorporation and regulation of joint-stock companies,' from and after the date at which they have obtained registration under this act, in manner hereinafter mentioned, but not any other companies." Section 60. "The expression 'the Court,' as used in the third part of this act, shall mean the following authorities; (that is to say,) in the case of a company engaged in working any mine within and subject to the jurisdiction of the Stannaries,—the Court of the Vice Warden of the Stannaries: In the case of a limited company registered in England that is not engaged in working any such mine as aforesaid,—the Court of Bankruptcy having jurisdiction in the place in which the registered office of the company is situate: In the case of a limited company registered in Ireland, whose registered nominal capital does not exceed 5,000*l.*,—the Commissioners of Bankruptcy in Ireland: In all cases not hereinbefore provided for, the Court shall mean as respects companies registered in England the High Court of Chancery of England, as respects companies registered in Scotland the Court of Session in either division thereof, and as respects companies registered in Ireland the Court of Chancery of Ireland."

Mr. Baily and Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the directors of the company; and

Mr. Jessel, for shareholders other than the petitioners, and supported the application.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think the construction of the act which has been suggested is the most rational and correct one, and it is manifestly for the convenience and advantage of all parties that there should be but one process of winding up. I will, therefore, make the order for the winding up of the whole company in this court, and for that purpose the petition may be amended as proposed.

VINEY v. CHAPLIN.

Practice—Rectifying Decree after Enrolment.

The costs of an interlocutory application and order were reserved, but by inadvertence on the final decree ordering the defendant to pay all the costs of the suit, no provision was made for these costs. The defendant enrolled the decree; but, upon the plaintiff's petition, the defendant was ordered to pay these reserved costs.

In this case (reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 434) a decree was made, by which the defendant Chaplin was ordered to pay the costs of the suit. In this decree, however, no mention was made of the costs of an order, dated the 11th of February 1858, and made by Kindersley, V.C. for an injunction, and of an order, dated the 10th of March 1858, made by consent, when the motion for an injunction was renewed before the full Court (see 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 436).

The decree of the 8th of May was enrolled by the defendants in July.

The plaintiffs now presented a petition, praying that the taxing Master might be directed, in taxing the costs of the suit under the decree of the 8th of May, to allow to them the costs of the orders of the 11th of February and the 10th of March.

Mr. Druce appeared in support of the petition, and contended that, notwithstanding the order of the 8th of May had been enrolled, the Court would rectify what was an obvious omission—Fearon v. Desbrisay (1), Ex parte Justices of Essex (2), Spearling v. Lynn (3), Yow v. Townsend (4) and Chester v. Gorges (5); or there might be a separate order now made—M'Dermott v. Kealy (6), Ford v. Wastell (7) and Thornhill v. Manning (8).

Mr. Baily and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the defendants, said that no case had been made for vacating the enrolment, neither fraud nor surprise being alleged—Backhouse v. Wylde (9), Wickenden v. Rayson (10), and Barnes v. Wilson (11). It was not competent to the Court now to make a supplemental order. Where costs of a motion were reserved, and no order was made as to them by the final decree, such costs must be lost—Colman v. Sarrell (12).

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that it was the intention of the Court at the time the decree was made to give these costs, and the only question was how this was now to be done.

The following order was made:—After reciting an order for injunction on the 11th of February 1858, and the order of the 10th of March 1858, by which, without prejudice to any question, the order of the 11th of February 1858 was discharged, and it was by consent ordered that the consideration of the costs of the application to the Court below, and of that motion, and of the action, should be reserved until

 Dec. 9, 10, 17. } DE MATTOS v. GIBSON.

Injunction — Charter-Party — Mortgage of Ship — Specific Performance.

One of the Vice Chancellors refused to decree the specific performance of a charter-party, or to grant an injunction at the suit of the charterer to restrain a mortgagee of the ship, who had notice of the charter-party, from making a sale in pursuance of his power of sale contained in the mortgage-deed; but the Lords Justices, considering that where property is contracted to be used in a particular manner, and a purchaser buys that property, with notice of that contract, he is bound not to use it otherwise than in accordance with the contract:— Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the mortgagee from exercising his power of sale, and from interfering with the ship on her voyage, the injunction to continue till the hearing of the cause, and the plaintiff undertaking to be answerable in damages.

This was an appeal from an order of Vice Chancellor Wood, refusing to grant an injunction to restrain a registered mortgagee of a ship and the owner of the same, at the instance of the charterer of the ship, under the following circumstances:—On the 23rd of October 1857, the defendant Curry, who was then negotiating the purchase of the ship in question, agreed, by charter-party of that date, to carry a cargo of coals for the plaintiff from Newcastle to Suez. The plaintiff was to pay the freight, part in acceptances of three and six months, and the rest on the performance of the voyage; but the acceptances were not to be handed over until after the vessel had sailed. On the 6th of January 1858, a bill of sale of the ship was executed to Curry, and deposited by Messrs. Bramley, Moore & Co., of Liverpool, who were the vendors of the vessel, with Messrs. Heald & Co., of North Shields, the plaintiff's agents, who undertook not to part with the plaintiff's acceptances on account of the freight (which were also in their hands) without seeing that Bramley, Moore & Co. were paid the balance of their purchase-money, if any should be then due. On the 12th of January 1858 Curry mortgaged the ship to the defendant Gibson, for 1,500*l.*, and shortly afterwards 1,080*l.* (part of the mortgage-money) was paid by Gibson, at Curry's request, to Messrs. Bramley, Moore & Co. On the 18th of January 1858 Curry's bill of sale was registered at Dumfries. On the 24th of January 1858 Gibson's mortgage was registered at North Shields. On the 29th of January 1858 the vessel sailed, and after the plaintiff's agents, Messrs. Heald & Co., had satisfied themselves of that fact, they handed to Curry's wife acceptances to the amount of 980*l.*, on account of freight, and Curry's wife out of the proceeds sent Messrs. Bramley, Moore & Co. the balance of the purchase-money of the ship, amounting to about 700*l.* In February the ship, meeting with stress of weather, became so leaky that it was found necessary to take her into Penzance, where she was repaired. On the 12th of July the mortgagee's power of sale became exercisable, and shortly afterwards he took possession of the ship and paid for the repairs. Upon this the plaintiff filed this bill, praying specific performance of the charter-party and an injunction against Gibson to restrain him from interrupting the voyage or selling the ship, without giving notice to the purchaser of the charter-party. On the 25th of November last the plaintiff applied to Vice Chancellor Wood for an injunction against Gibson until the hearing of the cause, when the Vice Chancellor refused the injunction, and from this order the plaintiff appealed.

The argument in support of the motion was, that a mortgagee, with notice of a charter-party, was not entitled to defeat the same by the exercise of his power of sale; while, for the mortgagee, it was insisted that the Court could not grant specific performance of a charter-party, and that a mortgagee had a clear title to remove and sell the ship included in his security without reference to the charter-party, particularly when, as here, there was ample time for the performance of the voyage according to the terms of the charter-party, without further delaying the rights of the mortgagee. The Vice Chancellor took time to consider his judgment, which was delivered at his private residence on the 29th of November, and was as follows:—"On a full consideration of this case, I have come to the conclusion that it is not one in which a Court of equity ought to interfere, either by way of specific performance or by way of injunction to restrain the defendant Gibson from using the ship before the completion of her voyage, according to the charter-party. I conceive that the specific performance of an agreement to convey coals to Suez (which is, in effect, the operation of the charter-party) is beyond the controul of the Court, for what directions could be given as to the navigation of the ship? By what process could the hiring of the sailors, the appointment of a proper master, the victualling of the vessel and the like, be enforced? As regards the injunction, I conceive the observations of Lord St. Leonards, in Lumley v. Wagner (1), to apply to cases in which the spirit of the positive agreement involves a special damage beyond that of the mere non-performance of the agreement itself. He says:—"It was clearly intended that Johanna Wagner was to exert her vocal abilities to the utmost to aid the theatre to which she agreed to attach herself. I am of opinion that if she had attempted, even in the absence of any negative stipulation, to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract." That is to say, a special damage would be done by her singing elsewhere at a rival theatre, ultra the non-performance of her contract to sing at the given theatre which had engaged her. The Court could not make her perform the latter agreement, but could prevent her doing anything which was an aggravation of her breach of it. This is more apparent if his Lordship's observations on Clarke v. Price (2) (in p. 622 of the report in Lumley v. Wagner) be attended to. Indeed, at the close of his observations on that part of the case, his Lordship says, he should not have granted any injunction on the affirmative part of the contract only in the case before him. Now, in Clarke v. Price an injunction to restrain Mr. Price from writing any other reports until he had written reports for the plaintiff, might have had the effect of compelling him to write for the plaintiff; but it was not the nature of the contract, as Lord Eldon observed, that there should be such a restriction; so in the case before me, it is no point of the contract that the ship should not carry coals for others, nor will the plaintiff be at all the worse for its doing so, beyond the mere loss of his contract. Any other ship will carry the plaintiff's coals as well, or probably better, and the whole matter sounds in damages; he would gain nothing by the ship remaining idle, whereas, in all cases of negative contracts, there is a positive benefit from their observation. Lord Cottenham, in Heathcote v. the North Staf- fordshire Railway Company (3), puts the very case now before me as the one in which the Court will not interfere. 'If A. contract with B. to deliver goods at a certain time and place, will equity interfere to prevent A. from doing anything that may or can prevent him from so delivering the goods?' I must, therefore, refuse the motion, and let the costs of it be costs in the cause."

From that judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Dec. 9.—Mr. Amphlett and Mr. E. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Bedwell, for the defendant Gibson.

After the argument it was suggested that it would be convenient to serve the defendant Curry (who did not appear upon the motion), and bring the matter on again, as upon motion for a decree. A provisional order was made in the mean time.

Dec. 10, 17.—The parties not being able to serve Mr. Curry, the motion proceeded. The argument turned principally on the question of the Court granting a negative injunction. The following cases were cited:—

Heathcote v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company.

Lumley v. Wagner.

Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774; s. c. 1 Hall & Tw. 105; 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 83.

Clarke v. Price.

Webster v. Dillon, 3 Jur. (N.S.) 432.

Flint v. Brandon, 8 Ves. 159.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that both reason and rule in all cases of this kind went together. Where property is contracted to be used in a particular manner, and a purchaser buys that property with notice of that contract, he is bound not to use it otherwise than under the contract. The defendant Gibson took with notice of the charter-party, and was bound thereby, and the injunction must be granted.

(3) 2 Mac. & G. 100, 112; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 82.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER thought that an injunction ought to be granted until the hearing of the cause, inasmuch as at the hearing there would be three points to be argued before the Court, and which points could not be so properly gone into on an interlocutory application like the present. The first was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance of the charter-party; the second, whether, if not entitled thereto, he was or not entitled to an injunction, to continue until the voyage should have been performed; the third point being whether Curry had or not a right of damages against Gibson, and whether that right did or not accrue to the plaintiff through Curry. None of these points could be determined at present. Their Lordships would, therefore, grant an injunction to restrain the defendant Gibson and his agents from removing the vessel to Newcastle, or interfering to interrupt the voyage to Suez, the plaintiff undertaking to answer any order the Court might make as to damages; the injunction and the undertaking to last until the hearing of the cause.

Dec. 20, 21. } BROUGHTON v. HUTT.

Deed—Rectification of Mistake.

A. B., under the mistaken notion that he was, as heir-at-law of his father, entitled to shares in a joint-stock company as really, executed a deed, by which he joined in indemnifying the directors in respect of certain advances made by them. It turned out upon inquiry that the shares were personal estate, and A. B. filed his bill to be relieved from the deed, and the Court made a decree in his favour, which decree was upon appeal affirmed.

The facts of this case, which came on by appeal from a decree of Vice Chancellor Stuart, were as follows:—Mr. John Vicary Broughton became the owner of three shares in a joint-stock company, called the Western Australian Company, which was formed for purchasing land in Western Australia. The deed of settlement contained a clause providing that, as between the real and personal representatives of the shareholders, the shares should be considered as personal estate. Mr. Broughton died in June 1850, having appointed his wife and daughter executors of his will, but having made no bequest of his shares, which were accordingly supposed by his eldest son and heir-at-law to have descended to him. After the testator's death the company made a call on the shareholders, and the testator's daughter drew a cheque for the amount due, as her father's executrix; and the amount was entered in the company's books to the credit of "the executors of the late J. V. Broughton." The company did not succeed, and it was agreed that it should be dissolved; and, in order to meet certain liabilities the directors undertook to procure the necessary funds, on the shareholders indemnifying them to the extent of 200*l.* per share. A meeting was accordingly convened on the 30th of May 1853, by circulars addressed to the shareholders, one being sent to the residence of the eldest son of the testator, who bore the same name and occupied the same house as his late father. Mr. J. V. Broughton, jun., accordingly attended the meeting, and while there executed a deed of covenant, which had been already prepared and engrossed, whereby he covenanted, as one of the shareholders, to indemnify the directors for the sum borrowed. Three actions were subsequently brought against him on this covenant by three of the directors, and he then made inquiries as to his interest in the shares, and ascertained that he was not entitled to them, and had executed the deed under a mistake. He accordingly filed a bill, praying a decree that he had executed the deed by mistake, and that it might be cancelled, and that the actions might be stayed. Vice Chancellor Stuart, considering that it was a case of mutual mistake, made a decree in his favour. From this decision the defendants, who were the directors of the company, appealed.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Schomberg, for the plaintiff, supported the decree of the Court below.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. Baggallay, who were for the appellants, argued that if the plaintiff had any remedy it was at law and not in this court, and that, as the directors had incurred the liability on the faith of Mr. Broughton executing the deed, he was not entitled to retire from the engagement, and leave them open to the consequences of his act.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Whether the plaintiff has a case for relief at law as well as in equity I give no opinion; but certainly he has a case for equitable relief, and that whether he has incurred any legal liability by executing the deed or not. It is unimportant for all purposes of this suit whether the plaintiff is under legal liability or not—I doubt whether he is; but, however that may be, it makes no difference to his claim to relief in equity. It is evident that he executed the deed under a mere mistake of law and fact. Were the real circumstances known to the defendants, who caused this deed to be prepared and procured the plaintiff's execution of it, with no knowledge of its contents, except what might have been obtained from the reading of it for the first time in the room? It is impossible that the defendants can be heard to say that they were not themselves aware of the circumstances. Probably, independently of the payment of the call by persons who are called in the books of the company "executors," I should have come to the same conclusion, but that fact is decisive. They could not but have known that the plaintiff was not a shareholder, and they ought not to have allowed him to execute the deed without apprising him of the circumstances. I am not convinced that any damage has accrued or will accrue to the defendants by reason of this gentleman executing the deed. But even assuming that some damage has accrued, or will accrue, it is damage which, with full knowledge of the circumstances, they have brought or will bring upon themselves. It is as plain a case for relief as I have ever seen, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This is as plain a case of both mistake and surprise as can be. The plaintiff never intended to be bound unless he was a shareholder, and the defendants never intended him to be bound unless he was so. What are the circumstances? He attended a meeting and executed the deed on the supposition that he was a shareholder. He acted under a mistake, and also under surprise. The mere circumstance that the defendants contracted liability on the faith of the plaintiff executing the deed makes no difference, for they did so under circumstances which they had better means of knowing than he had. It is altogether a case of mutual mistake; and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
Nov. 25. } BAXTER v. WEST.

Partnership—Appointment of Receiver.

The plaintiff filed a bill for dissolution of a partnership entered into with the defendant, and moved for a receiver. A question was raised upon the evidence as to the conduct of the parties, and as to whether there was any term fixed for the expiration of the partnership:—Held, that these questions must be decided at the hearing, and that the Court, not being able to say that a dissolution must be decreed at the hearing, would not appoint a receiver, which would operate as an injunction.

This was a suit for a dissolution of partnership, and the plaintiff now moved for a receiver, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the partnership assets.

The plaintiff and defendant entered into partnership, as booksellers, in 1855, when articles of partnership were executed between them, but no time was appointed by the articles for the continuance of the partnership. The business was carried on until October 1858, when the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant's solicitor for a dissolution.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff went to shew that the defendant had violated the articles by improperly receiving money and giving orders in the business, which he was not entitled to do.

The evidence for the defendant was to the effect, that there was an understanding that the partnership should continue for seven years; that he had not violated the articles, but that he had acted in the partnership in the manner alleged by the plaintiff in consequence of the plaintiff's own conduct.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Hislop Clarke appeared in support of the motion, and contended that the conduct of the defendant had been such as to entitle the plaintiff to a dissolution, and that, consequently, he was at any rate entitled now to a receiver.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Ellis, for the defendant, submitted that there had been no violation of the articles on his part; that the question as to whether there was a term or not could only be decided at the hearing, and that, unless the Court could see clearly that at the hearing there must be a dissolution of partnership, there could be no receiver appointed upon an interlocutory application.

Mr. Glasse was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I am of opinion that I cannot now grant a receiver in this case. A receiver operates as an injunction; and the principle on which this Court acts with regard to the appointment of a receiver in these cases is this: it will not appoint one, upon a motion of this kind, unless it sees that there is an actual present dissolution arising from the acts of the parties, or that at the hearing it would, upon the merits, dissolve the partnership. If the partnership is a continuing one, and may continue, it will only direct an account. If partners agree upon a term for the partnership to continue, neither partner can dissolve the partnership until the end of the term. But, if there be misconduct, this Court can and will before the time expires appoint a receiver, and the Court, though disinclined to such orders, will, on a proper case being made, appoint a receiver on an interlocutory application. But the case then to be made must not be one raising merely a question whether there is or is not misconduct, as between the partners. The Court must, especially if there be no term, see its way to a dissolution at the hearing; and it must be remembered that where there is a dissolution the appointment of a receiver is prima facie a matter of course. The question whether there is or is not a term is one proper for the hearing, and is not one that the Court will try on an interlocutory application of this sort. Does the case shew beyond doubt that there was a term here? I think not. Still I do not think there is sufficient to enable me, at this stage of the cause, to say that, at the hearing, it will appear that there was no term. If there was a partnership term, and it was dissolved, as contended, by the notice of the plaintiff, a receiver would be a matter of course; but, as I have said, the question of a term or no term is one proper to be decided at the hearing of the cause on the merits. Upon the whole, therefore, I think on this ground, I must refuse to appoint a receiver. Then, as to the misconduct of the partners; and first, as to that of the plaintiff. If he has been guilty of any, he cannot, of course, take advantage of it to procure a dissolution. As to the misconduct of the defendant; has there been any such—is any proved—such as to entitle the plaintiff to a dissolution, or to make it impossible to continue the partnership? I think not; for I gather from the evidence that the plaintiff had the whole controul of the business until it became more extensive, when he had some difficulty in finding funds for carrying it on; the defendant then received and paid monies, gave orders and managed the affairs of the partnership, and seems to have been obliged to do as he did in consequence of the plaintiff's own conduct. There may, therefore, have been so far a violation of articles, but it was on both sides. I must say that I think there was no such violation on the defendant's part as to amount to misconduct. On this ground, therefore, I must also refuse the receiver. The rest of this motion must stand over till the hearing, and the costs must be reserved.

 Dec. 3. } WILD v. HILLAS.

Injunction—Action upon a Covenant—Equitable Plea—Mistake.

The plaintiff sold two leasehold houses, one to the defendant and another to L. The conveyance to the defendant contained by mistake a part of the property intended to be sold to L, but which the defendant believed he was purchasing. Upon a bill filed against the defendant by L, he was directed to reconvey to L. that portion which by mistake was included in the assignment to him. The defendant then brought an action at law against the plaintiff, the vendor, for damages under his covenant against incumbrances. An equitable plea was put in by the plaintiff, who now filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the action; but the injunction was refused.

The bill in this case was filed to restrain an action at law under the following circumstances. The plaintiff, as the executor of Thomas Street, sold by auction the leases of two houses in Inverness Road, Bayswater, being numbers 20 and 21. The first house was held under a lease dated the 3rd of February 1843, for ninety-five and a half years, and the second under a lease dated the 2nd of February 1843 for the same period. No. 20 was comprised in lot 5, and was described in the particulars of sale as “a convenient and well-arranged dwelling-house, No. 20, Inverness Road, with wing at side extending over gateway. It is brick built, with stuccoed front and slated roof, has a forecourt inclosed with iron palisade front on stone curb, and contains (here followed particulars of the rooms in the house). At the side, with distinct entrance by carriage gates, is a yard, with shed under the wing of dwelling, and back coach-yard, at the end of which is a brick building or coach-house, two-stall stable, with two rooms above, small yard beyond, with loose box or extra stable. The residence is let to Mrs. Watson, by agreement for three years, from Lady-day, 1854, at 65*l.* per annum. The yard, coach-house, &c., are let to Mr. Hawkins, fruiterer, &c., as a yearly tenant, at 23*l.* per annum. The foregoing is held, by lease for a term of ninety-five years and a half, from Christmas, 1843, at a rent of only 2*l.*” No. 21 was comprised in lot 6, and was thus described:—“A leasehold private residence, No. 21, Inverness Road, adjoining lot 5, and of similar design and accommodation, with the deficiency of the wing. It is now, and has been for years past, in the tenure of Mrs. Trulock, a yearly tenant, at, per annum, 55*l.*, and held, by lease for a term of ninety-five years and a half, from Christmas, 1843, at a ground rent of 7*l.* 10*s.*” The house No. 21 stood upon the north of the two pieces of land; and a piece of the land comprised in the lease under which No. 21 was held had been separated from it, and a building intended to be used as a larder to No. 20, and solely accessible from that house, and a loose box or extra stable, had also been constructed upon a part of the land. The remainder of the piece of land so separated was used as a small yard, but the stable and yard were accessible only through a carriage entrance under part of the wing to the house No. 20. The conditions of sale provided that the abstract of each lot should commence with the respective leases under which they were held, and that each purchaser should be considered to have purchased with full notice of the contents of the said leases, and it was further provided that if any mistake be made in the description of the premises, or any error or misdescription appear in the particulars, the same should not affect the sale, but a compensation should be given or taken as the case might require, to be settled by the auctioneer at the sale.

At the sale by auction, one Mr. Leuty agreed to purchase lot 5, and Mr. Hillas, the defendant, purchased lot 6. The abstract sent to Leuty comprised merely the property held under the lease of the 3rd of February, and that sent to Hillas comprised all held under the lease of the 2nd of February. The titles were accepted, and only that held under the lease of the 3rd of February (that is to say, merely the house and yard of No. 20, without the small yard and larder) was conveyed to Leuty, and all that held under the lease of the 2nd of February, including, therefore, the small yard and larder, was conveyed to Hillas. Leuty began to make alterations in the small yard, whereupon Hillas claimed it as his. Leuty then filed his bill against Hillas and Wild (the vendor), praying that the small yard and larder might be assigned to Leuty, or otherwise that the purchase might be rescinded. It appeared that Hillas had never been actually into No. 21 previous to the sale, but had inspected it from the next house. The cause came on before the Master of the Rolls, who dismissed the bill. The plaintiff Leuty then appealed to the Lord Chancellor, who reversed the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and directed Hillas to execute a proper conveyance to Leuty (1).

(1) 2 De Gex & Jo. 110; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (s.a.) Chanc. 534.

His Lordship observed, in giving judgment, "Whether Hillas has not a remedy against Wild is a matter which cannot be decided now." Hillas then commenced an action in the Court of Exchequer against Wild, for damages under the covenant contained in the assignment of the lease. The covenant on the part of Wild, the vendor, was as follows:—"And the said James Wild doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with and to the said Samuel Hillas and his heirs, that he the said James Wild hath not at any time heretofore made, done, executed or committed, or knowingly or willingly suffered or been party to or privy to any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever, whereby, or by reason, or by means whereof, the said messuage, tenement and premises, or any part thereof respectively, or the term or interest therein respectively, are, is, can, shall or may be impeached, surrendered, charged or incumbered, or in any manner affected in title, estate, or otherwise howsoever." Declaration was delivered in this action on the 3rd of November 1858, and Wild put in two pleas, one being an equitable plea, stating the above circumstances, and to that plea Hillas had demurred.

The bill was now filed by Wild to restrain the action at law, and it charged that Hillas was a trustee in equity of the larder, &c., for Leuty, according to the Lord Chancellor's decree, and that Hillas was not entitled to sue at law upon the covenant.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Speed now moved for an injunction in the terms of the bill, and contended that the plaintiff would have a good defence in equity if a bill were brought against him, but that the Court of law would not entertain the equitable plea set up by him.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Surridge, for the defendant, contended that Wild had committed a breach of the covenant, and had deteriorated the value of the property, and Hillas was therefore entitled to sue him upon it for damages.

Mr. Glasse, in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—One thing, I think, is clear, that when Mr. Wild put up these lots for sale he intended lot 5 to comprise not only what was held under the lease of the 3rd of February 1843, but also part of the property in the other lease of lot 6, and lot 6 was only to comprise part of what was held under the second lease. It is also quite clear that it was the intention of the purchaser of lot 5 to buy the whole of what was included in that lot, the back yard, stable, larder, &c. He meant to buy, and Wild meant to sell all that. I think I must give Mr. Hillas credit for this, that whether he took proper means to ascertain or not, he believed he was buying the whole of the property reaching back to the extreme boundary, but he certainly did not take the proper pains to ascertain what was in the occupation of Mrs. Trulock. It was negligence as to his own interest; and I cannot understand a man going into an auction-room and buying a house without ever inspecting the property, but merely going into the next house, which happened to be empty, to see what he could. It was the greatest possible negligence, and if he had done what a man of ordinary prudence would have done, these proceedings would never have been necessary. Still, on the other hand, this is clear, that, in Wild's description, not only is the word "beyond" used, but also there is a misdescription as to the lease and the rents under which the houses were held. When the parties come to execute their conveyances there were words to carry the stable to Mr. Leuty, though not the legal estate in it, and then the vendor conveyed to Mr. Hillas, not only what was in lot 6, but all that was comprised in the lease of the 2nd of February, which, it is clear, Mr. Wild did not mean to sell; but which, I must assume that Mr. Hillas thought he was buying. The Lord Chancellor came to the conclusion that as between Leuty and Hillas, Leuty had a right to say, "This is my property; I am entitled to this; I have agreed to buy it, and it was conveyed by mistake to Hillas, and it must be conveyed by him to me." But Wild had nothing to do with that; and the Lord Chancellor says, "Whether Hillas has not a remedy against Wild, is a matter which cannot be decided now," for it did not necessarily follow that because Leuty had a right to recover that piece of ground against Hillas, Hillas had no right against Wild, and the question now is, whether Hillas having taken legal proceedings I ought to restrain them. It appears to me that if the action is allowed to go on, it must turn upon the question whether there has been any breach of the covenant, and whether this property is of less value than what Hillas had a right to. Now, Wild is not the owner, but merely a trustee for sale, and he entered into the common trustee's covenant. Still it is difficult to say that Wild has not done "some act whereby the premises comprised in the conveyance to Hillas are impeached," &c., because it is clear that, so far as relates to the part which has been conveyed to Leuty, it has been injured; and it is very difficult to say that the residue, that is, the estate, term and interest, may not be impeached by reason of the acts done by Wild, when the act which conveyed away that portion has vested a part in another person, and has enabled the other person by some act, as by forfeiture, to injure that part which Hillas retained: whether a Court of law will hold that that can be compensated for by damages which can be ascertained as diminution of value, I cannot take upon myself to say. But there is an action which may be maintained by Mr. Hillas, so far as that portion of the claim is concerned, by reason that his portion of the property may be impeached. It appears to me that I cannot restrain him altogether, because, even if we omit all mention of the previous conveyance, here is a question of title, and it is clear that the question still remains open whether, if you correct the deed, there is not just the same ground of action if these words are omitted from the deed. Besides which, upon the real ground of the injunction, as to which I entertain great doubts, I find this, that the defendant at law has put in pleas which raise this defence; and I see no reason why the Court of law would not entertain this defence. The plaintiff at law has demurred to one of these pleas, raising thereby the question whether it is a defence; but I must say that if questions like these are not such as a Court of law can entertain, I should have great difficulty in saying that they could be entertained in a court of equity. Finding that I ought not to interfere as to that part which relates to the loss of the property, I come to the conclusion that I ought not to grant the injunction. It might be said at law that there may be a ground on which a Court of equity might rectify a deed of assignment, but in the absence of that, a Court of law must deal with the covenant as it finds it; and so far as the rectification goes, a Court of equity ought to have the jurisdiction. At first I considered that this bill was, in fact, to rectify the deed; it has been satisfactorily shewn that that could not be so, because the Lord Chancellor's decree went on the footing of its remaining unrectified, and that Hillas was a mere trustee of the property conveyed to him for Leuty. Having regard to the state of things, I must refuse the injunction, though I must say it is with some degree of hesitation as to whether the moral justice has not been throughout against Hillas. The costs will be costs in the cause.

Vendor and Purchaser—Specific Performance—Notice.

A purchaser of leasehold property is bound to inform himself of the contents of the lease, and cannot avoid specific performance on the ground that it contains an unusual covenant, which was not mentioned in the particulars or at the sale.

The bill in this case was filed for specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of a leasehold carpet factory and other premises in the Foreign of Kidderminster, which were put up for sale by auction on the 15th of June 1857, by the following description:—"All that newly erected carpet factory, called 'the Beaver Works,' situate in the Foreign of Kidderminster, in the county of Worcester, together with a piece of land, containing 2 a. 1 r. 18 p. (on part of which the said factory is erected), together with the engine, shed, steam-engine, machinery, and all other erections, buildings and working gear thereof, and the appurtenances thereto belonging. And also all those two messuages, cottages or tenements adjoining the said factory. The above premises are held under a lease from the Right Hon. Lord Ward, for an unexpired term of fifty-three years, at the yearly rent of 30*l*. The premises being in the Foreign of Kidderminster, the rates and other payments are very low."

By the 5th condition of sale it was stipulated that the lease should be deemed the commencement of the title, and the production of the receipt for the last half-year's rent should be taken to be conclusive evidence that the lessee's covenants had been duly performed; and the 7th condition provided compensation, to be settled by arbitration, in case of any mistake, error or omission in the particulars or conditions.

At the sale the defendants became the purchasers of the premises at the price of 1,080*l*., and paid the deposit, and signed an agreement for payment of the residue of the purchase-money; but upon perusal of the abstract of title it was discovered that there was in the lease a covenant on the part of the lessee that he would not exercise, or permit to be exercised, upon all or any part of the premises the art or trade of a tallow-chandler, melter of tallow, soap-maker, tobacco-pipe maker, distiller, butcher, slaughterman, or any other noisome or offensive trade. The defendants claimed compensation in respect of this clause, on the ground that the conditions should have disclosed it at the time of the sale, and declined to complete without such compensation; whereupon the present bill was filed.

Mr. Rolé and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiff, urged that there having been no misrepresentation, the usual rule must prevail, that the purchaser of a lease must be taken to have made himself acquainted with all the covenants contained in it.

Wood, V.C. (without hearing a reply).—This case is concluded by the authorities, and very reasonably so. A purchaser of leasehold property is bound to inform himself of the contents of the lease, by which the value of the leasehold interest is determined; and I do not see how he can say he is injured by what he has not taken the trouble to inquire about. There has been no misrepresentation; the property has simply been put up for sale according to certain particulars; and not a syllable is said about the lease containing none but the usual covenants. If you agree to grant a lease, it may be that you cannot insist on having any other than the usual covenants inserted; but the sale of an existing leasehold interest is a different thing. The vendor simply says he has a leasehold interest for sale; and it is not to be supposed that upon the purchase of this interest simpliciter there is any understood agreement that the lease contains none but the usual covenants. The authorities at common law which have been cited carry the matter no further than the doctrine which has been established in this court. If a vendor sells with notice of a lease, the onus is thrown on the purchaser of making himself acquainted with the contents; but if he takes upon himself to make any representation as to the contents of the lease, the purchaser is absolved from the necessity of inspecting it himself, and entitled to rely on the statement of the vendor. In Jones v. Edney there was a false description in the particulars, and though the auctioneer at the sale read the lease, the vendor was held bound by his representation. And in Coverley v. Burrell, which was the case of the sale of an annuity payable out of the tolls of Waterloo Bridge, where the particulars did not state that it was, as in fact it was, redeemable, and the Bridge Act had no provision for the redemption, the purchaser was held to be warranted in concluding that it was an annuity for so many years or for life, and he recovered his deposit-money. The authorities in equity are these:—Taylor v. Stibbert (1) was a case where a purchaser of freeholds, with notice that the estate was in possession of a tenant, was held to have notice of a lease, although he took it for granted that the tenant was only so from year to year; and Lord Rosslyn said, that a purchaser, with notice of a lease, had notice of everything contained in the lease, even if there were a covenant for perpetual renewal. This may be one of those cases which are referred to, by Lord St. Leonards (2) as going rather too far. Hall v. Smith (3), which came before Sir William Grant, was a suit for specific performance of a contract to purchase an estate, which was in lease to a tenant. The defendant declined to complete the purchase, objecting, amongst other things, to a covenant in the lease, under which the tenant claimed 400*l.* for improvements; and Sir William Grant said, referring to Taylor v. Stibbert, "As to the obligation to pay for the improvements, the objection comes to this: that if there be any covenant at all burdensome to the landlord, the purchaser may object to the title. That cannot be so. When a lease is stated, it is the business of the party to look at it, and to see whether there is any covenant that may materially influence his judgment as to the value. If the circumstance that the land was in lease had been concealed, that would be a different consideration; but, upon analogy to other cases, if the party has notice that the estate is in lease, he has notice of everything contained in the leases; if, for instance, there is a covenant to renew, the purchaser cannot object that he had no notice of that particular covenant. That was determined by Lord Rosslyn." Pope v. Garland was a case in which it is very questionable whether there was not actual misrepresentation. These cases are all commented on by Lord St. Leonards in his text-book (4), but I would rather refer to his judgment in Martin v. Cotter (5). At page 506 he says:—"Sir William Grant carried the doctrine that notice of a lease to a purchaser is notice of its contents along way in Hall v. Smith; but in that case there was no mistake or misapprehension as to the subject-matter of the contract; there was nothing but a particular covenant, which was not stated. It might be dangerous to say that the rule laid down in that case was universal in its application; for I can imagine a covenant in a lease which would so deteriorate the property as to destroy the interest of the seller in it; and the particulars might state some of the covenants and omit that. Such a description might amount to fraud in the sale. I agree that if a purchaser has notice that the property is held under a lease, he cannot object that he had no notice of any particular covenant therein contained. He must look closely and be active in order to ascertain whether there is any such as would materially prejudice him." If I were to hold otherwise in this case, no man could put up a leasehold estate for sale by auction, without setting out every covenant in the lease. Surely it is more sound to hold that the purchaser is bound to inform himself of the nature of the property he is about to buy; and I cannot, without overruling the authorities to which I have been referred, refuse to decree specific performance, with costs.

Dec. 21. } In re WARD'S LEGACY.

Bankrupt—Reversionary Legacy—Creditors' Assignee, Sale by.

A bankrupt, after obtaining his certificate, contracted with the creditors' assignee for the purchase of his reversionary interest in a legacy to which he was entitled under the will of his father-in-law. Shortly after the agreement had been signed, the reversion fell into possession. On the day named in the contract for the payment of the purchase-money the bankrupt tendered the amount to the official assignee, who refused either to receive it or to recognize the contract. Upon a petition by the purchaser,—Held, in the absence of fraud or proof of insufficient value, that the contract was valid and ought to be completed.

Samuel Peace Ward became entitled, under the will of Josiah Smith, his father-in-law, to a legacy of 1,400*l.* in case he should survive his wife and there should be no issue of the marriage living at her death, an event which happened.

During the life of his wife S. P. Ward mortgaged his reversionary interest in the legacy to secure the payment of several debts, and on the 4th of July 1855 he joined with the mortgagees in assigning the said legacy to the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, to secure a sum of 500*l.* and interest. This security was made subject to redemption, and it also contained a power of sale on the non-payment of either principal or interest. On the same day Ward made a further charge upon the legacy, to secure a debt due to George Brown, for the payment of which he was pressed.

On the 28th of April 1857 S. P. Ward was declared a bankrupt, and Patrick Johnson was appointed the official assignee, and William John Roffe was appointed the creditors' assignee.

On the 8th of January 1858 S. P. Ward obtained his certificate, and immediately afterwards he wrote to the assignee, asking him to consider whether some means might not be adopted to prevent the reversionary interest being sold by the assurance company under the power of sale. This was followed by other correspondence, and on the 11th of January 1858 the assignee wrote, saying that he could find no person to purchase, that there was a disinclination in parties to lock up their money, "especially as they would have to insure Mr. Ward's life to protect themselves from loss, and that the matter would have to be left to take its chance. As to paying off the assurance office and securing any contingent interest for the benefit of the estate, it was impossible. The official assignee had not a shilling, and it was doubtful if there would be sufficient to pay the expenses of the bankruptcy. If you think there is any value in it, you can turn it to account. I will sell this interest to you, subject to the claims of the Edinburgh office and Mr. Brown. If you are coming to town, call, and I will talk the matter over with you." After an interview, Mr. Ward wrote, "saying he was willing to purchase the contingent interest, but he must see the secretary of the assurance office before he could make an offer." On the 2nd of February 1858 he wrote to the assignee, saying "that he had arranged with the secretary of the assurance office to postpone the sale, and that he had obtained the valuation of the reversionary legacy from Mr. Peter Hardy, the actuary of the London Assurance Corporation, who, exclusive of the charges, had estimated it as being worth 616*l.*" A copy of this he inclosed to his assignee, and made him an offer of 35*l.* for the reversionary interest in the legacy, which he undertook to pay on the 10th of July 1858. This offer Mr. Roffe accepted, and on the 9th of February 1858 he signed a memorandum to that effect, reciting the facts and agreeing, in consideration of the 35*l.*, to sell the reversionary interest in the legacy, and Mr. Ward undertook to pay the claims of the assurance office and of G. Brown.

On the 10th of March 1858 the petitioner's wife died, and the reversion fell into possession.

On the 9th of July 1858 the purchase-money was tendered to the official assignee, who refused to accept it, alleging that the agreement was not binding on him. Copies of all the correspondence and of the agreement were then sent to him; and on the next day the purchase-money was tendered to the creditors' assignee, who accepted it, and signed a receipt for the amount.

George Brooks and William Cooke Norton, the trustees of the will of the testator, Josiah Smith, when apprised of these facts, paid the sum of 1,350*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.* into court, under the Trustees' Relief Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, on account of the legacy of 1,400*l.*

Mr. Ward now presented this petition, praying that he might be declared entitled to the benefit of the purchase, and that payment might be made to the mortgagees of what, upon taking the accounts, should be found due to them, and that any surplus might be paid to him.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Parke, for the petitioner.—The question was, whether a creditors' assignee had power to sell a reversionary interest of the bankrupt in a legacy, without the consent or intervention of the Commissioner or the official assignee. Before any contract was entered into an attempt had been made to sell the reversion; and before the purchase was made a long correspondence had taken place, during which the opinion of an actuary had been taken on the value of the reversion, and he, upon the assumption that it was free from incumbrances, valued it at 616*l.*, about the amount of the existing charges. It was under these circumstances that the petitioner offered to pay off the mortgages, and to pay a further sum to the assignee for the purchase of the reversion; and these sums appeared to be the full market value, considering the charges, the threat of sale under the power, and the liability to costs. The accident of falling into possession within so short a period of the purchase ought not to prejudice a contract made bonâ fide in every respect.—

12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. ss. 40, 149.

Mr. Bagshawe and Mr. T. Parker, for Mr. Roffe.

Mr. Speed, for the Edinburgh Assurance Company.

Mr. Sheffield, for Mr. Brown.

Mr. Wickens, for the trustees of the will of J. Smith.

Mr. Higgins, for the official assignee.—The creditors' assignee sold the reversion without the consent of the Commissioner or of the official assignee. The purchase was also made in consideration of a sum to be paid, not of an immediate money payment. Assuming, for instance, that the tenant for life had been unwell or dangerously ill, it might be doubted whether a full value had been given for the reversion. The official assignee, however, in the exercise of his discretion, had not thought fit to receive the purchase-money; he had preferred having the whole transaction submitted to the Court.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the contract of the creditors' assignee would support the sale if made bonâ fide. Neither fraud nor inadequacy of value had been proved, and there was nothing to impeach the contract. It was a reversionary interest, purchased not only subject to mortgages upon it, but also subject to other contingencies. The accident of the death of the tenant for life so soon after the agreement had been signed was one which could not be considered, unless, possibly, there was proof of dangerous illness, which was known to the parties at the time. This contract, however, was made after a long correspondence and inquiry. As to the price, that seemed sufficient. The order, therefore, must be as prayed; but the official and creditors' assignees, as well as the mortgagees and trustees, must be paid their costs out of the fund.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } MACPHERSON v.
 Nov. 16. } STEWART.

Thellusson Act—Accumulations of Income —Corpus—Scotch heritable Property.

*A testator gave the income of all his property to his mother for life, and after her death he gave an annuity of 100*l.* to each of his two sisters, the longer liver to have 200*l.* After the decease of his two sisters, he gave two legacies of 500*l.* each. The testator then left the whole of his property, real and personal, to trustees, to be placed out on such securities as they should think most advisable, for the benefit of his heirs; and after the decease of his mother and two sisters, the amount of the same to be invested in landed property in Scotland, which was to be strictly entailed on his nephew and his heirs lawfully begotten:—Held, that the gift for the benefit of the heirs of the testator was a gift of the corpus of the property, as it existed at his death, for the benefit of all those who were entitled to any of his property real or personal; that the directions in the will rendered accumulations of income necessary, which could not be done for more than twenty-one years after the death of the testator, by reason of the Thellusson Act; and that the direction to invest accumulations on land in Scotland did not prevent the operation of the Thellusson Act.*

Robert Macpherson by his will, dated the 11th of April 1822, devised and bequeathed as follows:—"I give, devise and bequeath the rents, issues and profits, and interests, dividends and produce of all the property or estate which shall be belonging to me at the time of my death, or of which I can under this my will have power to dispose, to my dear mother, Mrs. Isabella Macpherson, of Bencher, for and during all the days of her natural life, and from and after the decease of my dear mother, Isabella Macpherson, I will and bequeath an annuity of 100*l.* sterling a year to each of my sisters, the Misses Magdalena Macpherson and Isabella Macpherson, of Bencher, and the longest survivor of my aforesaid two sisters, to receive an annuity of 200*l.* sterling a year during her natural life; after the decease of my said sisters, I leave and bequeath 500*l.* sterling to each of my nephews Captain Duncan Macpherson, of his Majesty's 11th Regiment of Foot, and Captain James Macpherson, of his Majesty's 13th Regiment of Foot: the whole of my property, real and personal, heritable, leasehold, or of whatever description it may be, I leave in trust to the after-mentioned trustees and executors, who are during the lifetime of my aforesaid mother, Mrs. Isabella Macpherson, and my aforesaid sisters, Misses Magdalena Macpherson and Isabella Macpherson, to place the same in such funds, stocks or securities, either in Europe or India, at their discretion as they may think most advisable, for the benefit of my heirs; and after the decease of my aforesaid mother, Mrs. Isabella Macpherson, and sisters, Misses Magdalena Macpherson and Isabella Macpherson, the amount of the same, whatever it may be, is to be vested in the purchase of landed property in the highlands of Scotland, which said landed property is to be strictly entailed on my nephew Lieutenant Evan Macpherson, of the 21st regiment of Madras Native Infantry, and his heirs lawfully begotten."

The testator died on the 6th of January 1823; Mrs. Isabella Macpherson died on the 23rd of June 1823; one of the sisters had since died, and the other sister was still alive. Evan Macpherson died in 1847.

The bill was filed for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Court upon the construction of the will.

Part of the property of the testator had been invested in heritable bonds in Scotland.

Mr. Baily and Mr. A. Smith appeared for the plaintiffs, the executors and trustees of the testator.

Mr. Goldsmid and Mr. Cotton, for the next-of-kin, contended that the direction to accumulate was void, and that the property must be considered as personalty.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Graham Hastings appeared for the heir-at-law of the testator, and submitted that the direction to invest in landed property in Scotland excluded the bequest from the Thellusson Act, and that an investment in Scotch heritable bonds was sufficient to satisfy the terms of the statute, since these bonds were a good heritable security in Scotland, and would go to the heirs of entail.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Harrison appeared for other parties.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This case presents some peculiar questions, and there is very little direct authority bearing upon them. The first question is, who are or is entitled to the accumulations which have taken place since the death of Mrs. Macpherson, the mother? There are questions also arising under the Thellusson Act; but anterior to those is the construction of the will; and whatever doubt there may be upon those questions, one proposition is clear, that in construing the will the consideration of the Thellusson Act, or of any other act, must be postponed in the first instance, and the intention of the testator then alone regarded. In this case there is a gift by the testator of the income of all his property to his mother, for her own benefit during her life, without any trust. Then comes the gift of the annuities, and two legacies are to be paid at the death of the survivor of the two sisters. There is no doubt that these legacies are payable at the decease of the survivor, whenever that event takes place. There is not the smallest doubt that the gift “for the benefit of my heirs” is a gift of the corpus of the property as it existed at the testator’s death, a gift which would carry any subsequent income subject to a trust during the life or lives of the mother and two sisters. During the life, therefore, of one person entitled to the income for her own benefit, there is an implied trust to invest the corpus, but not the income. The testator directed the income to be actually paid to his mother for her life; and therefore the investment, so far, cannot mean an investment or accumulation of income. The testator then goes on to direct an express investment of all his property, and says it is to be so invested as in his will is specified, “for the benefit of his heirs.” Now the word “heirs” in the English law is understood in the limited or technical sense of “those persons entitled by inheritance or succession to real estate”; but here the testator clearly does not mean heirs in that sense. Not only in the Scotch law and the Civil Law, but in popular parlance, the word “heirs” includes heirs, whether born or constituted, as hæres natus aut factus, and it is not confined to real estate. It must here be taken in the wide and general sense: the testator meant, I think, to include all those persons who in any form by the will or otherwise after his death would become beneficially entitled to his property. The word “heirs,” so accepted, will therefore include not merely those persons who under the subsequent limitations will be entitled to the property to be purchased in the highlands of Scotland, but the mother who was to take the life income, and the two sisters who took the annuities, and there is no reason to exclude his nephews. The amount of the same (that is, the property given to the trustees, whatever it may be) is that which is to be invested. Although there is here a specific direction to invest the corpus at first, that, coupled with the direction that it is to be for the benefit of all those persons to whom the testator has ultimately given it, carries the income as well as the corpus. The tenant for life was to have the income arising from the implied trust to invest in the first instance for her own benefit; and the sisters their annuity, so far as by means of the investment there was a fund out of which it was payable for their benefit. Extending this construction to the last persons named, they, subject to the life interest of the mother and the provision for the annuities, are absolutely entitled; and this view is corroborated by the consideration that there would be otherwise an intestacy. It then becomes necessary to consider the operation of the Thellusson Act. Although a testator may not in terms direct accumulations, still, if he gives such directions as make investments and accumulations necessary, the act applies. Here the testator has given such directions; and therefore the trustees, from the exigency of the case, would be under the necessity, from the time when Mrs. Macpherson died, viz. on the 23rd of June 1823, of investing the income and accumulating it. But the Thellusson Act provides that no accumulation shall be made for more than twenty-one years from the death of the testator. That period expired on the 6th of January 1844; and from that time, therefore, all the directions to accumulate, either express or implied, are void. From that time the income would belong to the next-of-kin of the testator at his death.

It was also said that part of this property, having been invested in Scotch heritable bonds, was not within the statute; and it was argued thus:—The direction in the testator's will to invest, included an investment in land in Scotland. An investment in Scotch heritable bonds was such an investment. Therefore it was a disposition affecting heritable property in that country, and so within the 3rd section of the Thellusson Act, and exempted from its operation. But I do not think so. For observe, if that argument is correct, a person in England may direct an investment until every member of the Lords and Commons is dead, and make it effectual by directing the investment to be made upon heritable bonds in Scotland. By so doing some one, some day or other, would come into an enormous property, and that is the very mischief meant to be guarded against by the Thellusson Act. It is true that the reason for the exception of heritable property from the Thellusson Act was to avoid trenching upon the prejudices of the Scotch people, and out of regard to the Scotch law of perpetuities, but that does not alter this case. Then comes the question, to whom does the income go after the expiration of the twenty-one years? If the next-of-kin of the testator at the time of his death were now living, it would go to them. Some, however, died within the twenty-one years, and, therefore, the representatives of such deceased next-of-kin are entitled to a part of the income, whether arising from heritable securities or not. With regard to the 500*l.* legacy to the nephews, as there was no present, but only a future, gift of that sum to take effect after the death of the two sisters (not of the mother), if the sisters had died in the lifetime of their mother, the legacies would have taken effect, even in derogation of the life income.

Rent-charge—Arrears—Deficient Rents—Sale of Estate.

The owner in fee of a small freehold estate granted twenty-two separate rent-charges to several persons and their heirs, each of which was made subject to the others; the whole fell into arrear, and the power of distress and entry could not be enforced. Upon a bill by one of the grantees, on behalf of himself and the other grantees,—Held, that the arrears must be raised by a sale of the estate.

Robert Smale, on the 30th of January 1845, was seised in fee of a piece of land, formerly part of Hounslow Heath, which was inclosed, under the 53 Geo. 3. c. clxxiv. In the same year he contracted to sell the land, with four cottages erected thereon, to the defendant, William Henry James, who was an agent for the Anti-Corn-Law League, a combination then lately organized to promote the repeal of the then existing Corn Laws, and by creating freehold rent-charges of 40*s.* a year, to enable persons of similar opinions to give effect thereto through their votes at elections for members of Parliament.

By an indenture, dated the 30th of January 1845, R. Smale, in consideration of 50*l.*, granted to William White, the plaintiff, an annual yearly rent-charge of 40s. to be charged upon and issuing out of the premises sold, to hold the same to him, his heirs and assigns, and to be paid on the 30th of January in every year, free from taxes; and R. Smale granted and agreed that, in case the rent-charge should at any time be in arrear for forty-one days, it should be lawful for the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, to enter and distrain as for rent reserved on lease, for the purpose of satisfying the rent-charge and all arrears, together with the costs, charges and expenses, and in case the yearly rent-charge or any part thereof should at any time be in arrear for six months, the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, was empowered to enter upon the premises, and hold the same or any part thereof for his own use until full payment of the arrears of the rent-charge due and to accrue due during his being in possession, with all costs, charges, damages and expenses, such possession, when taken, being without impeachment of waste. Robert Smale further covenanted that he had good right to grant the rent-charge, and the powers and remedies for compelling payment, and to charge the same on the premises, which he further declared should for ever thereafter remain subject to the rent-charge and the powers given for the recovery of the same. He also covenanted against incumbrances, except those appearing in the schedule.

On the same day R. Smale, by separate deeds, granted twenty-one similar rent-charges to twenty-one other persons. These were the incumbrances referred to in the plaintiff's grant, and each of these grants was made subject to the several other grants.

Robert Smale, who was originally made a party to the suit, was dismissed, on his stating, by his answer, that he had no interest in the estate, but that he had granted the several annuities at the instance of W. H. James; that he was ignorant of the purpose, and that W. H. James claimed to be seised of the estate, which appeared to have been conveyed to him on the 1st of March 1845, subject to the rent-charges.

The plaintiff's and all the other rent-charges were in arrear. The cottages had been for some time unoccupied, and there was nothing on which to distrain, as that power had been so frequently exercised that no tenant could be found willing to occupy them, and none of the several grantees could recover or maintain possession of the premises at law.

The premises were unproductive, and would so remain unless tenants were quieted in possession. They were also unprotected and deserted and falling to decay and depreciating in value, and unless protected would soon cease to be a sufficient security for the several rent-charges.

The plaintiff, therefore, for himself and the other grantees, prayed for an account and payment of what was due to him and the other grantees of rent-charges, or in default that the arrears, together with the costs of the suit, might be raised by sale or mortgage of the premises, and if by sale, that the residue of the purchase-money might be invested to secure the future payment of such rent-charges. The bill also prayed for a receiver; and on the motion of the plaintiff, one was appointed.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. W. Morris, for the plaintiff.—As there is no available remedy for the recovery of the arrears of the rent-charges, the plaintiff is entitled to have the premises sold, and to have the receiver continued in the mean time.—

The Mayor of Basingstoke v. Lord Bolton, 1 Drew. 270; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 305.

Mr. Shebbeare, for W. H. James.—The rent-charges were granted by Mr. Smale, and the deeds contained no covenant for their payment. The defendant was fully aware of these grants when he took a conveyance of the premises. The purchase-money for these rent-charges was paid to the Anti-Corn-Law League. Mr. Smale was not their agent. The contract made by the parties was for an interest in land; they were, therefore, bound to look to its sufficiency. All they contracted for was a grant with power of distress and entry. It was, however, now asked that the whole property might be taken and sold, and that when nothing but the income was charged and when the grants contained no authority to sell the fee. The plaintiff, therefore, had no right to the estate against the defendant, or any other parties—

2 Bythewood on Conveyancing, 49 et seq. 3 ed. by Sweet.

1 Powell on Devises, by Jarman, 234.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am bound by Cupit v. Jackson, notwithstanding any observations made upon it; but the passage read from Bythewood on Conveyancing adopts apparently the view of the Vice Chancellor, in the cases cited, that the Court as a matter of discretion will not direct a sale until the fee simple, out of which the arrears are to be raised, is in possession. In Graves v. Hicks the Vice Chancellor says, that the money must not be raised before the inheritance falls in. There is no conflict between that case and Cupit v. Jackson. If I refuse to raise the arrears of this rent-charge now, when shall I be in a better position to decree a sale? The rent-charges have been created; and it has been proved impossible to pay them out of the rents. I cannot allow the owner of the fee to enjoy the land without paying the arrears. Neither can I suffer the property to go to waste. The consequence of leaving the property subject to these rent-charges would be to render it unproductive; it would also cease to be of value to any one. Under these circumstances, as the premises subject to the rent-charges cannot be made available by any other means, it must be done by a sale. I am not pressed by the observations that the other grantees are not present, and might prefer not to have a sale; their interest is the same as the plaintiff's, and they must be served with a copy of the decree. Their concurrence will then be necessary in any proceedings under it. I must, therefore, follow the case of Cupit v. Jackson, and make a decree to raise the arrears by a sale of the estate.

STUART, V.C. }
Dec. 3. } BLOWER v. BLOWER.

Administration of Estate—Interest on Simple Contract Debt—Statute of Limitations.

A testator, by his will, gave all his real and personal property to his wife, out of which he desired that she would discharge all his legal debts and enjoy the surplus for her life; and at her decease the property was to be divided as in the will mentioned. A farm servant of the testator left his wages from time to time in his master's hands, and it was agreed between them that the debt thus due should carry interest. The testator died in 1837:—Held, in a suit instituted after the death of the widow of the testator, in 1854, for the administration of his estate, that the Statute of Limitations did not operate as a bar to arrears of interest upon the sum left by the servant in his master's, the testator's, hands.

This was an administration suit. The testator in the cause died in March 1837, having, by his will, given to his wife the whole of his real and personal property, desiring her thereout to discharge all his legal debts and to enjoy the surplus for her life; and then disposed of the said property in manner therein mentioned.

The testator for some years before his death had in his employment one John Pritchard, as a husbandry labourer. Pritchard left his wages, amounting to 8*l.* per annum, in his master's hands, the master advancing him from time to time various small sums for the discharge of his personal expenses; and it being agreed between them that the debt thus due from the master to the servant should carry interest. After the testator's death, Pritchard remained in the service of his widow and executrix, who maintained him and occasionally paid him small sums by way of wages and for necessaries. After the widow's death, in 1854, this suit was instituted, for the administration of the testator's estate, when the question arose whether interest upon the simple contract debt due from the testator's estate to that of Pritchard was payable for the whole time which had elapsed from the testator's death, or whether the Statute of Limitations prevented the recovery of more than six years' arrears.

It appeared that the following memorandum had been made in the testator's own handwriting:—

"May 1, 1834. Wages, principal and interest due to John Pritchard up to this day, 154*l.* 8*s.*," followed by entries of payments of 1*l.* each from time to time to the said J. Pritchard.

The claim made before the chief clerk in respect of principal and interest due to the estate of J. Pritchard from that of the testator amounted to 334*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* Of this the sum of 154*l.* 8*s.* was claimed as due to Pritchard up to the 1st of May 1834, and the rest as being the amount of several sums of money left in the hands of the testator, with interest upon such sums and upon the said 154*l.* 8*s.*, after deducting the payments made to Pritchard from time to time by the testator on account.

The chief clerk allowed the claim to the extent of 280*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* in the following manner:—

Amount due 1st May, 1834	154	8	0
Wages from 1st May 1834 to June 1837, less 14 l. paid on account.....	12	0	0
	166	8	0
Interest at 4 l. per cent. from 1st May 1834 on 117 l. 5 s. 11 d. to date of certificate, less tax	110	11	9

The plaintiff now moved to vary the chief clerk's certificate in the following particular: that the sum of 110*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* allowed for interest as above mentioned on 117*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.*, part of the debt found due to the estate of J. Pritchard, might be reduced to such a sum as such interest would amount to if calculated from the 23rd of May 1850, being six years previous to the date of the decree, on the ground that all interest accruing on the said debt prior to the 23rd of May 1850 was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Mr. Dickinson, in support of the motion.—The claim before the Court is for arrears of interest in respect of money charged on land, and therefore falls within the words of the enactment of 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 42, that "no arrears of rent or of interest in respect of any sum of money charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, shall be recovered by any distress, action or suit, but within six years next after the same respectively shall have become due."

Mr. C. C. Berkeley, for another party, in support of the motion.—The debt being a simple contract debt does not carry interest—Barwell v. Parker (1). Though there is here a charge upon the testator's assets for payment of debts, that is not of itself sufficient to make the Statute of Limitations inapplicable to the case.

Dundas v. Blake, 11 Ir. Eq. Rep. 138.

Mr. Amphlett (with whom was Mr. C. M. Roupell), contra.—The present is not the case of a mere charge of the testator's property with the payment of debts. The creditor claims not under a mere charge, but under a trust for the payment of debts. The testator has given all his real and personal property to his wife, "out of which he desired that she should discharge all his legal debts." These words create an express trust within the meaning of section 25. of the statute, which enacts, "that when any land shall be vested in a trustee upon any express trust, the right of the cestui que trust, or any person claiming through him, to recover such land, shall be deemed to have first accrued, according to the meaning of the act, at and not before the time at which such land shall have been conveyed to a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and shall then be deemed to have accrued only as against such purchaser, and any person claiming through him"—Hargreaves v. Michell (2) and Dillon v. Cruise (3). The debt being from a master to an old servant, a relation between the parties analogous to that between guardian and ward, is another ground for holding that the statute does not apply—Thomas v. Thomas (4).

(1) 2 Ves. 363.

Mr. Martindale appeared for another party.

Mr. Dickinson replied.

STUART, V.C. said, the case raised and argued in support of the motion was, as to the length of the time during which interest was recoverable. There was in this case a charge of debts made by the testator's will. The debt due to the servant was a debt carrying interest by the terms of the contract. It was a simple contract, but it was a simple contract to pay interest, and there could not be a doubt as to its validity. It had been settled by authority in this court, that where, by a testator's will, a charge has been created upon the whole of the estate for payment of debts, and the person named in his will charged with that duty is directed to apply the whole of his estate in payment of the debts, in such a case, the creditors being bound to resort to the person who holds the property charged with the duty of paying the debts, the Statute of Limitations has no application—Hargreaves v. Michell and Hughes v. Wynne (5). When the interest formed a part of the simple contract debt, that doctrine had as much application to the interest as to the principal. It was said, however, that the recent statute did apply, because it was enacted by the 42nd section that only six years' interest should be recoverable in respect of money charged on land; but there was no authority shewing that the Court had ever sanctioned the notion that the statute was applicable to a case in which there was an express trust of real estate for the payment of debts. The motion, therefore, must be refused; and, having regard to the circumstances under which it was made, refused with costs.

Equitable Mortgage—Registration in Middlesex.

A memorandum charging a leasehold estate in the county of Middlesex with the payment of a sum of money, retains its priority over a subsequent mortgage duly registered under the 7 Anne, c. 20; and in a suit by the equitable mortgagee,—Held, that he was entitled to a foreclosure.

By a lease, dated the 16th of January 1810, a piece of land in Grosvenor Street, West, in the county of Middlesex, was demised to Richard Wardle, from the 29th of September 1809, for ninety-seven years, at a yearly rent of 29*l.*, subject to various covenants therein contained.

This land, upon which several houses had since been built, became vested in Ann Hughes, for the residue of the term.

On the 28th of February 1857, Ann Hughes assigned the premises to Ralfe Raddiffe Whitehead and James Heywood Whitehead, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of 1,900*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent.

John Lamp Wright, the plaintiff, subsequently advanced to Ann Hughes a sum of 120*l.*, and on the 23rd of May 1857 she signed and delivered to him the following writing:—

"Memorandum.—In consideration of your having this day advanced and lent to me the sum of 125*l.*, for which I have given you my warrant of attorney, I hereby agree to charge my leasehold houses, situate, &c., with the payment of the same, and hereby undertake at your request, and at my own cost, to execute a proper assignment of the said premises as you may direct, and I agree to pay interest on the said sum at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum."

On the 25th of January 1858, Ann Hughes was declared a bankrupt, and Hatton Hamer Stansfeld was appointed the official assignee, and John Harrison and Stephen Moore were appointed the creditors' assignees.

J. L. Wright then filed the bill in this suit, praying for payment of what was due, or that the defendants might be foreclosed.

It was then ascertained that Ann Hughes, on the 13th of November 1857, had assigned the same premises to Mary White, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of 600*l.* and interest at 5*l.* per cent.

A memorial of this deed had been duly registered in pursuance of the 7 Anne, c. 20. The memorandum taken by the plaintiff was not registered.

Mary White was then made a party to the suit, and she now claimed priority over the plaintiff.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiff. — The memorandum taken by the plaintiff as security was neither a deed, conveyance nor will: it was merely a contract, which remained to be perfected. The 7 Anne, c. 20. did not require its registration.

Mr. Bernard, for Mary White. — The words of the Registration Act are large. The legislature contemplated a complete registration of the title affecting lands; a memorandum creating a charge gave in effect the rights of a mortgagee, and it was within the mischief which the act intended to guard against. The word "conveyance" included any writing which passed an interest in land. The case cited had no application to the present; the point was altogether new.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The memorandum given to the plaintiff is not within the provisions of the 7 Anne, c. 20, requiring deeds, &c. to be registered; I must, therefore, make the usual decree for foreclosure against all the defendants.

Arbitration—Reference as to Value—Umpire—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

Arbitrators were named in a contract to determine the value of brewery premises and the plant, &c. Before entering upon the valuation they were to appoint an umpire, whose authority was to be limited to the matters in difference between the arbitrators. The arbitrators could not agree in the appointment of an umpire; and upon a summons under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854,—Held, that this was not an arbitration within the meaning of the act, and that the Court had no authority to appoint an umpire.

Edward Collins carried on the business of a brewer, at Richmond. After his decease, a suit was instituted for the administration of his estate, and on the 25th of February 1858, Esther Rachel Collins, the widow, and one of the devisees and trustees of the testator, entered into a contract with Charles John Phillips and James Wigan, for the sale to them of the freehold, leasehold and copyhold houses and premises belonging to and forming part of the Richmond Brewery, together with the fixtures, furniture and things held therewith, and also the stock in trade, casks, horses, drays, loose articles and miscellaneous effects belonging to and in and about the brewery premises comprised in schedule 2, at a customary brewery valuation as belonging to a brewery in work. They were also to purchase all the copyhold houses and brewery premises mentioned in schedule 2. at a valuation, but such premises were not to be valued as brewery premises, but with reference to their capabilities for any other purpose than that of carrying on a brewery therein. They were also to purchase all the fixed plant, vats, tuns and machinery belonging to or in and about the copyhold premises in schedule 2. at a valuation, which was not to be made as of brewery plant and effects in use, but at such a price as they would realize if broken up and sold in lots. They were also to purchase all the stock in trade, book debts owing by publicans, and rents of public-houses of the Richmond Brewery, which should belong or be due to the brewery at the time when the purchaser should be let into possession of the premises, and the licences and policies appurtenant thereto, at a customary brewery valuation to be made by the valuers or their umpire; and the contract provided, "that the purchase-money of all the premises agreed to be sold should be determined by G. W. W. Mason on behalf of the vendor, and by Richard Moss on behalf of the purchaser, and they shall choose an umpire before entering upon the valuation, and in case of the death of either of the valuers before making their joint valuation, then the purchase-money shall be determined by the survivor of the said persons, and such other persons as the party hereto whose valuer shall have died shall nominate within fourteen days next after such death, or in case he shall make no such nomination, or having made such shall not give notice thereof in writing to the other party hereto within such space of fourteen days, then the same shall be determined by the person who shall have been chosen umpire as aforesaid, and the decision of the said valuers or their umpire, or of such valuers or umpire jointly, shall be conclusive and binding on the parties hereto. And it is agreed that if either of the said valuers shall give to the other of them notice in writing requiring him to enter upon, proceed with, or complete the said valuation, or to join in requesting the umpire to act, and the valuer to whom such notice shall be given shall from any cause fail to comply therewith within fourteen days from the day on which it shall be given, then the valuer giving such notice may, immediately after the expiration of such fourteen days, request the umpire to act, and he is hereby authorized to act accordingly. And it is further agreed that the duties of the umpire shall be strictly confined to the matters in difference between the said valuers; and that if before the said umpire is called on to act, the said valuers shall have agreed upon the valuation of any part or parts of the premises contracted to be sold, the umpire shall adopt the valuation of such part or parts so agreed upon, and incorporate the same with his valuation of the remaining part or parts of the premises."

The agreement was sanctioned by the Court; but the valuers themselves could not agree upon the appointment of an umpire.

A summons was then taken out for all parties to attend, that the Judge in chambers might appoint an umpire. The question, however, was adjourned into court.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Baggallay, for the defendant, E. R. Collins.—In this case the Court has a jurisdiction vested in it, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 12. It not only included every reference where disputes had arisen, but also all references made where no dispute existed. The Court will therefore not allow the contract to fail in consequence of a disagreement between the valuers, but it will appoint an umpire.—

Mr. Bovill and Mr. Schomberg appeared for the creditors; but the Court declined to hear them.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Druce, for Messrs. Phillips and Wigan.—The question raised in this case has nothing to do with arbitration. The contract was conditional; either for sale or purchase, it was incomplete. There was nothing in difference between the parties: a valuation of property alone was to be made. The parties never met. To make this an arbitration there must be an award; but no award was required in this case. The rules relating to arbitration can never apply to contracts for purchase. This may be a contract on which an action would lie; still it is not a complete contract to purchase, and it could not be sued on in equity. The act was passed to remedy defects which impeded Courts in the administration of justice; but every case of valuation was clearly to be excluded.—

Lee v. Hemingway, 3 Nev. & Man. 860; s.c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 124.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The result contended for, as arising from the effect of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 12, was at first rather startling; it, of course, assumed that the vendor was right, upon the construction of the statute. Had it been so, cases which this Court could not have enforced would, under this act of parliament, have been brought within its jurisdiction, and all those circumstances relied upon by parties to prevent the interposition of the Court would have been at once removed. For instance, if a person agreed to sell property to another, and said that the price should be fixed by J. C., who had a particular knowledge of that species of property, in consequence of which he was willing to intrust the valuation to him, and to him alone, yet if that person died before he could make the valuation, the purchaser, under this act of parliament, might call upon the Court to appoint a stranger to make a valuation binding upon both parties, and to be carried into effect as if the valuation had been made by the person originally appointed, and that notwithstanding the contract was entered into by the vendor only because he knew that the valuer first appointed had a particular knowledge of the value of the property to be sold, and the worth arising from its situation. What, then, are the words of the act of parliament? Is there an express direction, or does such a result arise from necessary implication? The words used in section 12. are, "if in any case of arbitration": it is unnecessary to read further, all depends on those words. What, then, do they mean? What is a case of arbitration? It is certainly important not to lose sight of the construction that has been put upon the provisions of the 9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 15. The word "arbitration" is not co-existent with the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125; it was known before it. Still, it is material not to lose sight of the manner in which the Courts dealt with the word "arbitration," as it existed under the 9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 15, in order to arrive at a satisfactory meaning to be attached to it in this case; and there certainly appear few reasons for excluding any particular arbitration, or any form of arbitration which may be called an arbitration, from the 9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 15, that do not apply to the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. Now, it is submitted, that the word "arbitration," as used, does not mean the arbitration specified in the act of parliament, but anything, whether within or without the act, which can by any means be called "arbitration"; and certainly the words are very general and large, and there are instances of this construction, as where the Statute of Limitations says, "no action shall be brought to recover any legacy" (1); this refers to every species of legacy. This is an illustration of the view contended for, that, although the act specifies a particular species of arbitration, still that the word is general and applies to every case: and if this can satisfactorily be shewn to be so, the Court must act upon it. It therefore becomes necessary to consider what "arbitration" means. I concur in the observation, that fixing the price of a property may be "arbitration"; but in this case I do not think that the fixing the price of the property is "arbitration," in the proper sense of the term. An arbitration is a reference to the decision of one or more persons, either with or without an umpire, of a particular matter in difference between the parties; and although it is very true that in one sense it must be implied either that there is a difference, or that a difference may arise between the parties, yet the distinction is material, and one which has been properly relied on. If nothing had been said respecting the price by the vendor and purchaser between themselves, it can hardly be said that there is any difference between them. It may be said that if the purchaser knew the price which the seller required, there would be no difference—that he would be willing to give it. It may well be that the decision of a particular valuer appointed may fix what is to be the price; and the price may be equally satisfactory to both, so that it can hardly be said there is a difference, although, as a general rule, the seller wants to get the highest price for his property, and the purchaser wishes to give the lowest; in that sense it may be said that there is to be an implied or expected difference between the parties; but unless that difference has arisen, it does not appear to be “arbitration.” If two persons enter into an agreement for the sale of property, and try to settle the terms, but cannot agree, and after dispute and discussion respecting the price, say, we will refer the question of price to A. B., he shall settle it, and they agree that the matter shall be referred to his arbitration, that would appear to be “arbitration,” in the proper sense of the term, within the meaning of the act; but if they agree to a price to be fixed by another, that does not appear to be arbitration. Leeds v. Burrows draws the proper distinction between what is “arbitration,” in the proper sense of the term, and appraisement valuation, in which case the valuation certainly precludes differences, in the proper sense of the term—it precludes differences from arising, but it does not settle differences which have arisen. That is the distinction which exists between cases of appraisement and cases of arbitration. It seems to be drawn in Hemingway's case, in which there was an agreement to sell land, at a particular price to be fixed; by award the price was fixed, and one party came for an attachment under the award, and said that it was an arbitration; but Littledale, J. pointed out the distinction: he says, “this is not properly an arbitration: it is, in effect, an agreement to sell the land, and this is not a settlement of any difference between the parties, but merely something auxiliary to the contract entered into between them for the purpose of the sale of the land. And accordingly, upon a breach of the contract, you have your remedy, for it is clear that a specific performance would have lain here in that case. It is clear, also, that an action would have lain for damages; but not being an award, because it was not a matter in difference that was referred by these parties, you cannot have it by way of attachment.” Therein lies the distinction; and that is approved of by Lord Campbell, who thinks that it is a proper distinction, and one that he must adopt. Gordon v. Whitehouse does not appear to affect the case materially one way or the other. The cases which are material are Hemingway's case and Leeds v. Burrows; but I look at this case simply as in the nature of a contract, to the purposes of which contract this was auxiliary, and in order to save discussion, and to prevent differences which might arise between the parties, it was agreed that the price should be settled by the decision of two persons who were to be called in, who were to call in an umpire before they proceeded to the settlement. Accordingly, in Darbey v. Whitaker, it never occurred to the parties that the Court had power to appoint an arbitrator, which would have removed all the difficulty and arrested a series of decisions, of which Milnes v. Gery is an instance. If the act of parliament had intended to refer to these cases, it would, as you must attribute to the legislature a perfect knowledge of the law, have gone on to say, “And be it further enacted, that in any case of a suit for specific performance, it shall not be any sufficient defence to such suit to allege that the arbitrator has died, or that no arbitrator was appointed, and this Court shall have power to appoint an arbitrator in such case for the purpose of completing the contract.” Whether the legislature foresaw what the consequence would be of the general use of the words used, it is impossible to ascertain; but by restricting the word “arbitration" to the proper sense of the term, the section is perfectly right, and does not apply to a case of this description; and having had an opportunity of speaking to Wood, V.C. since the discussion of this case, I have his authority for saying that he did not intend In re Lord to apply to a case of this description. Concurring with him in that decision, and in the opinion which he gave as to the remedial nature of the statute, still it does not govern this case. I must therefore hold, that the Court has no authority, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, to appoint an umpire. The question, however, has been properly argued in court; I shall therefore allow counsel only, and not give any direction about costs.

Partnership—Double Remedy—Unsupported Charges in a Bill—Costs.*

*J. W. and C. B. were partners as bankers. C. B. was the managing partner, J. W. not interfering in the active business of the concern. They negotiated with R. R. to become a partner, and shewed him a written statement of the affairs of the bank, which was wrong to the extent of 15,000*l.; but J. W. was ignorant of the falsehood. R. R. joined the partnership, which continued four years; but he never examined the books. On the discovery of the fraud R. R. brought an action against J. W. and C. B.; but before declaration J. W. died, and the action being continued against C. B., R. R. obtained a verdict, with damages assessed by arbitration. C. B. became insolvent, whereupon R. R. filed a bill against the executors of J. W. to set aside the contract, and to render the estate of J. W. liable for the indemnity of R. R. against the claims of the creditors of the late firm. One of the Vice Chancellors having made a decree in accordance with the prayer, but without costs, in consequence of the unsupported charges of fraud contained in the bill, the executors of J. W. appealed:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to relief; and the appeal was dismissed, with costs, except that the plaintiff was allowed the deposit.

A representation made by a party, not knowing that it is false, is binding upon him; and if the other party enters into a contract on the faith of its truth, the Court will set aside the same altogether, and not merely rectify it. Though the other party does not examine the books for four years during which the partnership continued, it not being his duty to do so, it will not bar him of relief on the score of negligence or acquiescence.

The bringing of an action against the partners, and recovering a verdict against the survivor of them, does not prevent the deceived party from seeking relief in equity.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Stuart.

The facts of the case may be stated very shortly, although the pleadings and evidence were very voluminous, the latter being in many respects extremely conflicting. The bill contained many charges of fraud of a gross character, which were not supported by the evidence, on account of which, and of the conduct of the plaintiff not being satisfactory, the Vice Chancellor refused to give him his costs.

The facts, which are very fully stated in the judgment, were, that in 1848 James Wickham, Charles Bailey and Robert Jessett carried on the business of bankers in partnership, at Winchester, under the firm of "The Winchester and Hampshire Bank." On the retirement of Mr. Jessett, in February 1850, Mr. Robert Rawlins, a retired solicitor, living at Whitchurch, near Winchester, became a partner with Mr. Wickham and Mr. Bailey for 2,500*l.*, that being the sum in which the old firm were indebted to him for money advanced. The partnership of Wickham, Bailey and Rawlins commenced on the 1st of March 1850, under a deed of partnership of that date. During the progress of the negotiation, or at the execution of the deed, or at both times, a statement in writing was produced to Mr. Rawlins by Mr. Wickham, having been made out by Mr. Bailey, shewing that the balances due to the customers of the bank were 11,000*l.*, but it subsequently turned out that the sum was 26,000*l.*, though Mr. Wickham was wholly ignorant of the fact. The partnership continued for four years, when, the business-being sold to the Hampshire Banking Company, the fraud was discovered, and great deficiencies were found in the books, caused by the misconduct of Gattrell, a confidential clerk in the bank. Mr. Rawlins brought an action against Mr. Wickham and Mr. Bailey, but before declaration Mr. Wickham died, and the action was continued against Mr. Bailey, and a verdict returned in favour of the plaintiff, with such damages as should be assessed by an arbitrator. After the verdict Mr. Bailey became insolvent, and thereupon Mr. Rawlins filed the present bill, seeking to set aside the partnership contract; to have the deed of partnership delivered up to be cancelled; that the defendants, the executors of the will of Wickham, might be ordered to pay back the 2,500*l.* paid by Mr. Rawlins for his share in the business, with interest; that the defendants might be decreed to execute to Mr. Rawlins an indemnity against all outstanding debts and liabilities which he had or might become subject to and liable to pay in respect of the dealings and transactions of the partnership; for accounts, and particularly of what Mr. Rawlins had had in respect of such dealings and transactions, and for repayment of the same, and payment of the costs of the suit by the defendants.

The Vice Chancellor made a decree in favour of the plaintiff (1); and the execu-

(1) The judgment of the Vice Chancellor, pronounced on the 4th of May 1858, was as follows:—

"This case is unfortunately too clear. No contract of partnership, whether made between two or more individuals, where one of them enters into it upon the faith of false representations, can be allowed to stand. It has been urged, on behalf of the late James Wickham, that, in cases of the kind to which I have just alluded, all that a Court of equity can do is to compel the person proved to have been guilty of making a false representation to make such representation good. Such, however, is not the doctrine of this Court, when dealing with questions of partnership. In this case the plaintiff, who was desirous of entering into a banking co-partnership with the late Mr. James Wickham and the defendant Bailey, was presented with a statement of the affairs of the then existing firm, from which he was led to believe that the amount due from such firm to its customers was 11,000*l.* only. It has been established in evidence that the amount so due, at that very time, was not less than 26,000*l.* The two material topics of defence which have been insisted upon are these:—First, it has been urged tors appealed. Mr. Bailey did not appear, either at the original hearing or on the appeal.

which were unquestionably made to him, were open to the plaintiff. But that is no defence against a charge of misrepresentation. It frequently happens that the means of ascertaining the truth, in cases of this nature, are within the power of the complainant, but it has never been held, that in order to entitle him to rescind his contract, he is bound to shew that he has resorted to all the means of information within his power. The very motive of the misrepresentation is to check inquiries of this nature. The contest upon this point is one which scarcely requires the assistance of authority; but I may refer to a case, before Sir John Leach, Maddeford v. Austwick (1), in which one partner agreed to purchase his co-partner's share in their joint business for a sum which he knew, from the accounts in his possession, was an inadequate consideration. There the contract was set aside; although the misrepresentation might readily have been detected by the partner to whom it was made. The second topic of defence to the prayer of the bill, which seeks an entire dissolution of partnership as to the three partners, is, that Mr. James Wickham was himself deceived in the matter. Then, who made the false representation? The defendant Bailey? But when Mr. Wickham and Mr. Bailey were about to enter into partnership with the plaintiff, Rawlins, if Mr. Wickham thought fit to intrust Mr. Bailey to represent to the incoming partner the actual state of affairs, and if, in consequence of the representations so made, the partnership formed upon the strength of those representations is to be dissolved, so far as regards Mr. Bailey, the whole contract is at an end. However, it is of no consequence whether the guilty foundation of this contract lay with Mr. Bailey or Mr. Wickham, or, as has been alleged, with a person who was the clerk of both. The principles of equity make it necessary that I should declare that both Mr. Bailey and Mr. Wickham are answerable for the effects of the falsehood, and that the contract in question cannot stand. All that has been urged, therefore, with reference to the honesty and bona fides of the late Mr. Wickham, is clearly beside the question. The other matters which have been discussed appear to me to have reference rather to the question of costs than to the actual measure of relief to which the plaintiff must be held entitled. It has been insisted, as an answer to the whole relief prayed by the bill, that the plaintiff, Mr. Rawlins, almost forced himself into the partnership which he is now so anxious to disclaim. One of his letters has been referred to, in which he states to the effect that 'unless he is allowed to step in quickly, the bank must fall.' There can be no doubt but that the plaintiff was aware of the difficulties with which the partners were contending; but this knowledge, although it may be a very sufficient ground for imputing rashness to the plaintiff,

Sugden's Concise View, 178.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the defendants, the executors of Mr. Wickham.

The counsel for the plaintiff disclaimed any intention of imputing personal fraud or deception to the late Mr. Wickham, is no excuse for a misrepresentation, the effect of which was to make a confessedly bad state of things look better than it really ought. Still, however, it is a point which will weigh with the Court when dealing with the question of costs; and there are in this case other circumstances which are not favourable to the plaintiff in this respect. His case has been greatly overstated in the bill. This is not an unusual circumstance where relief is sought upon the ground of alleged fraud; but it is a highly injudicious course. The parts of the bill in which these erroneous statements occur are many in number. There is an allegation to the effect that the plaintiff entered upon the partnership almost reluctantly, that he did so solely at the inducement and persuasion of Messrs. Wickham and Bailey. Now, it is perfectly clear upon the evidence, that the plaintiff was more anxious himself to plunge into this ruinous concern than those gentlemen were to receive him. Nor must it be forgotten that after the plaintiff had entered upon the partnership, and Lord Justice Knight Bruce also declared that what was by the technical rules of the court denominated fraud was alone laid to his charge, he being as much deceived as to the state of the bank as was the plaintiff. His Lordship also observed that the counsel for Mr. Wickham's executors might take for granted that nothing like personal fraud or dishonesty was imputed to that gentleman. The imputations of fraud were doubtless of far greater importance to the Wickham family than any amount of property involved in the dispute.

Dec. 16.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This is a suit for enforcement of a familiar principle, in a state of circumstances not by any means of an ordinary kind. Its object is to relieve the plaintiff from the effects of a contract for partnership, into which it is his case that he was led by material and important misrepresentations relating to the subject-matter of the contract, which were made on the part of those with whom the contract was entered into. The facts are these. The plaintiff, who had been a member of the legal profession, which he had quitted, was living as a country gentleman not far from the city of Winchester. In that city a bank had been established for many years, being considered a respectable establishment; it had acquired considerable provincial celebrity, and was reported to have enriched more than one of those who had been partners in it. In the year 1848 the partnership consisted of three gentlemen: Mr. Jessett, who appeared not to have been an active partner; Mr. Wickham, also not an active partner, who seemed, as far as the Court knows, not to have been of any profession, but to have been simply a country gentle-knowing, as he did, that, owing to the state of the country in 1848, the concern was not in so flourishing a condition as it had been, and after discovering that it was, in fact, in a state of extreme embarrassment, he, nevertheless, went on with it for between three and four years, without ever once complaining of the misrepresentation which had been made to him. Looking at the whole conduct of the plaintiff, and at the sort of allegations which have been inserted in his bill, the Court, although it must set aside the contract into which he has entered, cannot allow him his costs. The decree will be substantially according to the first five paragraphs of his prayer."

man; and, in the third place, Mr. Bailey, who, in addition to being a banker, was a practising solicitor in the city, officially connected with the corporation, and therefore apparently having the confidence of the corporation and others. Mr. Rawlins, the plaintiff, appears to have been on terms of intimacy with Mr. Bailey and Mr. Wickham, and had lent them a considerable sum of money, exceeding 2,500*l*. Mr. Jessett thought at that time of retiring from the partnership, and it occurred either to Rawlins himself or to Bailey and Wickham in the first instance, that it might be desirable for Rawlins to enter into the bank in the place of Jessett. Rawlins thought well of the proposal, whether originally proceeding from himself or not; and the better, possibly, because he had a family, and one of his sons might be advantageously introduced into the concern. Accordingly, the subject became one of much discussion and negotiation between Rawlins, Wickham and Bailey—a very protracted negotiation—protracted partly through the difficulty of arranging the terms of Jessett's retirement. Ultimately the terms were settled, and in the early part of 1850 the new partnership was formed, and the plaintiff was introduced in the place of Jessett to one-third share of the business and assets—not gratis, but under the arrangement that 2,500*l*. should be taken out of the debt which Wickham and Bailey owed him. The transaction was completed in the early part of 1850, and the deed of partnership was signed. The partnership was to continue for twenty-one years, but to be determinable upon twelve months' notice on the part of any one of them. It continued for some years, under, however, great and growing dissatisfaction on the part of Rawlins, the new banker. He complained, though in a friendly manner; and in the end the other members of the firm became also tired. An arrangement was then made for parting with the business to a joint-stock company. The arrangement was completed in 1854, rather more than four years after the commencement of the partnership. Almost simultaneously with the completion of this arrangement, died suddenly the sole or principal clerk of the bank, who had been trusted exclusively, and considered most respectable, and almost entirely conducted the business. Upon his death, the amount of money discovered in his house created surprise and suspicion. Hence arose an investigation, and it was discovered that frauds, extensive in their nature, had been committed by this confidential clerk, who for a series of years had been thus intrusted, and that the state of the business was very serious and bad, causing great loss to the partners. This led to a suspicion, even if it had not been previously entertained on the part of the plaintiff, as to the manner in which (to borrow a phrase of bankers) he had been "arranged" in the matter. He made inquiries, he consulted the books, and the evidence appeared conclusive that he had been (to use a coarse expression) cheated into becoming a partner. This led to the present suit. The plaintiff stated that the affairs and state of the business were grossly misrepresented by Wickham and Bailey, and he has, in my opinion, clearly established that gross misrepresentations were made, which must be ascribed to both. Upon the negotiation a paper had been produced containing a statement of the debts and credits of the firm, and, amongst other things, the amount due to customers, which was stated, not in detail, but in the aggregate, as about 11,000*l*. The real amount exceeded that by many thousand pounds—a fact which appeared upon the books; and if they had been examined by any person ordinarily competent, the fraud would have been at once discovered. On the question, whether fraud has been practised, it is not necessary to go any further; it may have been that this was not the only misrepresentation, but it is enough to say that this is distinctly proved. Is there any excuse, any apology for this? For Bailey, there is none. As a professional man, personally attending the bank and personally managing its affairs, I say, in the most pointed manner, that it was his duty to know what the books contained. Beyond a doubt, he was a party to the gross misrepresentations. On the other hand, Wickham was an inactive partner; he did not interfere with the customers, attended only occasionally at the bank, not meddling with the books, and knowing nothing of them—but still a partner, and not a sleeping partner, who had a right to examine the books and to make himself acquainted with the whole state of the business; and, as between himself and a partner newly introduced, it was his duty to be so acquainted. What did he do? Whether with acquaintance or lack of acquaintance with the affairs, it is proved that he joined with Bailey in the misrepresentations in producing the statement of accounts alluded to, and alleging it to be an accurate account of the position of the bank. He ought not to have asserted what he did not know to be true. If he did not know, it was his duty to say—"It may be correct or not. I have a good opinion of Mr. Bailey and Gattrell. I do not know the facts; you must ascertain for yourself." He did not say so; he joined in the assertion, that the falsehood was truth; and in the position in which he stood towards the plaintiff, I am clearly of opinion that he was as much personally liable as if he had personally known the falsehood of what he asserted. It has been plausibly urged, that even if Wickham had spoken as he ought to have done, the plaintiff would still have acted as he did, having confidence in Bailey. But this is only conjecture, and the Court cannot speculate on what did not happen. There is therefore a joint assertion for every purpose of the suit—though I do not say for every moral purpose—and not as implicating Wickham in any delinquency beyond that which arises from neglect of his business and omitting to state what he ought to have done as to his knowledge of the real condition of the bank. He became, therefore, answerable for the misrepresentation, and the contract was vitiated. If, therefore, the plaintiff had discovered the fraud earlier and complained earlier, there would have been no question as to the result. But it is said that during all the four years that the partnership lasted Rawlins might have inspected the books. I am not satisfied that difficulties would not have been thrown in his way—I am not satisfied that Bailey would not have objected; but he did not do this—and I must conclude that he not only entered into the firm without examining the books, but that he voluntarily continued in the same state of ignorance during the whole time till the business was sold. There are many persons to whom the plaintiff would not have been allowed to say that he was ignorant of the contents of the books—to whom the utterance of such an excuse would have been a vain thing. There are many persons with respect to whom it was the plaintiff's duty to know the contents, as much as it had been Wickham's duty to know them at the commencement of the partnership, but was it as much his duty as between himself and Wickham and Bailey? I think not. The plaintiff was entitled to believe in the accuracy of the statement made to him without opening one of the books before the partnership, and he was entitled to continue in that belief until there was suspicion on his part or complaint on the part of one of his partners. But no complaint was ever made against him for not entering into the affairs, taking part in the business, or examining the books. On the contrary, he had reason to believe that any inspection of the books or interference with the business would have been disagreeable, and have given offence. It cannot be said that he committed any breach of duty—and it cannot be said that if it had been, the other partners could not have remonstrated. It is true that he was early dissatisfied with the state of the affairs, but it was in no unfriendly spirit, and I must hold that from the commencement of the partnership until the death of the dishonest and wicked clerk, who was instrumental in causing so much misery to all parties—he was entitled to say that he was in complete ignorance that he had been deceived. Strange, therefore, as it may seem till unexplained, when explained the plaintiff's case has not been destroyed, nor even made worse by the extraordinary silence of four years. I am convinced that the Vice Chancellor has taken a correct view, and that the plaintiff is entitled to stand in the same position as at the commencement of the partnership. If by any acts of the plaintiff he has in any way prejudiced or damaged the business, there may be grounds for compensation, and in that case the Court might have granted an inquiry. But there is no such suggestion—there is no probability that he did mischief or harm of any kind. It has been ably argued that justice might be done by only charging the defendants with the difference between the misrepresentation made and the actual state of things. But the plaintiff has a right to elect, and to say that the misrepresentation vitiated the whole contract. Another peculiarity in this very singular case is, that an action in respect of this misrepresentation has been brought by the plaintiff against Wickham, while he was living, and Bailey. Before declaration, Wickham died, and the action was continued against Bailey alone; a verdict was obtained by the plaintiff and the damages referred to arbitration, and the award has settled the amount at several thousand pounds; but this is not sufficient to make good all that the plaintiff claims to be entitled to, or all the loss sustained by him, as he alleges. It seems to me that this judgment, not being against Wickham, did not take away the plaintiff's right against his representatives. But if anything is recovered upon the judgment against Bailey, it must be accounted for in this suit, the amount so recovered being first liable to the payment of the plaintiff's costs at law. The decree is not so worded as to provide for this, and it is probable that the attention of the Vice Chancellor was not directed to this point. Substantially the decree is correct. It is said that the decree, having proceeded on the principles on which it is grounded, should have given costs against the estate of Wickham. But I am not disposed to disturb the decree in this respect. The statements of the plaintiff in his bill are too strong—stronger than the evidence warranted. On that ground I am not disposed to give the plaintiff the costs of the appeal; but I think that justice will be done by giving him the deposit.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — This is an appeal from a decree by which the Vice Chancellor has set aside a purchase made by Mr. Rawlins, and directed accounts and inquiries, the result of which will be to place Rawlins, as against the estate of Wickham, in the same position as if he had never formed the partnership. I cannot but feel regret at the conclusion at which I am compelled to arrive, a conclusion agreeing with that of the Vice Chancellor and my learned Brother. But I think it is right and just in the first place to Mr. Wickham, to state that I do not believe that there was any moral fraud on his part. However, his case cannot be put higher than this, that he knew nothing of the state of the bank, or of the debts due from it, at the time of the negotiation. But, unfortunately, though knowing nothing, he during that period placed in the hands of the plaintiff a statement, professing to be the half-yearly account, shewing that the debts due from the bank to its customers amounted to no more than 11,000*l.*, and yet it incontestably appeared that such debts in truth exceeded 26,000*l.* The delivery of this account by Wickham to the plaintiff cannot be considered in any other light than as a representation by Wickham to the plaintiff, that the concern was a debtor to the customers to the amount of 11,000*l.* only, when in truth it was so to the amount of 26,000*l.* It was at least a representation by Wickham of a fact of which he knew nothing whatever, whether it was true or not; that the representation must have formed a material inducement to the plaintiff in the consideration of the matter of the purchase, cannot be doubted. It turns out that this representation was false. I repeat, that there was no moral fraud; Wickham does not appear to have known that the account was inaccurate; but the representation being untrue, there is legal fraud, and the consequence is that his estate must answer for it. It is not necessary to enter into the principles governing such cases; upon them there has been no dispute at the bar, and the present case plainly falls within them. If, on the treaty for a purchase, one party makes a representation, surely he cannot be afterwards heard to say that he knew nothing about the matter; and still more surely he cannot be allowed to retain any benefit which he might have acquired from the representation which he has made. It is necessary to say this much, for it would be most dangerous to allow any doubt of this doctrine; the opposite principle would be opening a door by which to escape from every case of misrepresentation as to credit. Mr. George Russell, who has argued the case for the defendants with much earnestness and great ability, contended that the misrepresentation complained of as to the amount of the debt formed no part of the basis of the contract, and that the plaintiff's assertion that the account was produced at the time of the meeting for the execution of the deed could not be relied on. I feel sure that if the account was not produced at the time of the execution of the deed, it certainly was produced in the course of the treaty; it was an element in the consideration, and formed part of the inducement; for what other purpose could it have been produced but to enable the plaintiff to determine whether he would or not join the firm? It has been argued for the defendants on the proofs before the Court, that the plaintiff did not rely on the statement, and that he would have joined whether the bank was solvent or insolvent; and it has been also well put by the defendants' counsel that the plaintiff could not have relied on the statements of Wickham, because he well knew that Wickham took no active part in the bank. But without saying that there can be no case where a person who has made a misrepresentation may now be allowed to say that the other party did not rely upon it, the evidence in the present instance falls very far short of what would be required in such a case; and, moreover, it is met by the plaintiff with a distinct assertion that the statement was relied on, and that it was upon the faith of it that he entered into the partnership. I think that the argument that the plaintiff would have joined in any case, is untenable; if the plaintiff had known the true circumstances he would have been able to exercise his judgment, and it is impossible for the Court to say from what was done what he would have done if the misrepresentation had been detected. The argument arising from the fact that Wickham had taken no part in the bank has more weight; but still I am satisfied, on consideration, that the Court cannot rely on it. It does not lie in Wickham's mouth, or in that of his representatives, to say that he had no means of knowing things of which he asserted the truth. Another argument urged by Mr. George Russell related to the time which elapsed since the execution of the articles and the means of knowledge which the plaintiff had since the commencement of the partnership. It was not said that the plaintiff had actually discovered the fraud, but that he had the means of detecting it, and might and ought to have done so before the sale to the Hampshire Bank; and the case of all parties was, that it was not detected until then. This argument, it should be observed, does not proceed on the ground of acquiescence; to an argument so put a sufficient answer would be that the party had no knowledge of his right to claim; and so far as the argument rested upon the plaintiff's means of knowledge, the evidence proves that in the first place there was no examination of the books by the plaintiff; and if the argument could have been put higher, the case of Harris v. Kemble forms an answer to it. That case was for a specific performance of an agreement for a lease of Covent Garden Theatre. The rent had been calculated on a statement of profits of the theatre for several preceding years; and on this ground it was contended that there ought to be no specific performance of the agreement. Sir John Leach decreed specific performance, and the case was brought by appeal before Lord Lyndhurst, and afterwards before the House of Lords. In the report of the appeal in the House of Lords (2) Lord Lyndhurst's judgment in the Court of Chancery is reported. He there said (at p. 471): "Misrepresentations are charged to have been made with respect to the profits of the theatre in the two seasons 1819—20, and 1820—21. It is said on the other side, that Mr. Harrison, or the parties, had access to the books, and that by inspecting and examining certain books, they might have corrected those documents. It appears, from all the evidence, that the books were kept in such a manner as to render it extremely difficult, without bestowing a great deal of time and attention, and employing the skill of an accountant, to deduce any certain conclusion from them; and it does not appear in evidence whether, if those documents had been examined by the books, the error contained in them could have been easily detected; but, at all events, it was a representation made by Mr. Harris with a view to this agreement, with a view to the fixing of the terms of the rent." Lord Lyndhurst, therefore, dissented from the judgment of Sir John Leach, and reversed the decree, and the House of Lords affirmed Lord Lyndhurst's opinion, and refused specific performance. It is true that was a case of specific performance, and is subject to all considerations affecting such cases in this court, but what was said remains of the highest authority as to the detection of fraud. Various acts had in that case been done by the parties to alter the conditions of the lease, and tending to disable the Court from putting the parties who had made the agreement in the same position as if a lease had been granted. That case is important, to shew that the acts must have been strong to induce the Court to refuse relief, which otherwise the plaintiff would have been entitled to. But here I am not aware that any acts of the plaintiff are alleged to have been done at all injurious to the partnership, or from which any loss can have accrued to the partnership. If any such had been alleged and proved by the defendants, there can be no doubt that the right course would have been to direct inquiries; but not finding any, I think there is no ground for inquiry. It has been also urged by Mr. George Russell that the proper course would be to decree the estate of Wickham to make good the representations contained in the paper referred to: that is, to make good the difference between the amount of debts as stated there, and as they really were. But the Court must look to what are the true principles by which it is governed, where a contract has been entered into, and where misrepresentation has induced the contract.

These principles were clearly laid down by Sir Thomas Plumer in Lord Clermont v. Tasburgh (3), the marginal note of which is that the effect of partial misrepresentation is not to alter or modify the agreement pro tanto, but to destroy it entirely, and to operate as a personal bar to the party who has practised it. That again was a suit for specific performance, but it was not so in Edwards v. M'Leay (4). That case is conclusive to shew the course of the Court in cases of misrepresentation. Nor could it be otherwise. The plaintiff here would perhaps never have entered into this contract but for the statement, and I am of opinion that he ought to have been put in a position to decide whether he would enter into the contract or not. There can be no doubt that the principle of the Court is, that where a contract is founded on misrepresentation, the Court cannot rectify it, but must thoroughly set aside the whole transaction. Remarks have been made as to the effect of the action at law. But the action proceeded on the same grounds upon which the bill is founded, namely, fraud and deceit. I do not see how the fact of one partner having been sued at law, can deprive the plaintiff of the right to pursue the estate of the deceased partner in equity, where alone the assets can be administered. The decree is in substance right, but the alteration which has been suggested should be made, and credit should be given for any amount which may be recovered from Bailey at law beyond the costs of the action. There must be no costs of the appeal, but the deposit will be paid to the plaintiff.

Nov. 23. } HOGARTH v. PHILLIPS.

Voluntary Post-nuptial Settlement — Wife's Reversionary Property.

By a post-nuptial settlement the wife's reversionary property was conveyed to trustees, to pay the interest to the husband during their joint lives, and after the death of either of them, the principal to be in trust for the survivor absolutely. Upon the joint application of the husband and wife, the Court, upon the property coming into possession, treated it as unaffected by the settlement.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Stephen Howell Phillips, who, by his will, dated the 3rd of October 1821, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate upon certain trusts, for the benefit of his wife for life, and after her death to be divided between his seven children. The testator died in August 1832. Georgiana Phillips, who was one of the daughters of the testator, intermarried with John Rayer Hogarth, on the 24th of July 1832. On the 28th of September 1833, a deed of arrangement was executed between the widow of the testator and his seven children, by which it was declared that the seven children of the testator were entitled absolutely, after the death of the widow, each of them to one-seventh part of the residuary real and personal property of the testator, or the monies to arise therefrom. On the 30th of November 1833 a post-nuptial settlement was executed between Mr. and Mrs. Hogarth, of the one part, and H. Phillips and R. Stert, of the other part, which recited the will of the testator and the deed of the 28th of September 1833, and recited also, that previously to the marriage of the said J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana his wife, it was agreed that the portion or share to which the said Georgiana Hogarth might become entitled, upon the decease of the testator, should be settled upon the trusts thereafter declared, and that the said J. R. Hogarth should secure to the said Georgiana Hogarth, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity of 400*l.* per annum during her widowhood; and by the said indenture it was witnessed, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and for carrying the same into effect, they the said J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana Hogarth, and each of them, assigned, transferred and set over unto the said H. Phillips and A. Stert, their executors, administrators and assigns, all that the reversionary part, share or proportion of the said Georgiana Hogarth, or of the said J. R. Hogarth in her right, as one of the children of the said Stephen Howell Phillips, deceased, under the before-mentioned will and deed or otherwise, of and in the said real and personal estate, or the monies to arise therefrom, with full power and authority for the said H. Phillips and A. Stert, in the names of the said J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana Hogarth, or either of them, to sue for, recover, receive and give discharges for the same. And it was thereby declared that the said H. Phillips and A. Stert, their executors, administrators and assigns, should stand and be possessed of and interested in the said premises thereby assigned, upon trust when and so soon as the same or any part thereof should become payable and be received, to lay out and invest the same, with the consent of the said J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana Hogarth in writing, in manner therein mentioned; and upon trust, during the joint lives of the said J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana Hogarth, to pay the interest, dividends and annual produce of the said trust funds unto the said J. R. Hogarth and his assigns; and from and after the decease of either of them, the said J. R. and Georgiana Hogarth, the principal or capital of the said trust funds to be in trust for the survivor of them and his or her executors, administrators and assigns absolutely.

The widow of the testator died in 1857, and J. R. Hogarth was one of the executors of her will.

The residuary property of the testator had been sold by the trustees of the will, and the produce thereof had been paid into court under the administration suit.

The cause now came on upon further directions, and J. R. Hogarth and Georgiana Hogarth claimed that the settlement of the 30th of November 1833 should be treated as a nullity, and applied to have the share of the said Georgiana Hogarth in the testator's estate paid over to the said J. R. Hogarth, notwithstanding that settlement.

An affidavit had been made by J. R. Hogarth, to the effect that there never had been any such agreement as that recited in the post-nuptial settlement.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Leach appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Grenside, for J. R. Hogarth, contended that the deed of settlement was void, as a voluntary settlement, and that it must be treated as a nullity. It could not be supported against the wife, as no fine had been levied by her, and no act done to bind her. On the part of the husband, it was entirely voluntary as against any one but the wife, and the wife now joined in this application. The following cases were cited:—

Bridge v. Bridge, 16 Beav. 315; s. c.

22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 189.

Warden v. Jones, 2 De Gex & J. 76;

s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 190.

Thynne v. Glengall, 2 H.L. Cas. 131.

Mr. Wright, for the trustees, in support of the settlement, cited—

Whatman v. Gibson, 9 Sim. 196; s. c.

Smith v. Garland, 2 Mer. 123.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I must hold that this deed was inoperative. I must say, I am strongly opposed to setting it aside on the ground that the husband desires it, even although the wife herself desires it. No instance has been adduced of a husband who had made a post-nuptial settlement of his wife's reversionary property on herself, having on his own application been allowed to treat it as a nullity. Bridge v. Bridge is no authority; for all the circumstances there were utterly different from those in the present case. Still I do not see how to avoid the conclusion that is contended for. In this case it happens that both husband and wife ask that the deed should be treated as a nullity. It might be that the husband might desire to treat it as a nullity, but the wife might consider it most for her benefit, and insist upon it that it should stand. If that were the state of the case, I should be reluctant to set aside the deed. Supposing the husband had executed a deed to himself for life, with remainder to his wife—such a settlement as this Court would ordinarily make—in that case I should feel extremely reluctant to treat that settlement as a nullity. But to put the case the other way, and suppose that the husband were not desirous of setting it aside, because it had been made in a form (as in this case) very much to his own benefit—in a form which makes provision for the wife only in case she survived the husband, and makes no provision for the children. If the husband in that case were desirous of maintaining it, and the wife insisted on its being set aside, it is impossible for me to say that such a settlement of a wife's reversionary interest could stand for a moment against her. In that case it would be difficult to say it is to stand against her, when it would not stand against any other person. The principle must be carried out strictly. This is a settlement which has no operation against the wife, as far as the personalty is concerned, because it was reversionary; nor as to the realty, as there was no act on her part to bind her. No interest passed from her, and nothing passed to the husband; therefore, undoubtedly on the part of the husband it was entirely voluntary as against anybody but the wife. I must also consider that it was entirely voluntary on the part of the husband; and if voluntary he would not be bound by it. Certainly it is not such a settlement as the Court should uphold for the wife. Therefore, I consider that the parties are entitled to treat it as a nullity. I must consider this property as the wife's, unaffected by the settlement. If it is to be paid over to the husband, I must, of course, have the consent of the wife.

Practice—Appointment of Guardian to Infants—Stat. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120.—Regulations of August 8, 1857.

Under the Leases and Settled Estates Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, the appointment of a guardian to infant petitioners should be made after the petition has been presented.

Mr. Pemberton stated that the Registrar had declined, unless by the express direction of the Court, to draw up an order, which had been obtained for the appointment of a guardian to infant petitioners under the above-mentioned act, on the ground, that the order was dated subsequently to the presentation of the petition, whereas, the 21st Regulation of the 8th of August 1857 required that the appointment of a guardian, in a case where an infant is a petitioner, should be made before the petition is presented. He submitted that as the petition in this case was dated on the 1st of August 1857, prior to the issue of the Regulations of the 8th of August 1857, those Regulations were not applicable to the case; and that the question whether the order was irregular must depend upon the construction to be put upon the Leases and Settled Estates Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120. The 36th section of that act provided, that "all powers given by the act, and all applications to the Court under the act, and consents to such applications might be exercised, made or given by guardians on behalf of infants." There did not appear to have been any decision upon the construction of the 36th section; but the practice upon the 37th section, which related to the consent of married women to applications under the act, and was in words similar to those of the 36th section, had been settled by the Lords Justices of Appeal, in the case of In re Foster's Settled Estates (1), where their Lordships had decided that the examination of a married woman, who applies to the Court under the act, ought to be taken after the petition has been carried into Judge's chambers, but before any other step is taken.

STUART, V.C. said, that although the present case must be decided independently of the Regulations, it appeared to him that the most convenient course was to have the guardian appointed after the petition was presented, when there was some proceeding actually pending in the court, rather than beforehand, when there was no suit or matter in which he could be appointed; and that he had so held in many cases that had come before him under the act. As to the Regulations of the 8th of August 1857, he construed them as merely pointing out the manner in which the several proceedings under the act might be taken, for the sake of convenience, and not as being absolutely obligatory in every case.

Devise—Limitations—Estate Tail.

A testatrix devised all her real estate to trustees upon trust for three persons for life, with remainder to their issue in tail, "and for default of such issue, then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir T. S. Bart., deceased, by Mary, his second wife, also deceased, for ever":—Held, affirming the decision of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, that the ultimate limitations created an estate tail special, and not a fee simple.

The question in this case related to the construction of the ultimate trust declared in the wills of two sisters, named Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham, who, being each entitled in remainder, after the determination of certain estates which have long since expired, to one undivided third part of the estates in question in this cause, by their wills dated respectively the same day (the 12th of April 1827), declared an ultimate trust of their respective third shares in the same language.

Sir Thomas Samwell (the father of the testatrixes) was the owner of the entirety of the estates, and by his will, dated the 1st of November 1778, devised his real estates to his natural son, Thomas Samwell, for life, remainder to his (Thomas Samwell's) first and other sons in tail male, remainder to Wenman Samwell for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to Thomas Samwell Watson (afterwards called Colonel Samwell Watson Samwell) for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to Wenman Langham Watson for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to Thomas Fuller Drought for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with the ultimate remainder to the testator's own right heirs.

The testator died in December 1779.

All the tenants for life named in the will died without issue; the last survivor of them, viz., Thomas Fuller Drought (who took the name of Samwell), died in the month of May 1843, whereupon the limitation to the testator's right heirs took effect in possession.

The testator had no legitimate issue.

He was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Samwell by Dame Millicent his first wife. That Sir Thomas Samwell (hereinafter called Sir Thomas Samwell the father) had had issue by Dame Millicent his first wife, besides the testator, four daughters, viz., Mary, Millicent, Frances and Ann. All died without issue, except Mary, who married Stephen Langham, and died in 1747, and had issue five children, viz., John (who died in the testator's lifetime, a bachelor), Millicent and Maria, and the two testatrixes (Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham); Millicent, Maria and the two testatrixes were the co-heirs and co-parceners of the testator at the time of his death, in 1779. Maria afterwards died intestate, whereupon Millicent and the testatrixes became the co-heirs and co-parceners of the testator.

Millicent married William Drought and died intestate, leaving Thomas Fuller Drought Samwell (one of the tenants for life named in the testator's will) her only son and heir.

Each of the testatrixes gave to her sister (the other testatrix) a life interest in her real property, with remainder (excepting the dwelling-house in which they both lived) to trustees and their heirs, upon trust for her two nieces, Frances Drought and Juliana Drought, for life, remainder to their children and the daughters of the testatrixes' nephew Thomas Fuller Drought, in equal shares, in tail, with cross-remainders in tail; "and for default of all such issue [which event happened], then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, Bart., deceased (the father of my late uncle Sir Thomas Samwell), by Mary his second wife, also deceased, who was the daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke, Knight, for ever." The grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, referred to in this ultimate limitation, was the person herein called Sir Thomas Samwell (the father).

Frances Ann Langham survived her sister, the other testatrix, and died in April 1830.

Frances Drought, Juliana Drought and Thomas Fuller Drought (who took the name of Samwell), all died without issue; Frances the last survivor died in 1849. Thereupon the ultimate limitations in the testatrixes' wills, in favour of the right heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by Mary his second wife, daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke, took effect in possession.

There were three children only of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by Mary Clarke his second wife, viz.: Wenman (afterwards Sir Wenman Samwell, Bart.), Catherine (who married Thomas Atherton Watson), and Dorothy, who died an infant and a spinster.

By the death of Sir Wenman Samwell, who died in 1789, without issue, his sister Catherine Watson, became right heir and issue in tail of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father) by Mary Clarke.

Catherine Watson died in 1790, leaving Thomas Samwell Watson (Col. Watson, who, on succeeding to the property, took the name of Samwell), her eldest son and heir, and he was the person who answered the description of right heir and issue in tail of the said Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by the said Mary Clarke, at the respective times of the deaths of the testatrixes.

He died in the year 1831, without issue, and without having barred the estate tail. Thereupon it descended and devolved upon his brother Wenman Langham Watson Samwell, and upon his death, in 1841, without issue, and without having barred the estate tail, upon his brother Atherton Watson.

Atherton Watson died in 1851, without issue, and without having barred the estate tail, whereupon it devolved upon his grand-nephew, Wenman Langham Woodford (one of the defendants in the cause) and his niece, Charlotta Henrietta Wright, deceased (the late wife of the respondent William Wright), as his co-heirs and co-parceners, and they then became the right heirs and issue in tail and co-parceners of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by his second wife, Mary Clarke.

Mrs. Wright, on the 9th of June 1851, executed a disentailing deed, by which her title to the property in question was conveyed to her husband, the respondent, who claimed under its provisions, upon the construction for which the respondents contended, viz., that the ultimate trust in each of the wills of the testatrixes conferred a fee tail descendible on the issue of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by Mary Clarke, and that the said Wenman Langham Woodford and Charlotta Henrietta became, on the death of Atherton Watson, entitled, as tenants in common, in tail, to two undivided third parts of the estates devised by the will of Sir Thomas Samwell (the testator).

The appellants, on the other hand, contended that the trust in question gave an estate in fee simple in such two undivided third parts to the person who answered the description of the right heir of Sir Thomas Samwell (the father), by Mary Clarke, at the respective times of the deaths of the testatrixes, in remainder expectant upon the preceding limitations, to which the estates were then subject; and they alleged that Thomas Samwell Watson Samwell was the person who then answered such description. By his will, he devised all his real estate unto his wife Frances Watson Samwell, her heirs and assigns; and by her will, dated the 13th of December 1839, she devised all and singular her estate and interest in the said estates, to the use of trustees, their executors, administrators and assigns during the life of her niece, Emily Vernon (one of the appellants). The appellants claimed under these wills.

The original bill in this cause was filed on the 9th of August 1852, by the respondent William Wright, and was several times amended.

It stated the facts hereinbefore mentioned, and also stated that in 1851 the plaintiff commenced actions of ejectment to recover possession of the one-third part claimed by him, but that after the commencement of the actions he discovered that the legal estate in fee in the lands was outstanding in certain mortgagees, (whose mortgage securities were stated in the bill), and that such actions had not been farther proceeded with in consequence; and after setting forth other matters not now necessary to be considered, prayed that it might be declared that according to the true construction of the ultimate limitation in the wills of the two testatrixes, the said Charlotta Henrietta Wright (as one of the right heirs and issue in tail and coparceners of the said Sir Thomas Samwell, the father, by Mary, his second wife, the daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke) became and was, upon the death of the said Atherton Watson, entitled to an estate tail in possession of and in one undivided third part of the said Sir Thomas Samwell's (the testator's) said estates; and it prayed for an account and general relief.

The defendants put in their answers, submitting that according to the true construction of the said wills the limitations therein created an estate in fee simple in the two undivided third parts of the estates of the said Sir Thomas Samwell, the testator, to the person who answered the description of such right heir at the respective times of the death of the said Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham, in reversion expectant upon the limitations to which the said estates were then subject, and that Colonel Samwell Watson Samwell was the person who answered such description at the respective times of the death of the said Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham.

The cause came on to be heard, on the 15th of July 1854, before Vice Chancellor Kindersley, who made a decree, declaring that, according to the true construction of the two wills, Colonel Thomas Samwell Watson Samwell, on the death of each of the said testatrixes, took an estate tail in the two undivided third parts, which, on his death, went to Mrs. Wright and Wenman Langham Woodford, as co-heirs in tail of Sir Thomas Samwell, the grandfather, by his said second wife, in coparcenery, and that by virtue of the disentailing deed and conveyance executed by Mrs. Wright, her moiety of the two undivided third parts of the estates became vested in William Wright in fee simple, and that the other moiety vested in Wenman Langham Woodford; and an account was ordered (1). This was the decree appealed against.

The Attorney General replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Cranworth) proposed the following question to the Judges :—

Assuming the facts to be correctly stated in the printed cases, but that the ultimate devises in the wills of Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham, instead of being made to trustees, had been made directly to the right heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell by Mary his second wife, for ever :

Would Charlotta Henrietta Wright, the late wife of the respondent William Wright, have taken, on the decease of Atherton Watson, any and what estate in the lands in question ?

The Judges requested time to answer this question.

Ordered accordingly.

June 2.—WATSON, B.—My Lords, I am of opinion that Charlotta Henrietta Wright, the late wife of the respondent William Wright, would have taken on the decease of Atherton Watson an estate tail in the lands in question. The ultimate devises in the wills of Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham are in the following words : "and for default of all such issue, then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, Baronet, deceased, the father of my late uncle, Sir Thomas Samwell, by Mary his second wife, also deceased, who was daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke, Knight, for ever." I consider these devises as if the devise had been to the heirs of the body of Thomas Samwell, in lieu of the words "right heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell by Mary his second wife," which is in truth to the heirs of their bodies.

And this brings it, in my opinion, within Mandevile's case, recognized by Taunton, J., in Winter v. Perrall (2), which case has remained as law for many centuries, and is in my opinion good law. The addition of the words "for ever" at the end of the devise does not in my opinion enlarge the estate tail in the first taker to an estate in fee : Doe d. Candler v. Smith is an authority to that effect. Roe v. Quartley does not clash with Mandevile's case, and therefore I am of opinion that Charlotta Henrietta Wright would have taken on the decease of Atherton Watson an estate tail in the lands in question.

WILLES, J.—My Lords, I am inclined to think that the estate would be in fee simple. I do not see by what other construction effect can be given to all the words of the will, and I think effect may be given to them all by adopting that construction.

The words of description, I mean the words preceding the words "for ever," are ambiguous, and may be read either as a designation of the person or persons to take, and a limitation of the estate as one to go quasi by descent through all the persons who might from time to time, so long as any might exist, successively become such special heirs as described, or, simply, as a designation of the person or persons who was to take when the estate vested, but as not also a limitation of the estate to be taken. This ambiguity appears to me to be removed by the addition of apt and sufficient words of limitation in fee simple, viz., the words "for ever," which, being themselves a limitation of the estate in fee simple, shew that the previous words ought to be read in the latter sense, as designatio personæ only. In the absence of such words of limitation, the first of the two constructions above suggested might become necessary, if Mandevile's case were, which in this case it is not, in point. Such a construction, however, is not, and was not decided by Mandevile's case to be the necessary one;

and, as I have already stated, the words are capable of being used as, and when coupled with the words of limitation are exhausted in their use as, words describing the person or persons to take only.

If this construction be not adopted, the words "for ever" are unnecessarily rejected, and treated as null.

It is obvious that no rule or authority as to the construction of the words "for ever," following an unambiguous and specific limitation in tail, has any application to the present case. Upon the authorities, I am not satisfied that Roe v. Quartley has been explained away, and if it has been, then, apart from the supposed authority of that case, I am for the above reasons inclined to think that the words in question would create an estate in fee simple.

CROWDER, J.—My Lords, this question arises upon a clause in a will whereby the testatrix, after giving estates tail to all the existing descendants of Sir Thomas Samwell by his first wife, devises as follows: "And for default of all such issue, then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, Baronet, deceased, the father of my late uncle, Sir Thomas Samwell, by Mary his second wife, also deceased, who was the daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke, Knight, for ever."

On the death of the testatrix it is agreed that Colonel Samwell answered the description of right heir of her grandfather by his second wife; and the only question in dispute is, whether Colonel Samwell took an estate tail or an estate in fee under that devise.

On the part of the respondents, it was argued that the case falls directly within the principle of Mandevile's case, and that, consequently, Colonel Samwell only took an estate tail; the appellants, on the contrary, contending that the case at bar was not at all affected by Mandevile's case, and that the devise in question gave an estate in fee to Colonel Samwell.

I am of opinion that the respondents are right in their construction of the devise, and that the case before your Lordships is governed by the rule established in Mandevile's case.

Mandevile's case was admitted to be law by the appellants' counsel. But they made two points,—first, that the rule in Mandevile's case did not apply, because this devise was to a person as right heir, who was not the general heir of his father; the issue by the second marriage not answering the description of general heirs, where there had been issue by the first marriage. And a distinction was taken between the effect to be ascribed to the words "heirs of the body," when such heirs were the ancestor's general heirs, as in Mandevile's case, and the effect to be ascribed to the same words, where the word "heirs" did not include the general heirs, as in the devise in question. Secondly, assuming the same meaning to attach to the words "heirs of the body" whether general heirs or not, that the double effect given to those words, of designating the first taker, and shewing the course of devolution of the estate, is controuled by the final words in the clause "for ever," which amounts to a limitation in fee.

It was deduced from the first proposition, that the gift to the heirs of the grandfather by his second wife was a designatio personæ, and nothing more, and could only give an estate for life, without the concluding words, "for ever," which carried the fee. The second proposition assumes, that by the application of the rule in Mandevile's case, an estate tail would have vested in Colonel Samwell, if the clause had omitted the concluding words, "for ever"; but that these words controuled the devise, and enlarged the estate tail to a fee.

For the appellants' first proposition no authority was cited; and I can see no ground in reason or principle for the distinction contended for. I also think that the second proposition cannot be maintained; because where an estate tail is clearly given, it cannot be enlarged by the words "for ever."

It was admitted by the respondents, that the words "for ever" will in many cases carry the fee, and be equivalent to "heirs and assigns for ever"; but the addition of these words to an estate tail, they contended, could not enlarge it; and many cases were cited establishing that proposition.

A passage in Fearne's Contingent Remainders, p. 183, was referred to, in which the author says, "Where the first words give an estate tail general, and the words engrafted thereon are words serving to limit the fee, it seems by the general and better opinion, that the annexed words of limitation are not to be attended to; as may be seen in the above cited cases of Wright v. Pearson (3), Goodright v. Pullyn (4), and King v. Burchell (5), where the engrafted words limited the whole fee."

Now, I take it, there are ample words of procreation comprehended in the expression "by his second wife." And the devise must be construed precisely the same as if the language had been "heirs of the body of the grandfather begotten on the body of Mary his second wife." If so, I entertain no doubt that the words "for ever" would not enlarge the limitation of the estate tail. The substance of the limitation exists in the words "heirs by his second wife;" and the words "for ever" only import the continued duration of the estate tail.

Roe v. Quartley, however, has been cited as an authority, shewing that the words "for ever," when superadded to words otherwise limiting an estate tail, will carry the fee. Now, with respect to that case it may be observed, that neither in the marginal note by the reporters, nor throughout the argument by either counsel, nor in the judgment of the Court, are the words "for ever" referred to. But, on the contrary, it seems to have been assumed by the opposing counsel as well as by the Court, that the devise carried the fee without the addition of these words. Mr. Justice Ashurst in giving judgment says (p. 634), "We are of opinion that Hester took the whole, not by way of limitation, but as a purchaser, and under the description of right heir of Walter and Mary, in the same manner as she would have done if the limitation had been to the right heir of the body of Walter and Mary." That is, she takes the whole by purchase, and not a part only, as she would have taken the whole and not a part only if the limitation had been to the "right heir of the body of Walter and Mary."

(4) 2 Lord Raym. 1437.

(5) Amb. 379.

This seems to me, therefore, to be no authority binding upon us, that where the words of a devise without the words "for ever" would, according to the rule in Mandevile's case give a quasi estate tail to the parent, the addition of these words converts it into a fee simple in the first taker. Although Mandevile's case was referred to in Roe v. Quartley for the simple proposition that, under the latter clause of the devise, Hester took as a purchaser, there does not appear to have been any further discussion upon it; and certainly no distinction was attempted to be drawn between it and the case then at bar by reason of the additional words "for ever." I may also observe, in conclusion, that it appears clearly to me to have been the intention of the testatrix to exhaust all the descendants of her grandfather by his second wife; which intention would be entirely frustrated by Col. Samwell's taking the fee. Therefore, upon the assumptions made in your Lordships' question, as propounded to us, I am of opinion that Charlotta Henrietta Wright would have taken on the decease of Atherton Watson an estate tail in the lands in question.

CROMPTON, J.—My Lords, I think that the devise in this case to the right heirs of the deceased baronet by Mary his second wife, also deceased, ought to be construed as creating an estate tail of that peculiar nature which was held in Mandevile's case to arise, in order that the statute De Donis might be carried out, and the will of the donor observed.

The law with regard to this species of estate having been so long regarded as settled by Mandevile's case, it would be improper for me to suppose that your Lordships are likely to disturb it; and the question must be, how far it is applicable to the case at your Lordships' bar?

I see no reason whatever for saying that Mandevile's case does not govern the present, on the ground that the party to take in the first instance is not the heir general as well as special. It is now settled that the doctrine by which in some cases the party claiming as special heir is required to make out that he is heir general as well as that he answers the particular description of heir, does not apply to cases of special estates tail, and I do not see why it should apply to the peculiar estate tail in the present case, any more than to any other estate in tail special.

Treating the present case as without the words "for ever," it appears to come distinctly within Mandeville's case. It is the case of a limitation to the right heirs of a deceased person by a specified wife, also deceased. There are words of inheritance, "the right heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell," and the heirs are to be his heirs "by his deceased wife," which words are clearly words of procreation, and shew the body from whom the issue are to proceed. This, unexplained by other words, is clearly an estate tail.

But it is said that the words "for ever" qualify the other words, and that, taken altogether, the words shew that the expression "right heirs," &c. is to be taken as a designatio personæ, and that the words "for ever" give the fee.

I think, however, that we must read the words exactly as if they had been "the heirs of the body of Sir Thomas Samwell on the body of Mary begotten," and then that the words "for ever" have no effect in enlarging what would otherwise be an estate tail into a fee.

If the words were inconsistent with an estate tail, they might possibly so qualify the preceding limitation; but they are words not uncommonly found following a limitation to heirs of the body, and are not regarded in point of law as inconsistent with an inheritance in tail, as they may well mean in that line out of that body for ever. They seem to me in the present case to point to the continuance of the line and race. They seem to mean that the estate shall go on in that special line of descendants of Sir Thomas, and shall go, not only in one particular case to one particular descendant, but in that line as long as it exists; not, as might be argued, as a mere designatio personæ, but for ever in that line.

It is quite true that a devise of land to "A. B. for ever" will give him an estate in fee simple. I apprehend that this is because the words "his heirs" must be implied. "To a man for ever" would be nonsense if it did not mean to his heirs for ever; and therefore the limitation is taken as if his heirs were really inserted; and there being no words pointing to any particular body, the inheritance cannot be in tail, but must be in fee simple. That cannot, however, be the case where, as here, a special line of heirs, which in the eye of the law may last for ever, is distinctly pointed out as the line through which the inheritance is to pass.

Great reliance was placed on Roe v. Quarley. In that case neither party set up the limitation in question as an estate tail. Such a construction would, in effect, have shewn that neither party had the title, as the tail would have expired with Hester: and it does not seem that either plaintiff or defendant was heir to the deviser, to whose heirs the reversion would have descended. The succeeding on this point would, therefore, only have decided the pending ejectment in the defendant's favour, but would have apparently given them no title.

Both parties treated the estate, if it vested at all, as a fee; and the principal point made was as to whether the defendants were not entitled to a share of the fee simple. Certainly the question as to whether an estate, which would otherwise have clearly been an estate tail of the kind mentioned in Mandeville's case, could be enlarged to a fee by virtue of the words "for ever," was never discussed. The Court treated the words "heir of W. and M. his wife" to mean child from the relation of the parties as husband and wife. There were no express words of procreation, as in the present case, nor were the words of inheritance confined to the one party, as here, but the party to take was to be the heir of both, which the Court said meant child, and was the same as heir of the body.

In the octavo edition of the Term Reports, 1817, the word of the limitation is heir, in the singular; and in the passage in italics in page 634 the expression is "as if the limitation was to the right heir," in the singular.

In the present case the limitation is to the heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell by his wife Mary; and if he had been alive and had had a preceding estate of freehold, the estate tail would most clearly have vested in him, and descended to the heirs of his body by that wife.

The present case seems to me to point much more clearly to the descent to a particular line of the ancestor's heirs by a particular wife than can be said to have been the case in Roe v. Quartley, and whatever was the exact ground of the decision in that case, I cannot regard it as any authority for saying that Mandevile's case is not applicable to a case like the present; or that the addition of the words "for ever" can have the operation of converting into a fee what would otherwise be a clear estate tail of the nature of that in Mandevile's case. If any such doctrine had been laid down, I should have thought it wrong; but I agree with the observations of the Vice Chancellor, that the present case is not affected by Roe v. Quartley; and concurring also with what appears to me his very able judgment on the point in question, I think that the estate limited to the heirs of Sir Thomas Samwell by Mary his wife, and which afterwards vested in Col. Samwell, was an estate tail, and not an estate in fee simple. I answer your Lordships' question, therefore, by saying that, assuming the facts we are desired to assume, Charlotta Henrietta Wright would in my opinion have taken on the decease of Atherton Watson an estate in fee tail in one half of the one third of the lands under each will.

COLERIDGE, J. — In answer to your Lordships' question, I have to state that, in my opinion, on the assumption there made, Charlotta Henrietta Wright, the late wife of the respondent William Wright, would have taken on the decease of Atherton Watson, an estate in special tail in the lands in question; and that for the reasons which I will now proceed to detail.

It may be assumed, I suppose, that the decision in Mandevile's case must be taken to have been admitted law, down to the decision in Roe v. Quartley; and, if so, the only questions for consideration seem to be, whether it has been overruled by that decision; and, secondly, if it has been, whether it governs the present case.

In Roe v. Quartley the facts were: a devise to Hester Read, daughter of Walter Read, and to the heirs of her body for ever, and for default of such issue, then to such child or children as Mary, the wife of Walter Read, is now enceinte with, and to the heirs of the body or bodies of such child or children, and for default of such issue to the right heir of Walter Read and Mary his wife for ever. Hester entered, and died seised without issue and intestate, leaving Mary Nightingale, her cousin, and heir-at-law. Mary Read was not enceinte, as supposed, nor had she any subsequent issue, and died, living Hester. Walter married again, and had issue Constantia, afterwards wife of the defendant, and died living Hester. The question arose on the last limitation, and the Court held that under it Hester "took the whole subject-matter devised, as purchaser, and under the description of right heir of Walter and Mary, exactly as she would have done if the limitation had been to the right heir of the body of Walter and Mary." Now, in Mandevile's case the facts were: "John de Mandeville, by his wife Roberge, had issue Robert and Mawde. Moreville gave lands to Roberge, and to the heirs of John de Mandeville, her late husband, on her body begotten, and it was held that Roberge had an estate but for life, and the fee taile vested in Robert ('heires of the body of his father' being a good name of purchase), and that when he died without issue, Mawde the daughter was tenant in taile as heire of the body of her father, per formam doni."

It will be observed that the decision, and the principle of the decision, in Roe v. Quartley is in strict accordance with that in Mandevile's case, so far as I have stated it; for the Court decides that Hester took the whole as purchaser, exactly as she would have done if the limitation had been to the right heir of the body of Walter and Mary. And this is the principle of the decision in Mandevile's case. There Robert had the fee tail vested in him; he dying without issue, Mawde could not take the land by descent from him, because she was not heir of his body; but the Court held that during his life she had an expectancy, and on his death without issue that expectancy took effect, and she came in as heir of the body of her father.

It might seem at first sight that upon the premises laid down in Roe v. Quartley, the conclusion should have been that Hester took an estate tail, and therefore, as Mary Nightingale was not heir of her body, the judgment should have been for the defendant, without considering the defendant's own claim, and simply on the ground that Mary Nightingale had shewn no title. But to this two answers may be given: the first, that no question was raised as to the nature of the estate created by the ultimate limitation, whether fee or tail; the second, and a more satisfactory one, that under the first limitation an express estate tail had been given to Hester; and the words of the last limitation were to be construed with reference to this. To hold that they gave her an estate tail only would have deprived them of all operation, and it was not necessary so to hold, for the same person might be right heir both of Walter and Mary, and yet not heir of their bodies; and therefore the construction of this devise, that it passed an estate in fee, seems to have been assumed; and the language of the Court ought to be read thus: "Hester takes the whole subject-matter devised as purchaser in fee, under the description of right heir of Walter and Mary, exactly as she would have taken the whole in tail, if the limitation had been to the right heir of the body of Walter and Mary." It will be obvious to any one who reads the case with attention, that the only points considered were—Did she take under this limitation as purchaser? Did she take the whole, or part only?

In my opinion, therefore, it is not important to examine whether Mandevile's case was brought under the consideration of the Court in Roe v. Quartley. In the argument before the House it was assumed that it had been, and that the Vice Chancellor was wrong in his judgment in the court below, in saying that it had not. Upon examination, I venture to think that assumption a hasty one, founded only on the circumstance that the page in 1 Coke's Inst., in which Mandevile's case is abstracted, is referred to; but if the two other references which accompany this be looked at, it is by no means clear that the part of the page in which Mandevile's case is abstracted was the part to which this reference applies. Be this as it may, it is clear that the Court did not consider that they were overruling Mandevile's case; and, so far as I am aware, no one of the great text-writers, who comment on both cases, has ever treated the older case as overruled by the later.

I pass, therefore, to the second question, which is, whether Mandevile's case governs the present. Laying out of consideration for a moment the words "for ever," found in the present case, and not found in Mandevile's case, there seems no distinction between the two. In the one the gift is "to the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, deceased (the father of my late uncle, Sir Thomas Samwell, by Mary, his second wife, deceased)," in the other, "to the heirs of John de Mandevile, late husband of Roberge, on her body begotten." There is no gift to the grandfather in the one case, or to John de Mandevile in the other; but the words in each case describe a special heir, who takes by purchase. In this case, says Mr. Fearne, in his book on Contingent Remainders (6), they appear to have "a sort of equivocal or mixed effect: for though they give the estate to the special heir originally, and not through or from his ancestor, yet the estate which he so takes has such a reference to the ancestor as to pursue the same course of succession, in the same extent of duration or continuance, through the same persons as if it had attached in and descended from the ancestor." And Mr. Jarman (7) says, that in the case of such a devise "the estate will devolve to all persons who successively answer the description of heir of the body"; and whatever technical difficulties there are in the way of this holding, which Mandevile's case strongly illustrates, it seems obvious that in this way alone the intention of the grant or devise can be effectuated. In such a grant or devise there can be no doubt that the intent was, that all the heirs of the body should in succession take; in Mandevile's case, that both John and Maude should take, the latter, in case the former should die without issue, or the issue should fail; in the present case, that not merely the right heir, when the limitation over should take effect, but all right heirs answering the description in succession, if the first should die without issue, or the issue fail. But if it be held that the whole force of the gift or devise be spent when any one right heir has taken, because he takes by purchase, that intent will obviously in numberless cases be defeated.

I make these remarks, because I think they serve to place Mandevile's case on its proper footing. Technically considered, it may be anomalous; but, in substance, it was a vigorous effort, at a very early period, to effectuate the intention of the donor in spite of technical difficulties. Now this, I apprehend, in all cases merely of construction, and where we are not met by legal impediments, is the governing rule of modern decisions.

With this remark I come to the consideration of the two words much relied on to distinguish the present case from Mandevile's, "for ever." The question then is, will the addition of these words turn a limitation, which without them would indisputably have created a tenancy in special tail, into an estate in fee? and this, be it remembered, is raised merely as to what is the proper construction, i. e. the meaning and intention of the whole sentence. When, in order to make out the affirmative, cases were put of the words being "for years," or "for life," or "in fee," I could hardly suppose that the distinction between each of them and the words in question could have escaped notice. These are all unequivocal in themselves, and inconsistent with the tenancy in tail. If effect be given to them, they cut it down or enlarge it. But how does this apply to the words "for ever"? Suppose an ordinary devise to A. B. and the heirs of his body for ever, could it be contended that this gave an estate in fee? Would not common sense affix to these words in such a case the meaning that the deviser intended no more than that the estate should descend to the heirs of the body so long as there were any such to succeed to it; a redundant expression it may be, which, however, is not so unlikely an occurrence as the intentional use of an inconsistent one. But in the present case there seems something more to be said for the use of the words than in the case of an ordinary tenancy in tail. The testatrix had carefully provided, and in detail, for all members of the nearer line; she was now providing for the remoter, the line descending from the second wife, in a single sentence; and the words "for ever" might be the natural expression of a wish that her intention in their favour might take effect, however remotely, so long as any one was found who answered the description which she had given.

July 20. — LORD CRANWORTH. — My Lords, in this case, the question is, who is entitled to two thirds of certain real estates formerly of Sir Thomas Samwell? One third is claimed under the will of Frances Ann Langham, who died in 1828, the other third is claimed under the will of her sister Phillis Langham, who died in 1830. Both wills are dated on the same day, that is, the 12th of April 1827. The two sisters evidently made them in communication with each other. Indeed, the two wills are precisely the same, except that in the will of Frances Ann Langham, the first limitation is in favour of her sister Phillis, and, on the other hand, in the will of Phillis Langham, the first limitation is in favour of her sister Frances Ann. The ultimate limitation upon which the question arises is in these terms:—"Upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather Sir Thomas Samwell, Bart., deceased, (the father of my late uncle Sir Thomas Samwell), by Mary, his second wife, also deceased, who was the daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke Knight, for ever."

In order to understand the question, it is necessary to be informed as to the state of the family. Sir Thomas Samwell the grandfather referred to in the will, died in 1757. He had been twice married. By his first wife, Millicent, he had issue two sons, Thomas and Richard, both of whom died without issue, before 1780, and one daughter, who married Stephen Langham. Mrs. Langham left at her death four daughters, Millicent married to William Drought, Maria, and the two testatrices, Frances Ann and Phillis, whose wills are now in question.

Sir Thomas, the son, and who was of course, the uncle of Mrs. Langham's four daughters, died without issue in 1779, leaving his four nieces, the said Millicent Drought, Maria Langham, Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham, his co-heiresses-at-law. In 1793, Maria Langham died intestate and unmarried, leaving her three sisters, Millicent, Frances Ann and Phillis, her co-heiresses-at-law. In 1808, Millicent Drought died leaving a son, Thomas Fuller Drought, her only son and heir.

Sir Thomas the grandfather, by his second marriage, had issue a son, Wenman, who died without issue, in 1789, and a daughter, Catherine, who married Thomas Watson. She died before 1828, leaving issue an eldest son, Thomas Samwell Watson, who took the name of Samwell, and died without issue in 1831, and who is designated as Colonel Samwell; a second son, Wenman Langham Watson, who died without issue in 1841; a third son, Atherton Watson, who died without issue in 1851, and a daughter Charlotte Felicia, who married Benjamin Tinley, and had issue two daughters, Clarissa, who married Mr. Woodford, and Charlotta, who married the plaintiff.

Such being the state of the family, we must now refer to the will of Sir Thomas, the uncle of the two testatrices. By that will, he gave his real estates, being those the two-thirds of which are now in question, to five several persons and their issue male, in succession, with an ultimate limitation to his own right heirs. It has already been stated, that he died in 1779, at which time his four nieces were his co-heiresses, but Maria having died intestate and unmarried in 1793, the reversion then became vested as to one-third in his niece Frances Ann, and as to another third in his niece Phillis.

The five persons to whom and to whose issue male Sir Thomas the uncle had devised the estates in succession, all died without issue male, in or before the year 1843, at which time, therefore, the ultimate reversion of the two-thirds which had vested in Frances Ann Langham and Phillis Langham came into possession.

The persons entitled under the devises contained in the wills of those two ladies, prior to the ultimate limitation, thereupon entered on the estates and enjoyed the same until all the devises prior to the ultimate devise (the particulars of which I have already stated) became extinct in the year 1849. The question is, who then became entitled under the ultimate limitation, "in trust for the right heirs of the grandfather, by Mary his second wife for ever"?

The plaintiff Wright filed his bill, contending that, according to the true construction of those devises, the person entitled to the two-thirds when the prior limitations under the two wills failed, was Atherton Watson, as being the then heir of the body of Sir Thomas the grandfather, by Mary his second wife; and the plaintiff further contended, that when Atherton died without issue, in 1851, then the two-thirds to which he had become entitled, passed in moieties to his late wife Charlotta Henrietta, and to the son of Mrs. Woodford, who had then died.

It is not disputed that the plaintiff was right in his contention, if according to the true construction of the will the two-thirds are to go as if in course of descent in tail from the grandfather to the heirs of his body by Mary his second wife. But on the part of the appellants it is argued, that that is not the true view of the rights of the parties. They contend, that the effect of the ultimate limitation in each will was to give the estate in fee to the person who at the death of each testator was then heir of the body of the grandfather by Mary his second wife. Colonel Samwell, the eldest son of Catherine Watson, was at the death as well of Frances Ann Langham in 1828 as of Phillis Langham in 1830, heir of the grandfather by Mary his second wife, and if he took the reversion in fee subject to the prior estates, all of which expired in 1849, then the appellants are right in their contention.

The object of the bill filed by Mr. Wright was to obtain a declaration of his right according to the construction for which he contended, with an account of the rents received since his title accrued, and for a partition against the persons entitled to the other portions of the property. Answers having been put in, the cause was duly brought to a hearing, and Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in an elaborate judgment, made a decree in favour of the plaintiff, giving him an account of the rents not from the death of Atherton Watson in 1851, but from the filing of his bill in 1852.

Against that decree the defendants appealed, and the appeal was heard early in this session with the assistance of the learned Judges. Owing to their absence on the circuit their opinions were not given until after Easter Term. All the learned Judges who heard the case, except Mr. Justice Willes, are of opinion that the Vice Chancellor took a correct view of the law on this case. And concurring with them as I do, I have no hesitation in moving your Lordships to affirm the decree below.

I cannot distinguish this case in principle from Mandevile's case, which is in Co. Lit. 26, b. That case is thus stated by Lord Coke: "John de Mandevile by his wife Roberge had issue Robert and Mawde: Michael de Morevill gave certain lands to Roberge and to the heirs of John Mandevile her late husband, on her body begotten, and it was adjudged that Roberge had an estate but for life, and the fee tail vested in Robert (heirs of the body of his father being a good name of purchase), and that when he died without issue, Mawde the daughter was tenant in tail as heir of the body of her father per formam doni, and the formedon which she brought supposed." Then he gives the form in Latin, the substance of which is, that she claimed as heir of the body of her father. "And yet, in truth, the land did not descend unto her from Robert, but because she could have no other writ, it was adjudged to be good. In which case, it is to be observed, that albeit Robert being heir took an estate tail by purchase, and the daughter was no heir of his body at the time of the gift, yet she recovered the land per formam doni by the name of heir of the body of her father, which notwithstanding her brother was, and he was capable at the time of the gift; and therefore when the gift was made she took nothing but in expectancy, when she became heir per formam doni." It is true that the words there were "to the heirs of the body of John de Mandevile by Roberge his wife," whereas here they are to "the heirs (not heirs of the body) of the grandfather by Mary his second wife." But this makes no real difference. The heirs of a person deceased, by his second wife, must mean the heirs of his body by her, otherwise the reference to the wife would be inoperative, and the limitation could not take effect. This, indeed, was not the point in dispute. What was contended was, either that Mandevile's case ought not to be followed, as resting on no sound foundation, or that if that is not so, then there are in this case means of distinguishing it from Mandevile's case, owing mainly to the use of the words "for ever."

Now, as to Mandevile's case, I am not aware of any authority for saying that it is not law. It is true that Mr. Butler, in his note to Fearne, p. 83, says, it is an anomalous case; but, he adds, that the law is settled, though the principles on which it is settled, are not easily discoverable. And this is precisely the sort of case in which the importance of adhering to what has been decided is far greater than that of having a rule abstractedly the best or most consonant with other principles. It is impossible to say how often, in advising on titles, conveyancers may have acted on the authority of this ancient case, stated without doubt as good law by Lord Coke, commented on by Mr. Fearne, apparently with approbation, and never, so far as I know, seriously questioned. The rule, moreover, which it enunciates is one certainly very convenient, even if on strict legal reasoning it may be to some extent anomalous.

The main stress of the argument, however, did not rest on the notion that Mandevile's case was to be questioned, but on there being grounds for distinguishing the present case from it, and that mainly on the authority of Roe d. Nightingale v. Quartley. In that case there was a devise "To Hester Read, daughter of Walter Read, and to the heirs of her body for ever, and for default of such issue then to such child or children as the wife of Walter Read is now enceinte with, and to the heirs of the body or bodies of such child or children, and for default of such issue to the right heir of Walter Read and Mary his wife for ever." Hester Read entered on the death of the testator. Mary Read was not enceinte, and died (without ever having any child) before Walter her husband. Then, Walter Read, her husband, married a second wife, and afterwards died leaving issue the defendant Constantia Quartley his only child by his second wife. Then, Hester died without issue, leaving the plaintiff Mary Nightingale her cousin and heir-at-law. She was the only child of Walter and Mary. The plaintiff was held entitled to recover the whole as being the heir of Hester.

The Vice Chancellor, in his judgment, in commenting on that case, says, that neither Mandevile's case nor the doctrine derived from it, was referred to in it. I do not think it necessary to consider whether he was or was not warranted in that assumption, for I cannot think that your Lordships ought to treat it as having overruled Mandevile's case, proceeding as it did on totally different grounds. In truth, in Roe v. Quartley both parties proceeded on the common assumption that the ultimate limitation passed the fee. The testator had already given an estate tail to the only existing child of Walter and Mary, and to another child with which he supposed Mary to be enceinte, and if the construction acted on in Mandevile's case had been adopted, the effect would have been to repeat the two estates tail already given, first to Hester and then to the child with which Mary was supposed to be enceinte. It is true that on failure of these two estates tail the devise would, according to the doctrine of Mandevile's case, have been effectual to carry the estate to after-born children of Walter and Mary, if there had been any. Both parties, however, treated the devise as clearly being a devise in fee simple, and as if the only question was, whether the fee vested in Hester or in the child by the second marriage. Whether that was a correct view of the case does not seem to me to be necessary to be determined. The decision, if it is not reconcilable with Mandevile's case, cannot, in my opinion, be supported.

It was argued that in this case, as in Roe v. Quartley, the ultimate limitation is strictly a limitation in fee; the words "for ever" occurring, and those words being sufficient to shew that the previous words ought to be read as a mere designatio personæ. This was the view of the case taken by Mr. Justice Willes, and is therefore entitled to great attention. But I am unable to concur in it. The words "for ever" would no doubt be sufficient, if the context required it, to create an estate in fee;

but, considering how very commonly those words are used in connexion with an estate of inheritance, whether in tail or in fee, being in fact merely tautologous, I cannot think they make any real difference. It is not unworthy of remark that in the very case on which we are commenting, of Roe v. Quartley, the words "for ever" are used in connexion with an estate tail, the first gift being "to Hester Read and the heirs of her body for ever."

Mr. Justice Willes points out that if we construe the devise according to the rule in Mandevile's case, there is an intestacy as to the ultimate fee. No doubt that is so, and that affords an argument in favour of the construction which he adopts, but it is not, in my opinion, sufficient to outweigh those which press in an opposite direction.

All the learned Judges having concurred in this opinion, with the exception of Mr. Justice Willes, I shall move, as I have already stated, that the decree of the Court below be affirmed.

Before I quit the subject, I ought to mention that, in the course of the argument, it was suggested on the part of the respondents that there was a portion of this judgment which ought to be varied. The Vice Chancellor, in giving judgment, directed an account of the rents only from the time when the bill was filed, and not from the preceding year, in which Atherton Watson, the preceding tenant in tail, had died. His Honour did not do that per incuriam. He considered the case very fully, and thought that, inasmuch as during that year the rents had been received by a person as trustee claiming under the person who devised them in fee, and as the trustee had handed them over in what would have been the due execution of his trust to the person entitled, a married woman, to her separate use, they could not, therefore, be recovered back. His Honour thought it would not be just to give an account that would affect that trustee, and, therefore, limited the account to the time of the filing of the bill. Whether an account should be directed from the filing of the bill or from an anterior time is always a matter, in a great measure, of discretion; and I am not at all prepared to say that the Vice Chancellor has not come to a correct conclusion upon that point. Therefore I shall advise your Lordships to pay no attention to that suggestion, and shall simply move that the decree of the Court below be affirmed. I think that this being a case of very considerable doubt, the costs ought to come out of the estate.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, in this case I do not think it necessary to add many observations to those that have fallen from my noble and learned friend. I concur with him in opinion that your Lordships ought to affirm the judgment of the Vice Chancellor.

The question arises entirely on the construction of one clause in the will of Mrs. Phillis Langham, giving the real estate in default of issue previously mentioned. The words of that bequest are, "And for default of all such issue, then upon trust for the right heirs of my grandfather, Sir Thomas Samwell, Baronet, deceased, the father of my late uncle, Sir Thomas Samwell, by Mary his second wife, also deceased, who was the daughter of Sir Gilbert Clarke, Knight, for ever." The question is, whether the right heir of Sir Thomas Samwell, the father, by his wife Mary, who was Colonel Samwell, takes under that description an estate tail or not. And that depends simply on the question whether Mandevile's case (which has been sufficiently stated by my noble and learned friend) applies to this case or not. Now Mandevile's case must undoubtedly be considered as a binding authority. It has been objected to, and the principles on which it rests have been described as somewhat anomalous. But I do not believe that it has ever been objected to as bad law, although it is stated in the case of the appellants that it was objected to by Lord Coke as bad law in 2 Leonard. But on referring to that case it will be seen that what Lord Coke said was merely as an advocate, and not as a Judge, for he was Attorney General at that time. But in all the treatises upon the subject since, Mandevile's case has been deemed good law.

Then, the only question is, whether the present case can be distinguished from Mandevile's case. I confess that, during the course of this inquiry, I have felt that, if this had been a discussion of this question for the first time, and I had been called upon first to decide on the meaning of this clause in the will, I should have entertained some doubt whether it was not to be distinguished from Mandevile's case, by two circumstances, the one, that it is a devise "for ever," which imports in fee; and, secondly, that if you construe this to be an estate tail, there will be an intestacy as to the remainders over, which is a circumstance that you ought to avoid in construing wills. My noble and learned friend has mentioned that Mr. Justice Willes, in the opinion which he gave, pointed out that circumstance, but I think he is mistaken there, for I do not think that any of the Judges who have given their opinions upon this case have pointed out that to construe this to be an estate tail would create an intestacy. But the creating an intestacy is only an argument against that construction, nothing more. However, I cannot say that my notions on that subject have amounted to much more than a doubt in the course of this inquiry, and I hold that you ought not to reverse a careful and elaborate decision of the Court below unless you are satisfied that it is wrong. A mere doubt in your own mind as to the propriety of the construction ought not to entitle you to reverse the judgment. And when I consider that that judgment has been recognized as being perfectly sound by four Judges out of the five who have given their opinion, I certainly cannot consider that my doubts ought to weigh. In fact, I may say they are removed. I cannot distinguish this case from Mandevile's case. I think the words "for ever" may not improperly be applied to an estate tail, though with respect to an estate tail they are not perfectly correct. The circumstance of this construction having the effect of creating an intestacy does not appear to me sufficient to weigh against the authority of Mandevile's case. With the decision of the Court below, and the opinion of four learned Judges in support of that decision, I cannot do otherwise than advise your Lordships to affirm this judgment.

I quite agree that, inasmuch as the testator himself has created the difficulty by not expressing the limitation with sufficient clearness, his estate ought to pay the costs.

Mr. Glasse.—Before your Lordships affirm the judgment, will you allow me to say one word as to costs? I understand your Lordships to say that the costs ought to come out of the estate. There is no estate, and directing them to come out of the estate would in fact be to direct the respondents to pay the costs of the present appeal, and I apprehend that is not what your Lordships mean.

Sir Richard Bethell.—There is an estate in question.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The respondents have the estate, I suppose.

Mr. Glasse.—No, my Lord, there is a receiver appointed of the estate, and in the Court below no costs were given up to the hearing.

Sir R. Bethell.—There are 6,000*l.* in court now.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The receiver is a receiver for some of the parties interested.

Mr. Glasse.—It is not an administration suit.

Sir R. Bethell.—It is a very unusual thing to have an argument upon a judgment of the House of Lords.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I was in error in what I said about costs. I thought it was an administration suit.

Mr. Glasse.—It is a simple ejectment bill.

Sir R. Bethell.—It is a bill brought to put a construction upon this will. It relates to real estate. A receiver was appointed in the cause, and rents have accumulated to the amount of 6,000*l.*, now in court. There is, therefore, an ample fund to be dealt with, which is the subject of controversy in the suit.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—If we could properly make an order for the costs to come out of the estate, I should wish to do it; but if we cannot do it there is an end of it.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I know of no precedent for it. I erroneously considered this as being an administration suit. I think the better way will be simply to say, no costs.

Sir R. Bethell.—It is an administration suit, being a suit to put a construction on the will.

LORD CRANWORTH.—It is a suit to put a construction on the will, and to get possession.

Mr. Anderson.—The legal estate being outstanding.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The better way will be to say nothing about the costs. It is not that the Court has taken possession of the testator's estate, and that now it is administering it. It only happens accidentally that there is a fund in court, because, in consequence of the lapse of time, rents have accumulated.

Decree and order affirmed.

COOPER v. HOOD.

Specific Performance—What constitutes Agreement—Proposal to sell or buy a Share in a Business.

An offer by letter to sell or buy a business cannot be carried into effect unless from the whole letter taken together an inference can be drawn from which the material terms of the contract can be ascertained. In the absence of that, it amounts but to an offer to treat, as nothing can be supplied by conjecture.

What may be considered as fair inferences in such cases.

The bill in this suit was filed, by Samuel Thomas Cooper and John Arthur Cooper, against Henry Hood, praying for a declaration that two letters, dated the 18th and the 28th of May 1857, constituted a valid agreement for the purchase, by the defendant, of their shares in the Leeds Ironworks, and for its specific performance. There was also an alternative prayer for the dissolution of the partnership.

S. Cooper, the father of the plaintiffs, J. Field and H. Hood, carried on the business of iron-manufacturers in Hunslet, near Leeds, under articles of partnership, dated the 7th of March 1839, which provided that the partnership should continue for twenty-one years from the date of the deed, if they all lived so long.

After that, provision was made for its determination. It was also made determinable on the death of any one of the partners.

J. Field died on the 7th of April 1840; and on the 22nd of December 1848, H. Hood purchased his share of the business from his personal representatives; but this share was not assigned to H. Hood until after the death of S. Cooper.

S. Cooper died on the 10th of July 1849. By his will, dated the 5th of March 1842, he directed his business of an ironmaster to be carried on by his trustees during the minority of his sons, the plaintiffs, and upon their attaining twenty-one he gave his share of the business to them equally.

The trustees named in the will disclaimed, and on the 16th of January 1851 letters of administration were granted to Mary Cooper, the testator's widow, until one of her sons should attain twenty-one.

S. T. Cooper, the testator's son, was engaged in the business as an apprentice, from the age of sixteen, and he attained twenty-one on the 23rd of June 1852, and on the 30th of May 1853 he took out letters of administration to his father.

J. A. Cooper, the other son, attained twenty-one on the 28th of July 1855.

By an order made on the 1st of December 1853, on the petition of Mary Cooper and others, she and S. T. Cooper were appointed trustees of his father's will, and at her death, on the 16th of December 1855, S. T. Cooper became the sole trustee.

Towards the end of 1856 H. Hood indirectly mentioned that he might not be unwilling to dispose of his shares in the business and retire altogether, at the same time intimating that he considered his share of the goodwill worth a large sum beyond the price at which they stood in the partnership stock books. The plaintiffs were not unwilling to make an arrangement, but after some interviews, nothing was done beyond making out some rough accounts.

While things were in this position S. T. Cooper received the following letter:—

"Leeds Ironworks, Monday, 18th May, 1857.

"Dear Sam,—Ridehalgh (the plaintiffs' solicitor) is not at home, so, of course, I have done nothing. I have a letter from J. Taylor, which is about double what could be agreed to (1). In looking over the papers, I find that in all probability my accounts on the 30th of June will be about 140,000*l.*, to this add for goodwill, &c. 55,000*l.* to 60,000*l.* This is, indeed, a large sum, and apparently could at once be rendered upwards of 80,000*l.* without reference to Arthur's share of stock or securities. It is therefore quite clear that under any circumstances a large portion of my money must remain at the works, for it is vain to expect any eligible person possessing this fortune to embark in business, or yet to have it at command. The more I look at this matter, the more I am convinced of the fairness of my views, for it is obvious that for some years I must run the risk of the prosperity of the Leeds Ironworks before my share of the capital (60,000*l.*) can be repaid, and then, after this, the goodwill, &c. The value of this goodwill, and, indeed, the purchase altogether, is rendered more favourable to the purchaser by the loan of capital on such favourable terms as the security of the property itself, and further that the whole bonus or goodwill will in all probability be made and clear itself in less time than will be fixed for its payment. Were I younger, and in your circumstances, I should not for one moment hesitate to purchase in these works on similar terms; and though my wish is, if my way be clear, to retire from the concern, I do so from no fear of its want of continuance, but simply that I have no need of personal attention to business. I am also of opinion that no manufacturing or commercial establishment can prosper, trading with an insufficient capital, and I should on no account give my consent to any alteration in this respect while my property is at stake in the works. I have, therefore, carefully looked into the matter, and believe that 80,000*l.* to 90,000*l.* is requisite as a paid capital, without the liability of any partner's power to withdraw till the end of the partnership term. Now, I have no doubt

(1) Mr. Taylor had been a confidential clerk in the business for about seventeen years, and this referred to some intimation made to him that he would be permitted to have a share in the business.

you will believe me when I say that I should not advise you to do what I would not do myself under similar circumstances, and, moreover, I should be very sorry to carry out an arrangement with any person with whom you could not work well and be in peace and unity during the partnership. These remarks contain my opinion, and will, I think, lead you to a train of reasoning which will, I hope, enable you to make a good and sound conclusion and enable an arrangement speedily to be concluded. As to the fairness of my views, I entertain no doubt, and to shew you this, I will make the additional offer of purchasing your family's one-third, or your own one-sixth, as can be arranged, on exactly the terms I propose to sell to you. You must understand that I make this as a positive offer, either to sell or to purchase, as you may elect. The only other observation that I shall make is to assure you that if I purchase your share, I do so only with the view of taking other steps for the immediate sale of the entire property; a matter I feel certain I shall have no difficulty in accomplishing, and without in the slightest disparaging your judgment as a man of business or your conduct as a gentleman, for believe me, since you first came under my hands on leaving school, I have ever felt you would do both yourself and the business credit.—Believe me, dear Sam, yours sincerely,

“Henry Hood.”

A meeting of the parties was afterwards held at the office of Mr. Ridehalgh. The offer contained in the letter was discussed, and an answer promised one way or the other, which was afterwards sent as follows:—

“Leeds Ironworks, 28th May, 1857.

“My dear Sir,—Since receiving your letter of the 18th instant, I have carefully considered the matter of purchasing your share in the Leeds Ironworks on the terms you ask, and have also taken the advice of friends and my solicitor on the subject. Though sorry as I shall be to leave them after having spent so much of my time here, I cannot but come to this conclusion, that it will be better to dispose of my sixth share and also the interest of my brother to you on precisely the same terms as you propose to sell to me. And

I have communicated with my brother, who fully concurs with me in accepting your offer for our one-third share in the Leeds Ironworks. According to the statements we made and the calculations we went into, on which terms your letter of the 18th instant is based, our account will be on the 30th of June next say about 75,000*l.*; to this add bonus on goodwill from 27,500*l.* to 30,000*l.* These are my views on the subject, and the conclusion I have arrived at after mature consideration. I cannot conclude without thanking you for your handsome letter and for the kind way in which you speak of my having conducted myself here both as a man of business and as a gentleman.—I am, &c.

No answer was sent to this letter until the 6th of June 1857, when the defendant in a long letter complained of their accepting his offer, and said “that he never had the slightest intention of purchasing from them.”

Some further correspondence resulted from the refusal to abide by the offer, but finally this suit was instituted.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Wickens, for the plaintiffs.—The acceptance of the defendant's offer to buy was a good contract; he represented the property as too good to be lost, and clearly intended to induce a belief in the plaintiffs that he was willing either to buy or sell. The Court therefore would carry the agreement into effect.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Rasch, for H. Hood.—The terms were far too indefinite to be enforced by the Court. One great temptation to buy was the benefits held out to the purchaser, but none of them had been settled. The whole, therefore, was nothing more than a proposal to treat. The letter did not amount to a concluded agreement.—

evidence might be introduced to admit the papers and accounts referred to by the parties. The Statute of Frauds was not at all in the way. Between partners, any uncertainty which might arise from the use of general words or symbols could be explained, if not by the documents, certainly by the way they were understood in the trade. The mere contemplation of having assistance to prepare a proper agreement could not be allowed to invalidate the contract. The Court could also determine whether in such a case the money was to remain on the security of the property; it could also determine the time it ought so to remain: the agreement therefore ought to be enforced.—

Fowle v. Freeman, 9 Ves. 351.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The sole question is, whether the terms of the contract are so clear and so free from ambiguity as to enable them to be carried into effect by this Court. If I made a decree for specific performance, the usual terms of the decree after making the declaration (for there is no question about the title) would be to refer the matter to chambers to settle the conveyance in case the parties differ. When I came to settle the conveyance to the defendant of the interest of the plaintiffs in these works, I should have no other guide than the letter of the 18th of May 1857. The two sixths are to be bought on exactly the same terms as the defendant proposes to sell, that is, mutatis mutandis, and altering the figures and sums in the proportion of one-third to two-thirds, or in other words, one-half: with this guide and no other, I go through the terms of this letter, and consider how far it is clear and to what extent I could ascertain the means of carrying it into effect. If by a fair inference from the whole letter taken together, I can do this, I can make a decree for specific performance of the contract; but I am not at liberty to supply by conjecture anything not to be found in the letter or to be derived by fair inference from it.

The first uncertainty suggested was with reference to the word "papers," but nothing turns upon it, because the papers are not incorporated into the agreement, and I cannot refer to them for the purpose of making it clear; but the next uncertainty suggested is, the use of the symbol "&c.," but I do not feel the force of this. The words are "goodwill, &c." These words are connected together, and they mean to unite such other things as are necessarily connected with and belong to the goodwill, many of which are easily pointed out; for instance, the use of trade-marks, and a covenant by the vendor not to carry on a similar business in Great Britain for a reasonable time, to be limited in the conveyance, having regard to the nature of such undertakings. All these would be included in the words "et cætera," and would be involved in the conveyance. With respect to that, I should not have much difficulty in carrying it into effect.

The next observation is, that some portion of the purchase-money is to be left in the business, and for some years. This is a much more serious objection. What portion of the purchase-money is meant by "a large portion"—the words used in the letter? How is it to be paid? By what instalments, and after what time, and how is the unpaid portion to be secured? I look in vain for anything in this letter to guide me. It is clear that the purchase-money is not to be paid down, for the passage which I have read and the passage which follows it expressly state "that a large portion must remain at the works," and that "the vendor must run the risk of the prosperity of the works before his share of the capital can be repaid." The next passage may perhaps be fairly interpreted to mean that the purchase-money was to be held on the security of the property, but is the personal security of the purchaser to be added? This is left in doubt; and, still more, the time to be fixed for the payment of the purchase-money is expressly left to be afterwards fixed, for it says, "In less time than will be fixed for its payment." How could I fix this time? The time when the payment of the purchase-money is to be required is a matter of very great moment, and this may materially affect the eligibility of the purchase, or, indeed, the possibility of effecting it. Another difficulty, assuming as may fairly be done in favour of the plaintiffs, is, that interest is to be paid on the unpaid purchase-money until it is paid: at what rate is the Court to fix the interest to be paid? Is it to be at the legal rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, or at 4*l.* per cent., which is the sum usually given by Courts of equity in those cases where no beneficial employment or fraudulent retention of the money has occurred? I do not see how it is possible to get over this difficulty. I assume I can get over the first difficulty—as to the price of the goodwill—by fixing it at such a sum between 55,000*l.* and 60,000*l.* as, having regard to the business and the profits made in it and the sale of similar undertakings, would be considered fair: that would be one-half, when only one-third is bought instead of two-thirds. I assume, also, that I can give a meaning to the “&c.” which follows the word “goodwill.” But how can I, without making a contract for the parties, specify what portion of the purchase-money is to remain unpaid, for what length of time, on what security, at what rate interest is to be paid, in what manner, and by whom it is to be enforced? But this is not the only difficulty. What meaning can the Court give to the words “loan of capital” in this sentence? “The value of the goodwill and, indeed, the purchase altogether, is rendered more favourable to the purchaser by the loan of capital on such favourable terms as the security of the property itself.” Does it mean that the portion of the purchase-money which is to be allowed to remain in the business “is the loan of capital,” and is this to be governed by the sentence in a subsequent part of the letter, where the writer says “that 80,000*l.* or 90,000*l.* is requisite as a paid capital,” in order to obviate the damages pointed out in the previous sentence consequent upon trading with insufficient capital? What construction do the plaintiffs put on this, and what is it that they contend for? Is it that the money is to be paid down, or is it to be paid by instalments for a considerable number of years, and in the mean time secured on the property? As I understand the plaintiffs' argument, they contend that the whole of the purchase-money is to be paid at once; but I cannot assent to such a proposition. Suppose the plaintiffs had written to the defendant, in accepting his proposal, and had stated to him that they understood the terms of his letter to mean what they now contend for, would not the defendant have been at liberty to say that such was not the meaning of his letter, that he considered all those matters were left to be settled hereafter, and that he had not agreed to bind himself to anything definite on this point. The more I consider the more impossible I find it to arrive at any definite conclusion, and, on the whole, I think the fair meaning to be given to the letter is to regard it as a proposal to buy or sell on terms to be arranged, for which the observations and the statements in the letter are to form the basis, and are to guide the parties in their consideration of the exact terms; and in this I am confirmed by the following sentence:—“These remarks contain my opinion, and will, I think, lead you to a train of reasoning which will enable you to make a good and sound conclusion, and enable an arrangement speedily to be concluded.”

I cannot, therefore, treat this as a serious offer to buy on fixed and definite terms to be found in this letter. It amounts only to treaty, and does not go beyond. I am, therefore, unable specifically to perform the contract as prayed by the bill. The bill must, consequently, be dismissed, so far as it prays a specific performance of the contract; but a decree must be made in the fullest possible manner on the other branch of the alternative, for dissolving the partnership and taking the accounts of the partnership property; and it may probably be desirable to follow the terms of the decree made in Cook v. Collingridge (1). There must, also, be an order for a receiver, which the parties may prosecute or not as they please, and either party must be at liberty to propose himself. I shall give no costs.

Legacy—Vesting—"Then living."

Where a sum directed by the testatrix to be set apart for an annuity was bequeathed, on the death of the annuitant, to such of the testatrix's nephews and nieces as should be "then" living, and the child and children of such of them as should be "then" dead, it was held, that the children of a nephew who was dead at the date of the will were entitled to participate, and that their interests vested at the death of the testatrix.

Elizabeth Faulding, by her will, dated the 22nd of December 1825, gave her real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to convert the same into money, and to set apart a sufficient sum to pay to each of her brothers, Henry and Anthony Shaw, an annuity or yearly sum of 40*l.* during their respective natural lives, and after the decease of her brother Henry to pay an annuity or yearly sum of 40*l.* to his widow Isabella during her life as aforesaid; and upon trust to pay and divide the remainder of such monies, together with all her other monies, unto her niece, Elizabeth Chapman, and such of her, the testatrix's, nephews and nieces as should be then living, and the child and children of such of them as should be then dead, in equal shares and proportions, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, such child or children to be entitled only to the part, share and proportion of his or their parent or respective parents, and to be paid to him, her or them (if more than one), in equal shares and proportions, as and when he, she or they should severally attain twenty-one, with interest for the same in the mean time, towards his, her or their education and support. And after the decease of her brothers and the wife of her brother Henry respectively, the testatrix gave the principal money thereinbefore directed to be placed out at interest as aforesaid, for answering the respective annuities of 40*l.* a-piece per annum, unto and equally to be divided amongst her said niece Elizabeth Chapman and such of her nephews and nieces as should be then living, and the child and children of such of them as should be then dead, such child and children to be entitled only to the part, share and proportion of his, her or their parent or respective parents, and to be paid to him, her or them (if more than one), in equal shares and proportions as and when he, she or they should attain his, her or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, with interest in the mean time.

The testatrix died on the 30th of January 1826. She had three nephews, Thomas, William and Henry Shaw, and one niece, Elizabeth Chapman. The nephew Henry Shaw died in 1820, in the lifetime of the testatrix, leaving six children, who attained twenty-one, and were still living. The nephew Thomas died in 1831, intestate, leaving one son only, a sailor, who was wrecked on a voyage to the Baltic, and had not been heard of for twenty-eight years, and was believed to be dead intestate.

The brother Henry Shaw, the annuitant, died on the 18th of October 1826; his wife Isabella died in his lifetime. The brother Anthony Shaw, the annuitant, died on the 26th of February 1840. Elizabeth Chapman died on the 17th of December 1850, intestate, leaving three children, who were still living and had attained twenty-one.

The estate of the testatrix was now represented by 5,271*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* consols. The trustees received the income, and out of it paid the annuities so long as they were continuing; the remainder of the income they distributed among the parties entitled.

The nephew William Shaw, and some of the children of the nephew Henry Shaw, now by petition prayed that the shares of the parties might be ascertained and distributed according to their several interests.

Two questions were raised: first, whether the children of Henry Shaw took any and what interest under the will of the testatrix; and, secondly, at what period the trust funds vested under the will.

Mr. Jessel, for the petitioners.—The children of Henry Shaw took no interest under the will; the testatrix was aware of his decease; and the word "then" could only refer to the future. The funds, however, were vested interests at the death of the testatrix, except as to the funds set apart to answer the annuities which vested on the death of the respective annuitants.—

Mr. Horsey, for Mr. Gouldham, the administrator of Thomas Shaw.—The whole of the fund created by the testatrix out of her real and personal estate, vested on her decease in the parties entitled.

Mr. Keene, for William Henry Pauling, who had purchased the interests of the children of Elizabeth Chapman, cited—Tytherleigh v. Harbin, 6 Sim. 329; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 15.

Mr. G. V. Yool, for the children of Henry Shaw, claimed a right to participate in the estate of the testatrix.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The expressions in many of the cases are difficult of reconciliation. I incline, however, to the principles laid down in Ive v. King; they were drawn on the one hand from Peck v. Callow (1), Waugh v. Waugh (2), and Christopherson v. Naylor (3), and on the other from Miller v. Warren (4), Darrel v. Molesworth (5), Haughton v. Harrison (6), Mackinnon v. Peach (7) and Le Jeune v. Le Jeune (8). In Butter v. Ommaney the testator gave the residue of his estate, real and personal, after the death of his wife and his brother Joseph, to be equally divided between the children of his brother Joseph and his sister Betty Pratt, who should be then living, in equal shares and proportions, and as to such of them as should be then dead, leaving a child or children, such child or children were to stand in the place of the parent; it was there held, that the children of the brother and sister living at the testator's death were entitled absolutely, and that the children of children who died in the testator's lifetime were not entitled to participate. But in the present case, the gift is to "my niece Elizabeth Chapman, and such of my nephews and nieces as shall be then living, and the child and children of such of them as shall be then dead." The children of deceased nephews and nieces are, consequently, put precisely in the same situation as the nephews and nieces then living. It is not a gift to nephews and nieces followed by a substitutionary gift to children in the event of any dying, but the children of deceased nephews and nieces are put with nephews and nieces living, as objects of the original gift, but their interest is limited by the proviso that they are to take only their parent's share. The testatrix, therefore, intended the children of all her nephews and nieces to take; they, consequently, became entitled to the residuary estate on the decease of the testatrix, and to the fund set apart on the decease of the respective annuitants.

A piece of land was advertised for sale. Two adjoining landowners were desirous of purchasing it; they agreed that one alone should attend the sale and purchase, if it should be sold for a sum not exceeding a sum named. If the land was purchased, terms were arranged, and it was to be divided between them. situate the contract; and that the application could not be supported.

The Carew Estate Act, 1857, 20 & 21 Vict. c. vi. was passed to vest certain estates, the subject of a suit of Carew v. Waugh, in trustees upon trusts for sale.

By an order made in this matter, the Court directed certain parts of the Norbury estate, situate in the parishes of Croydon and Streatham, to be sold by auction by the trustees and mortgagees.

The land was divided into lots and valued; particulars of sale were then prepared, and the reserved price of lot 2 was fixed at 600*l*. Lot 2 adjoined the lands belonging to Henry William Peek and Daniel Watney; each knew that the other was desirous of purchasing it. The sale was fixed for the 19th of June 1858. On the morning of that day Messrs. Peek and Watney entered into an agreement that H. W. Peek should, by his agent, attend the sale and become the purchaser of the freehold land comprised in lot 2, provided that such lot could be purchased for a sum not exceeding 1,500*l*., irrespective of the timber, which was to be taken at a valuation, and that if the lot should be purchased under that agreement, Daniel Watney should take the portion of the land therein referred to, and pay a proportionate part of the entire amount of the purchase-money and valuation for the whole land, which was to be settled by valuers to be appointed by the parties; and, if possible, H. W. Peek was to obtain a conveyance direct from the vendors to D. Watney of his portion of the lot.

H. W. Peek, accordingly, became the purchaser of lot 2, which was knocked down to him at a sum of 650*l*. This was certified by the chief clerk, and the Court confirmed the order absolute. The timber was afterwards valued at 126*l*.; and on the 1st of July 1858 H. W. Peek paid into court the entire purchase-money, which amounted to 776*l*.

The purchaser's solicitor afterwards sent to the vendors' solicitor, for perusal, the draft of a conveyance, and on the 30th of July 1858, it was returned approved. The engrossment was then sent to the vendors' solicitor for execution.

On the 11th of August, before the engrossment was executed, D. Watney's solicitor sent to the vendors' solicitor a copy of the agreement between Messrs. Peek and Watney, accompanied by a letter, stating that the parties had not been able to agree upon the division of the lot and the purchase-money, and giving the vendors notice not to execute or make any conveyance to H. W. Peek of that portion of the lot which was to be conveyed to D. Watney, but to make the conveyance of that portion direct to D. Watney, he, at the same time, offering to pay his proportion of the purchase-money and valuation.

This was followed by a correspondence between the solicitors, and nothing was concluded.

On the 2nd of November 1858 a summons was taken out by the vendors, requiring H. W. Peek to shew cause, before the chief clerk, why the sale made to him should not be set aside. The question was adjourned into court.

Mr. Southgate, for the vendors.—If a party, by any inducement, causes another to stay away from a sale, that is a fraud upon the vendors; the benefit obtained at a sale is the competition, and any agreement with another not to bid at the sale is a fraud; the sale, therefore, ought to be set aside, or the biddings between them opened. There was not a single bidding after the reserved price was passed, and yet the parties were willing to have given a much larger sum for this lot.

Scott v. Nesbit, 3 Bro. C.C. 475.

Watson v. Birch, 2 Ves. jun. 51; s. c. 4 Bro. C.C. 172.

Sugden's Vend. and Pur. 93, 13th ed.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The purchaser could not have known the reserved price.]

Mr. Southgate.—It was not known to them; but after it has been passed, the practice of the auctioneers now is to say, "this lot will now be sold."

Mr. J. T. Wood, for H. W. Peek.—The purchase has been confirmed; no ground exists for opening the biddings; a mere belief that there would have been higher biddings, is no ground to ask the Court to set aside a sale. The agreement was no fraud; it was neither collusion nor conspiracy. The parties to the agreement were not bound to inform the vendors that they intended to make a joint purchase; the fault was in the vendors not fixing a higher reserved bidding, and in not having a person sufficiently skilled in auctions to make use of it.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The Court is strict with the vendor; it will not allow puffing.]

Mr. Wood.—A vendor may say he will not sell his estate under a given sum; that sum was passed by bond fide biddings, and the vendors had no right to complain.

Mr. Dickinson, for D. Watney, claimed an equitable interest in the purchase made by H. W. Peek, and adopted all that had been said in favour of the sale and the agreement made between them.

Mr. Southgate, in reply.—The vendors had a right to the competition of an open market. Any agreement which caused the withdrawal of a single bidder was a fraud upon them and upon the Court.

Dec. 3.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is no authority, neither is there any principle which shews that the agreement between the purchasers was contrary to equity. It is the sum which the parties between themselves agreed to bid for the lot that has induced the vendors to raise this question; had they merely agreed to bid to the amount of 700*l.*, this application would not have been made. The amount, however, which they might have been willing to give cannot affect the question. The validity of the purchase must depend upon whether it was equitable for them to enter into such an agreement; it does not depend on the price which was to have been bid. It is on the ground of fraud alone that the sale can be opened. This is not an application to open the biddings in consequence of a higher offer having been made, no such advance upon the bidding having been made; and if there had been, the application would have been too late, as the conveyance has been prepared, approved and engrossed, and everything has been completed, except the execution of the deed. If, however, there had been fraud, the execution of the conveyance would not have deprived the parties of their right to open the sale at any time upon the discovery of the fraud. However, I scarcely think I should have entertained the application had it not been for the passage in Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, which was referred to, and which, though it is not binding upon the Court, is, from its elaborate compilation, always considered worthy of attention. It says, "Fraud will, of course, be a sufficient ground for opening the biddings; therefore, if the parties agree not to bid against each other, . . . the Court would open the biddings, although the report had been absolutely confirmed." I desired, therefore, to consider the point, and, accordingly, I have referred to Watson v. Birch, but it does not appear to bear upon this case, or even to approach it. I am, consequently, unable to find any ground to support this application, and I cannot set aside the sale on account of the agreement between the parties to purchase. It is evident, however, that the parties conducting the sale employed a surveyor who was not aware of the real value of the land; had they known what they have since learnt, they would have fixed a reserve price, which would have made it immaterial what agreement parties desiring to purchase made between themselves.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } SMITH v. WATTS.
Dec. 15.

Vendor and Purchaser—Particulars and Conditions of Sale.

*Upon a sale by auction, the property sold was described as a leasehold ground-rent of 50*l.* per annum, amply secured on certain houses producing a rental of 250*l.* let on a lease for the whole term at 82*l.*, held under two leases direct from the original lessor for an unexpired term of twenty-six years, at ground-rents amounting to 32*l.* The purchaser objected to complete, because the ground-rent was not amply secured, and the* nature of it was not sufficiently set out:—Held, that as the facts stated in the particulars were sufficiently explicit to lead to inquiry, and as, by the conditions, inspection of the documents was offered previous to the sale, the purchaser could not plead ignorance of what he might have made himself acquainted with, and the purchase must be enforced.

The facts of this case were as follows:—By an indenture of lease, dated the 26th of December 1834, certain houses, numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, in White Lion Street, Chelsea, were demised by the Earl of Cadogan to James Clapperton (the testator in the cause), his executors, administrators and assigns, for fifty years, from December 25, 1834, at the yearly rent of 18*l.*, and subject to the covenants therein contained. By another indenture, of the same date, and made between the same parties, certain other houses, numbered 3 and 4, in Turk's Row, Chelsea, were demised by the Earl of Cadogan to James Clapperton, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the term of fifty years, from the 25th of December 1834, at the yearly rent of 14*l.* By an indenture purporting to be an under-lease, dated the 1st of December 1841, James Clapperton demised the premises comprised in the two indentures of lease respectively of the 26th of December 1834, to A. Burstall, his executors, administrators and assigns, for forty-eight years, wanting ten days, from the 25th of December 1841, at the yearly rent of 82*l.*, and subject to the covenants therein contained. James Clapperton, by his will, dated the 16th of January 1856, after certain specific bequests, gave all the residue of his estate to his wife, Lydia, and to the defendants, W. J. Clapperton and J. Watts, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, and appointed his wife and the defendants his executors. The testator died on the 17th of January 1856, and his will was duly proved by the defendants.

An administration summons was subsequently taken out in chambers; and by an order dated the 3rd of March 1858, the whole of the testator's estate was directed to be sold, and it was accordingly put up to auction in two lots, when a Mr. Davis became the purchaser of both lots, at 960*l.*

and 500*l.* respectively. The purchase had been completed as regarded lot 1. The purchaser objected to complete the purchase of lot 2, on the grounds afterwards stated.

The particulars of sale described the property in lots 1 and 2, in the following manner:—"A leasehold ground-rent of 50*l.* per annum, amply secured on six dwelling-houses, Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, White Lion Street, Chelsea; two dwelling-houses, Nos. 3 and 4, Turk's Row and Crown Court, producing a rack rental of 250*l.* per annum, let to Mr. Burstall, on a lease dated the 1st of December 1841, for the whole term at 82*l.* per annum. Held under two leases, dated the 26th of December 1854, direct from the Earl of Cadogan, for a term of which twenty-six years will be unexpired at Christmas, 1858, at ground-rents amounting together to 32*l.* per annum—nett improved ground-rent for twenty-six years, 50*l.* per annum."

The sixth condition was as follows:—"If any error or mis-statement shall appear to have been made in the above particulars, such error or mis-statement is not to annul the sale nor entitle the purchaser to be discharged from his purchase, but a compensation is to be made to or by the purchaser, as the case may be, and the amount of such compensation is to be settled by the Judge at chambers."

Seventh:—"Each purchaser is, under an order for that purpose, to be obtained by him, or, in case of his neglect, by the vendor, at the cost of the purchaser, upon application at the chambers of the said Judge, to pay the amount of his purchase-money into the Bank of England, with the privity of the Accountant-General of this court, to the credit of this cause, on or before the 12th day of November 1858, and if the same is not so paid then the purchaser is to pay interest on his purchase-money at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from that day to the day on which the same is actually paid. Upon payment of the purchase-money in manner aforesaid, the purchaser is to be entitled to possession, or to the rents and profits as from the 11th day of November 1858, down to which time all outgoings are to be paid by the vendor."

Eighth:—“The abstract of the vendor's title will consist as to the other tenements comprised in the said particulars, of the two leases dated 26th of December 1834, also mentioned in the said particulars, being respectively leases from the said Earl to the said James Clapperton aforesaid, subject as to Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, to a prior lease for sixty-one years from the 25th of December 1784, and as to Nos. 3 and 4, to a like prior lease, and the before-mentioned indenture, dated 1st December 1841, also mentioned in the said particulars, being or purporting to be a lease from the said James Clapperton to Abraham Burstall. The purchaser shall assume that the lessor in the said leases of the 26th December 1834 was well entitled to grant the same, and not make any objection or requisition in respect of the title of such lessor, or in respect of the said therein-mentioned prior leases, which shall be assumed to have determined, or any other prior lease or leases, or by reason of the term purported to be granted by the said indenture of the 1st December 1841, being in excess of the terms granted by the said leases from the said Earl of the tenements comprised in that indenture, or by reason of any variance between the covenants and conditions of the said last-mentioned leases or the said underlease, and the covenants and conditions of the lease or leases from the said Earl, inasmuch as the said leases from the said Earl, and counterpart of the said underlease, and of the said indenture of the 1st December 1841, or copies thereof respectively, may be inspected for ten days immediately preceding the day of sale by intending purchasers at the office of Messrs. Crosley & Burn, solicitors. The purchaser shall be deemed to buy with full notice of and subject to the contents and effects of those respective instruments, whether he shall make such inspection or not, and notwithstanding any error or omission in the statement thereof, in the said particulars or in these conditions. The purchaser shall also be deemed to buy with full notice of the state and circumstances of the property as regards repairs, dilapidations, fire insurance, and all other matters. The production of the receipts for the rents which last accrued due under the said leases from the said Earl or other satisfactory evidence of the payments thereof shall be accepted as conclusive evidence that all the covenants and conditions of such leases respectively have been fulfilled, or all breaches, if any, of such covenants and conditions, or any of them, whether appearing by the abstract or otherwise, have been effectually waived down to the time of completion of the purchase, and that such leases are then valid and unimpeachable. The purchaser shall accept all recitals, statements and allegations in any abstracted deed or other document, as sufficient evidence of the instruments, facts, matters or things recited, stated or alleged, and all instruments, facts, matters and things found, proved, admitted, certified or proceeded upon in the above-mentioned cause shall be deemed thereby conclusively evidenced. If consistently with these conditions, the purchaser may require and shall require an abstract or the production or inspection, or any covenant for production of any deed, will or other document not in the possession of the vendor, or any office, attested or other copy or extract of or from any deed, will or other document whether in the vendor's possession or not, and whether required for the purpose of verifying the abstract or of accompanying the title or otherwise, or an affidavit, statutory declaration or other evidence whatsoever, not in the vendor's possession, as to identity of parcels or any other matter, or any evidence or information as to the said cause or the parties thereto, or the constitution thereof, other than such abstract as aforesaid, the expense of complying, or of endeavouring to comply, with any or every such requisition shall be borne by the purchaser, who shall not require from any assigning or assuring party any further or other covenant than a covenant that such party has not encumbered, nor require for any purpose the concurrence of any person in respect of any equitable or beneficial interest under the said will. The purchaser shall, by the assignment to him, enter into a proper covenant for indemnifying the vendor and the estate of the testator against all liabilities under the said lease from the said Earl, and the said underlease and the said indenture of the 1st of December 1841, and shall, if required by the vendor, execute and deliver to him a duplicate or counterpart, to be prepared by or at the expense of the vendor, of such assignment. All expenses of or incident to the examination or comparison of the abstract, with the abstracted deeds or documents, or other verification of such abstract, including journeys, shall be borne by the purchaser. If the purchaser shall require any deed or other instrument appearing not to have been duly registered in the Middlesex Registry to be so registered, the expense of satisfying such requisition shall be borne by him."

The purchaser objected to complete the purchase of this lot, on the ground that the vendors had only a right to an annual payment, secured by the personal covenant of Burstall, contained in the lease of the 1st of December 1841, and that the term granted by that lease, being longer than the term granted to Clapperton, it operated as an assignment of the whole term, and that there was no power to distrain for the rent; that the only remedy the vendors had was an action on the covenant, and that consequently there was a mis-statement in the particulars, when the property was described as a ground-rent amply secured, for it was not amply secured. A summons had been taken out against the purchaser, requiring payment of his purchase-money, and that summons was now adjourned into court for argument upon the above question.

Mr. Glasse appeared for the vendors; and

Mr. Baily and Mr. Martineau, for the purchaser.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—If the question were merely this, that Lord Cadogan having granted certain leases at a specified rent, the property had been afterwards let at a higher rent, for a term which exceeded the first term in duration,—if that were the only question, and under such circumstances there were no right to distrain, there would then be a considerable legal doubt, and I should certainly not consider myself entitled to force the title upon the plaintiff; but the case does not rest on that point. The question I have to consider is, whether the particulars of sale were sufficiently clear to distinctly point out to any man of ordinary intelligence what the facts were, and whether the eighth condition of sale did not contain a fair stipulation that no objection should be raised on that state of facts. The question then is, whether that is the effect of these particulars and of these conditions of sale. Now the conditions commence in these terms:—"A leasehold ground-rent of 50*l.* per annum, amply secured on certain houses." So far there is nothing disclosed, and if it stopped there, I think the purchaser might say, I must have a ground-rent amply secured on these houses, and it is certainly doubtful whether it is properly secured; but then the particulars of sale go on to point out what is the nature of the ground-rent. They describe in distinct terms the premises, that is to say, these houses, that they are the subject of two leases, dated the 26th of December 1834, direct from the Earl of Cadogan, of which twenty-six years were then unexpired. It was expressly stated, that the ground-rent was amply secured; that the rent reserved to Lord Cadogan was 32*l.* per annum, and that the rent payable by Mr. Burstall was 50*l.*, the whole amount being 82*l.*: so there is a distinct representation that Lord Cadogan had let the premises for 32*l.*, and the persons claiming under him had underlet for 82*l.*; so that 50*l.* would be the difference between the two sums. So far there is a clear enunciation, to any man of ordinary intelligence, of what the 50*l.* per annum consisted of, and he would understand that the term granted by the sub-lessee was equal to the whole term which Lord Cadogan had granted. He would understand that, if he tried to do so, but still he might not know what would be the legal consequences of it; in fact, that question might be argued for a whole day, and there are so many authorities, that it would be extremely difficult to come to any decision; but still he must know, if a man of ordinary intelligence, what were the facts. Now, in stating the leases, they are said to have been granted in 1854; in point of fact, they were granted in 1834 instead of 1854, which is a mere mistake, but it is perfectly immaterial, because, at all events, there was to be twenty-six years unexpired; but the mistake was corrected afterwards, so that it might be evidently seen to be a mere misprint. Then, it is said there are words in this description, which import that the ground-rent is amply secured on these houses, and that in fact it is not amply secured upon them. The other side would argue that it is an ample security. Now, what is the meaning of saying amply secured, and then describing how it is secured? Why that, although the vendor considers it to be amply secured, he may be wrong in his legal conclusion, and the Court might decide that the intermediate tenant had no right of re-entry. I should say on these deeds, that it would be decided that he had a right of re-entry, but I do not assume that it would be so; still it is no misdescription, because the mode in which it is said to be amply secured is pointed out, leaving the parties to judge for themselves. It amounts to this, that the vendor, stating all the circumstances, says it is an ample security. It is contended that the eighth condition of sale has a tendency to catch or mislead the purchaser; but it appears to me this condition is a very fair one. It is fairly and properly worded, and having been prepared by Mr. Hayes, the conveyancer, that would of itself be sufficient to shew that at least nothing unfair was intended. I cannot say I entertain any doubt about the meaning of it myself, and I do not think that any man of understanding would entertain a doubt about the facts of the case, though he might do so as to the law, and then he would know that he might have inspection of the lease and sub-lease, and could therefore form his own judgment, or consult with others. If a man comes here and says, I was careless, and did not sufficiently examine these conditions, and I gave myself no trouble to understand them, the Court certainly will not assist him. I must assume that a person going to a sale goes properly prepared to bid, and if an offer is made him to inspect documents, it is his duty to do so. Being of opinion, then, that there is nothing catching or unfair in the conditions, the question is, what is the effect of them? Now we find that the purchaser is to assume that the lessor, in the lease of 1834, was well entitled to grant the same, and he is not to make any objection in respect of the title of the lessor. The purchaser was to assume that the prior lease had determined, whatever the legal consequence may be. But that, however, is not the point we have to consider. The condition goes on in these words:—"Or by reason of the term purported to be granted by the said indenture of the 1st of December 1841, being in excess of the terms granted by the said leases from the said Lord Cadogan of the tenements comprised in that indenture, or by reason of any variance between the covenants and conditions of the said last-mentioned leases." Added to this, that there was to be no objection by reason of the term exceeding the original lease, inasmuch as the lease might be inspected by intending purchasers, and that the purchase should be admitted to be with full knowledge of these instruments. If this condition is not to be binding on a purchaser no condition could be. The honest meaning of a condition is, that the vendor shall not put up for sale a better title than he has. Conditions of sale of this nature are perfectly fair and honest. Here a man is told that he must be bound by these facts, whatever may be the consequences. There is clearly a representation of the case, and the way in which the ground-rent is secured. I think, therefore, I ought to hold that the purchaser has precluded himself from coming to the court to rescind the contract.

STUART, V.C. } FOWLER AND OTHERS v. THE Nov. 4, 5. } SCOTTISH EQUITABLE LIFE } INSURANCE SOCIETY AND } RITCHIE.

Insurance on Lives—Policy—Alleged Mistake in Indorsement—Liability of Company.

*R. & K. entered into negotiations with C, the London agent of a Scottish insurance company, for the purpose of effecting a policy on the life of H, a merchant; and it was verbally agreed between R. & K. and C. that the policy should be granted authorizing the assured, under certain conditions, to make voyages in the way of business to the ports of Morocco and other ports in the Mediterranean, and on the coasts of Africa and Asia. A written proposal, in the handwriting of one of the partners R. & K, was communicated by C. to the company, in the following terms, differing by mistake, as R. & K. alleged, from the agreement they had previously made with C:—"Mr. H. to be at liberty to visit, on business, Tangiers, or any other port within the Mediterranean, without subjecting himself to any extra premium, or having to apply for a licence; but it is understood that he is not to reside out of Europe at any place in the Mediterranean beyond the period of three months, or to go to the interior of Asia and Africa. The above memorandum to be indorsed on the policy." A policy was accordingly granted, whereby 2,000*l.* was assured to be paid to R. & K. after the death of H, with a proviso that in case the said H. should depart beyond the limits of Europe the policy should be void. A memorandum was indorsed on the policy to the effect that, notwithstanding the restriction contained in it, H. should enjoy such liberty as mentioned in the above-written proposal. H, in the course of his business, visited Casa Blanca, a small port on the Atlantic coast of Morocco, south of Tangiers, and died there before he had resided three months. The Court, on a bill being filed for that purpose by R. & K, refused to rectify the policy, as against the company, so as to express the true agreement between R. & K. and C, but declared the policy to be not binding on either the plaintiffs or the company; and ordered the premiums which the plaintiffs had paid to be refunded, as having* been paid by mistake, and the policy to be delivered up to the defendants.

The case made by the bill in this suit was as follows. Thomas Haire, before and at the time of making the proposal and agreement for an insurance on his life, as after mentioned, was a merchant residing at Gibraltar, and, in the course of his business, was in the habit of making voyages to and visiting the ports of the Empire of Morocco and other ports in the Mediterranean and on the coasts of Africa and of Asia. The plaintiffs, Reis & Koenig, carried on business as merchants in the city of London, and they agreed to open an account with, and to give credit to T. Haire for a sum amounting to 2,000*l.*, and, as he resided abroad and had no property in this country whereon any monies due to the plaintiffs could be secured, it was also agreed that they should, for the purpose of securing to themselves payment and satisfaction of any monies which should become due from him to them, effect a policy of insurance on his life. The negotiation with the defendants, the society, for the grant of a policy on the life of Haire by them to the plaintiffs, was conducted, on behalf of the plaintiffs, by the plaintiff Koenig, and, on behalf of the defendants, the society, by Capt. William Cook, who was at that time their London agent. The bill alleged that in the course of the negotiations the plaintiff Koenig and the said Thomas Haire gave notice and informed Capt. Cook of the above facts and circumstances, and that they in terms stipulated with him that the policy proposed to be so granted on the life of the said Thomas Haire, whatever might be the language thereof, should not be vitiated by reason of Thomas Haire visiting the ports out of Europe aforesaid, and also the Havannah, which he was desirous of doing for the purpose of extending his business connexion; and Capt. Cook expressed his wish that the ports of Alexandria and the Havannah should be excluded from any licence to be granted in any such policy, but, inasmuch as the said Thomas Haire had previously contemplated and agreed to visit both such last-mentioned ports and places, the plaintiff Koenig insisted on such places not being excepted out of any such licence as aforesaid; but eventually, and before the making of the said policy of insurance, it was agreed verbally between the last-named plaintiff and Capt. Cook that a policy on the life of Thomas Haire for 2,000*l.* should be granted by the defendants, the society, to the plaintiffs Reis & Koenig, authorizing T. Haire to make voyages in the way of his business to all or any of the ports first above mentioned in and out of Europe (not including Alexandria and the Havannah); but providing that Thomas Haire should not reside more than three months at any one time at any such port, and that he should not go into the interior of Asia or Africa; the plaintiffs, at the request of Capt. Cook as such agent, agreeing to pay the defendants, the society, the customary extra premium in case Thomas Haire should proceed to the Havannah. Upon the faith of this alleged agreement, and before any policy was made out, the plaintiffs, Reis & Koenig, paid to the defendants, the society, the sum of 60*l.* 10*s.*, as one year's premium for the insurance. The policy of insurance which was actually effected was dated the 5th of January 1852. It certified that the plaintiffs, Reis & Koenig, had been duly admitted members of the society, and that they, their executors, administrators or assigns, should be entitled to receive out of the stock and funds of the society, at the end of six months after the decease of Thomas Haire, the sum of 2,000*l.*, &c., on the condition that they duly paid the yearly contribution of 60*l.* 10*s.* It further provided that, in case Thomas Haire should depart beyond the limits of Europe, or should enter into or be employed in any military service, except within Great Britain or Ireland, or in any naval service whatsoever, then the certificate should be void, and all claim to any benefit out of, or interest in, the funds of the said society in virtue of such certificate should cease and determine, and all monies that might have been paid in consequence thereof should belong to the society, excepting always in so far as relief was provided or might be lawfully granted by the directors of the society, agreeable to the laws and regulations thereof. The policy was signed by three directors of the company, and by Robert Christie, the manager at Edinburgh, the principal place of business of the society, and on it was indorsed the following memorandum: — "Edinburgh, January 5, 1852. — Notwithstanding the restrictions contained in the within policy, Mr. Haire will be at liberty, without licence or extra premium, to visit Tangiers, or any other port within the Mediterranean; but it is understood that he is not to reside out of Europe, at any place in the Mediterranean, beyond the period of three months, or to go into the interior of Asia and Africa." The plaintiffs accepted the policy without reading the same, and regularly paid the several annual premiums of 60*l.* 10*s.* thereon, up to the decease of Thomas Haire, and one premium after his decease, believing the policy to be, upon the full confidence and assurance of Capt. Cook, in all respects in accordance with the understanding and arrangement come to and concluded with him.

The bill alleged that the indorsement on the policy did not represent the actual agreement made between the plaintiffs and the society, but that such indorsement was by mistake limited to Tangiers and ports in the Mediterranean, instead of extending to any ports on the coasts of Africa or Asia.

By an assignment, dated the 9th of February 1856, the plaintiffs Reis & Koenig assigned the policy of insurance, and the whole benefit thereof to the plaintiff William Cave Fowler. Thomas Haire, in the course and for the purposes of his business, visited Casa Blanca (otherwise Dor el Beida), a small port on the Atlantic coast of Morocco, about 160 miles south of Tangiers, and he died there on the 7th of January 1856, within three months of his arrival. The plaintiffs Reis & Koenig, at the request and for the benefit of the first-mentioned plaintiff, W. C. Fowler, brought an action in the Court of Exchequer against the defendants, the society, to recover the sum of 2,000*l.* and interest thereon from the 7th of July 1856; and also the one year's premium which had been paid since Thomas Haire's death in ignorance of his decease. The defendants paid the amount of the premium into court, but insisted, as a defence to the residue of the action, that the policy had become void by reason of the visit of Thomas Haire to the port of Casa Blanca. The plaintiffs submitted that the actual indorsement on the policy was obviously incorrect, for it implied that Tangiers was a port in the Mediterranean, which it was not.

The bill prayed that the mistake made in the said indorsement might be rectified according to the real agreement made between the parties, and that the society might be decreed to pay to the plaintiff W. C. Fowler the sum of 2,000*l.*, together with interest thereon from the 7th of July 1856, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and that the defendants might be decreed to pay the costs of the suit.

The answer of the society set out a letter dated the 2nd of January 1852, addressed to the Edinburgh manager by Capt. Cook, in which the writer asked that a special board might be called to consider whether a policy could be granted to Messrs. Reis & Koenig on the terms specified in the said written proposal. This letter, as the answer alleged, accompanied the proposal, and stated, that Mr. Haire was born and lived at Gibraltar, and that he had resided there all his life, except when travelling in Europe, Africa and America. Messrs. Reis & Co. signed the printed declaration, to the effect that the above particulars were correct, &c., and agreed that "the foregoing proposal, together with what was therein contained and the present declaration, should be the basis of the contract between them and the society;" and they thereby declared their accession to the articles of agreement and constitution of the society, and to all the alterations thereof, and to the by-laws and regulations of the society. There was also the following attached to the proposal:—"Memorandum—If this proposal is accepted, it must be on the condition annexed to the proposal. I should think that an occasional visit to the various ports in the Mediterranean would rather be conducive to health than otherwise, and should be an additional reason to accept the proposal, if not positively at variance with the established rules of the society. As Mr. Haire leaves England on the 7th inst., I must beg that a special board be called, and that the result may be communicated to me immediately, so as to enable the parties to effect the insurance elsewhere.—W.C." The condition so annexed, which was drawn up by the plaintiff Koenig himself, was as follows:—"Mr. Haire to be at liberty to visit on business Tangiers or any other port within the Mediterranean, without subjecting himself to any extra premium or having to apply for a licence; but it is understood that he is not to reside out of Europe, at any place in the Mediterranean, beyond the period of three months, or to go into the interior of Asia and Africa. The above memorandum to be indorsed on the policy.—London, Dec. 31, 1851.—Lewis Reis & Co." These proposals were accepted by the society. The society further said, that save as by their answer appeared, they knew nothing whatever of the alleged negotiations between the last-mentioned plaintiffs and Capt. Cook, and they insisted that the indorsement was strictly correct, and that it did not by any means necessarily imply that Tangiers was a port in the Mediterranean. They further insisted that the policy had become forfeited by reason of Thomas Haire having died at Dor el Beida, and thereby committed a breach of the terms and conditions upon which the policy was granted.

The plaintiff Koenig, by his affidavit, deposed to a conversation with Captain Cook, in which it was specially stipulated that the policy should not be vitiated by Thomas Haire making voyages to and visiting the ports of the empire of Morocco, such as Mogadore and Mazagan (which places were specially named in the conversation), and also other ports of the Mediterranean, and on the coasts of Africa and of Asia. He also said, that if it had not been thoroughly understood by him, on behalf of the firm, that Thomas Haire should be allowed to proceed to any of the ports and places in the Mediterranean, and the coasts of Asia and Africa, including the ports of Morocco on the Atlantic coast, that he might think proper, the firm would not have insured Thomas Haire's life; and that he could not have conducted his business without visiting those ports.

Robert Christie in his cross-examination said that, in case any proposal had been made to which a condition was attached for licence to visit any port on the coasts of Africa, the directors would not, generally speaking, in his opinion, have entertained it on any terms. He further said he was not aware of any practice of insurance offices in London as to the payment of the sums insured, when the lives insured had proceeded beyond the prescribed limits without the cognizance of the holders of the policies. The reason why the policy in this case was refused to be paid was, because the insured went to a place far beyond the limits prescribed, and died there. There was no other reason that he knew of.

Cook died before the institution of the suit, the plaintiffs in which were the said W. C. Fowler, Lewis Reis and Gustavus Koenig; and the defendants, the Scottish Equitable Life Insurance Society, and Ritchie, who had succeeded Cook as the principal agent of the society in London.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Jessel, for the plaintiffs, submitted that Cook, as general agent of the society in London, had power to grant a policy such as that alleged to have been intended, and that there being here clear parol evidence of mistake in the terms of the policy granted, the Court would rectify such mistake. STUART, V.C.—I cannot see that the plaintiffs have established their case. What they are required to prove is, that the defendants, the society, are bound by the terms of the agreement made by their agent, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the instrument which was executed by the defendants in their favour, and which they say does not correspond with the agreement made with the agent, rectified so as to make it correspond with that agreement. The great argument on behalf of the plaintiffs is, that Cook, the agent of the defendants, the society, in London, had power absolutely to bind those defendants as their general agents. The course of dealing and the evidence in the cause shew that, whatever the general authority of Cook may have been as agent, what actually took place was this, that the agreement which the plaintiff Koenig intended to make was to have its force and legal effect from an instrument to be executed in Edinburgh. The case of the defendants, the society, is, that Cook was their agent to negotiate the terms of policies in London as their manager: but that Cook could of his own authority issue a policy in London is contradicted by the evidence in the cause, and cannot be established. The course of business was this: Cook, as manager in London, could negotiate the terms of a policy with any person desirous of effecting one with the society, but the policy itself was an instrument to be made in Edinburgh, which was the head-quarters of the society. The plaintiffs say, that there was no necessity, after a complete agreement with Cook, for the granting of any policy at all; that the society would have been bound by the agreement of Cook, and were bound just as completely as if the policy under the seal of the society had been given to the plaintiffs. That the plaintiffs might have had a remedy against Cook is perfectly plain, but the transaction, as it appears in evidence, and in evidence under the plaintiff Koenig's own hand, is this—there being a stipulation or proposal for a policy upon the life of the gentleman in question, it was agreed between Cook as agent for the company and the plaintiff Koenig, that there should be a waiver of some of the ordinary conditions of a policy, and that that waiver should consist in a licence generally to go to ports in Africa, either within the Mediterranean or outside the Mediterranean. That agreement was made in plain and distinct terms. But the proposal, under the plaintiff Koenig's own handwriting, was by mistake made in different terms. I think, to that extent there is evidence to shew that there was a mistake in what was written by the hand of that plaintiff himself, for in that the proposal was limited to the ports of the Mediterranean and Tangiers. Now that was a mistake to which unfortunately the plaintiff Koenig himself was a party, by being the person who, in fact, committed it himself. I do not say, however, that that would deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of the doctrine of the Court, with respect to having an agreement rectified, if they could prove it so as to bind the other parties; but here it is an integral part of the case, that the policy could not be received until the sanction of the society in Edinburgh was obtained. It seems to me, therefore, an irresistible conclusion that, if the directors and manager in Edinburgh, seeing the terms communicated to them by the agent in London, had chosen to say, "We will not agree to the terms; we object to this special waiver of the conditions; and we decline to grant the policy"; they would have had a perfect right to withhold the policy, and not to complete that which was a peculiar and extraordinary contract proposed to their agent in London, agreed to by their agent in London, and communicated by him to them: a contract that must be consummated as an agreement, by receiving the sanction of the Edinburgh body. The rest of the history of the case is very plain. The agent in London communicated this proposal in the erroneous terms given in the handwriting of the plaintiff Koenig himself. To that proposal, which was not the real agreement, the Edinburgh directors assented, and what is sought to be reformed is the memorandum, which was signed by the Edinburgh agent, and adopted by the board as that which constituted the agreement. That Edinburgh manager is now sought to be made to sign, under the decree of the Court, as having agreed to it, a certain stipulation of which he never heard. It seems quite enough to say, that an agreement means that both contracting parties are of one mind. Here Mr. Christie, one of the contracting parties to the instrument which is now sought to be reformed, confessedly never heard of that which is said to be the real agreement. The result, upon the whole, is plain, that the agent in London agreed to something which he never communicated to his principals. The agent in London communicated that which was a mistaken proposal. The plaintiff Koenig, who made the agreement with the London agent, never intended to be bound by the stipulation which he himself framed in a mistaken form. The result is, that there is no agreement at all. That being so, the plaintiffs seem entirely to have mistaken their remedy; for in this case, there being no agreement, I think the plaintiffs altogether, both the assignee of the policy and the makers of the policy, who join as plaintiffs, have been paying premiums, with the intention of acquiring a right which was never given, or agreed to be given, by those who are now sought to be bound. Cook, who is said to have been the agent, and who is said to have been the person with whom the agreement was made, is no party to the suit. The remedy is sought against the principals, on the footing of Cook having been the general agent of the defendants, the society, and who might therefore bind them. In fact, the person sought to be bound is Mr. Christie, and the agreement sought to be rectified is that which was made by Mr. Christie as the manager in Edinburgh. The plaintiffs have entirely failed in that; but I think that they have shewn a case in which all the premiums paid must be repaid, as the mistake was occasioned by the mistake of the agent of the society in London. It is impossible to say that the suit was unnecessary, as without it the plaintiffs would not have got back the premiums. The plaintiffs have failed in obtaining the full relief they claim; but I think they are entitled to have the premiums returned, and to have it declared that they were paid under a mistake.

The following were the minutes of the order made:—"It appearing to the Court that the memorandum upon the policy of insurance in the bill mentioned is framed under a mistake, and is not in accordance with the terms agreed upon between the plaintiff Koenig and Cook, in the pleadings named, as the agent of the defendants, and that the real terms of the said agreement were not communicated to nor adopted by the defendants, declare, that the said policy is not binding upon the plaintiffs or the defendants, and order that the defendants do, within a month of the service upon them of the decree, pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the premiums paid to the insurance office, and order that thereupon the plaintiffs do deliver the policy to the defendants. No costs on either side."

L.C.
Dec. 3, 4, 14, } SCOTT v. THE CORPORATION OF LIVERPOOL.
15, 20.

Building Contract—Account—Arbitration Clause—Jurisdiction of ordinary Tribunals, how far excluded.

The plaintiffs contracted with the corporation of L. to perform certain works, and the corporation agreed to pay for them in a specified manner, with a proviso that no sum should be considered due, nor should the plaintiffs make any claim on account of any work executed by them, unless the engineer of the corporation should certify the amount thereof, and that the plaintiffs were reasonably entitled thereto. The corporation also had the power of determining the contract if the plaintiffs should not in the opinion and according to the determination of the engineer exercise due diligence; and thereupon the engineer was to fix the amount earned by the plaintiffs. There was a general clause for referring all disputes and differences to the final arbitration of the engineer. The contract was determined by the corporation, and the plaintiffs filed a bill for an account; but it was held (affirming the decision of one of the Vice Chancellors) that, the certificate of the engineer not having been given, and not being shewn to have been fraudulently withheld, the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

Where parties to an agreement provide for the settlement of disputes arising out of the contract by the arbitration of persons mentioned in the agreement, or to be determined when the disputes arise, this does not oust the ordinary tribunals of jurisdiction in such disputes. But where a contract provides for the determination of the contractor's claims and liabilities by the judgment of a particular person, everything depends on his decision, and until he has spoken no right arises which can be enforced either at law or in equity.

This was an appeal, by the surviving plaintiff, from the decision of Stuart, V.C., reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 641.

The facts and arguments will sufficiently appear from the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Karlake appeared for the appellant.

Mr. Dewsnap, for the executors of the deceased plaintiff.

Upon the conclusion of the argument for the plaintiff, and at the suggestion of

Mr. R. R. A. Hawkins, who appeared for Mr. Hawksley the engineer, the bill was dismissed as against Mr. Hawksley, with costs, no case having been opened against him.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Bacon and Mr. Rowcliffe appeared for the corporation.

Mr. Karlake was heard in reply.

Dec. 20.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—
This is an appeal from a decree of Stuart, V.C., dismissing the plaintiffs' bill with costs. The bill was filed for the purpose of obtaining an account of works done by the plaintiffs for the corporation of Liverpool and of monies due in respect thereof, under an agreement, dated the 6th of November 1851. The corporation having acquired, under the authority of acts of parliament, powers enabling them to supply the borough of Liverpool and its neighbourhood with water, and being desirous of constructing new and additional waterworks, caused to be printed and circulated a specification to be observed by the contractor for constructing certain reservoirs and other works, &c. The specification included three proposed contracts, for one only of which the plaintiffs tendered, and which comprised the formation of the "Rivington Reservoir." This contract the plaintiffs undertook to perform, for the sum of 56,268*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*, and their tender having been accepted, the agreement of the 6th of November 1851 was entered into, by which the plaintiffs contracted with the corporation to construct, complete and deliver up the works comprised in the contract, for the price aforesaid, and to observe and perform all things mentioned in the specification, and on their part to be observed and performed.

There were annexed to the specification certain general conditions, to some of which it will be necessary particularly to refer, for upon the proper construction of them the case entirely depends. The following are the clauses:—"It shall be lawful for the said corporation, in case the said contractor shall fail in the due performance of any part of his undertaking, or shall not in the opinion and according to the determination of the said engineer exercise such due diligence and make such due progress as would enable the works to be efficiently completed at the time and in the manner aforesaid, to determine the contract, by a notice in writing, under the hand of the town clerk, and to enter upon and take possession of the said works, and of the plant, tools and materials of the said contractor, and use or sell the same as the absolute property of the corporation. The plant, tools and materials provided by the contractor shall in all cases from the time at which they or any of them may be brought upon the works and land of the corporation, and during the construction and until the completion of the said works, become and continue the property of the said corporation, and the contractor is hereby prohibited from removing the same or any part thereof during the progress of the works, without the consent in writing of the said engineer. * * And when the contract shall have been so terminated, or so soon after as the engineer may think convenient, the said engineer shall fix and determine what amount, if any, is then reasonably earned by the contractor in respect of work actually done, and in respect to the value of any materials, implements and tools provided by the contractor and taken by the corporation, and the amount thereof, after allowing for all sums then already paid to the contractor on account, shall remain in the hands of the corporation, without interest, until twelve months after the date of the engineer's certificate of the final completion of the works as herein provided ; and the said engineer shall be at liberty to authorize by his certificate the said corporation to deduct the damages, losses, costs, charges and expenses in his opinion incurred by them in consequence of the premises, or to which they may be put or liable, together with the forfeitures, if any, incurred by the said contractor, from any sum of money which would so become due and owing to the said contractor. * * And the said contractor shall be entitled to payment for his work in manner following, that is to say, to a monthly instalment, equal to 80% per cent. of the value of the amount executed in the then preceding month; to a further instalment of 10% per cent. of the value of the amount of work executed when such works are completed and delivered to and accepted by the said corporation in manner aforesaid; and to the balance, whatever the same may be found to amount to, so soon as the responsibility of the said contractor shall cease and determine, and shall have been entirely fulfilled; provided that no sum or sums of money shall be considered to be due and owing, nor shall the said contractor make any claim against or demand upon the said corporation for or on account of any work executed by him, unless the said engineer shall certify the amount thereof, and that the said contractor is reasonably entitled to such instalment or balance respectively, nor unless such certificate shall have been presented to the town clerk of the said borough; nor shall any such sum or sums of money be considered payable to the said contractor until the expiration of seven days after such certificate shall have been so presented, nor shall any omission to pay the amount of such certificate, at the time the same shall be payable, be held or deemed to vitiate or avoid the contract; but in such case the contractor shall be entitled to interest thereon at and after the rate of 10% per cent. per annum for such time as such omission shall continue. And in case of any doubts, disputes or differences arising or happening, touching or concerning the said works, or any of them, or relating to the quantities, qualities, description or manner of work done and executed, or to be done and executed by the said contractor, or to the quantity or quality of the materials to be employed therein, or in respect of any additions, deductions, alterations or variations made in, to or from the said works, or any part of them, or touching or concerning the meaning or intention of this specification, or of any part thereof, or of the contract entered into by and between the said corporation and the said contractor, or of any plans, drawings, instructions or directions referred to in this specification or the contract, or which may be furnished or given during the progress of the works, or touching or concerning any certificate, order or award which may have been made by the said engineer, or in anywise whatsoever relating to the interest of the said corporation, or of the said contractor in the premises, such doubts, disputes or differences shall from time to time be referred to, and be settled and decided by the said engineer, who shall be competent to enter upon the subject-matter of such doubts, disputes or differences, with or without formal reference or notice to the parties to the said contract, or either of them, and who shall judge, decide, order and determine thereon; and to the said engineer shall also be referred the settlement of the said contract, and the determination of the said sum or sums or balance of money to be paid to or received from the said contractor by the said corporation, and the directions, decisions, admeasurements, valuations, certificates, orders and awards of the said engineer (which said directions, decisions, admeasurements, valuations, certificates, orders and awards respectively may be made from time to time) shall be final and binding upon the corporation and the said contractor respectively, and shall not be set aside, or be attempted to be set aside, by reason or on account of any technical or legal defects therein, or in this specification, or in the contract founded thereon, or on account of any informality, omission, delay or error of proceedings in or about the same or any of them, or in relation thereto, or on any other ground, or for any other reason, or for any pretence, suggestion, charge or insinuation of fraud, collusion or confederacy, or otherwise howsoever."

This contract has been characterized as one of great severity towards the contractors, who are said to be placed by it entirely at the mercy and the arbitrary discretion of the engineer. But arguments drawn from the hard terms of an agreement are never admissible after it has been entered into, because the parties have deliberately consented to be bound by it. The contractors entered upon the execution of the works; they complained that they did not obtain possession of the land on which the works were to be executed until a long time after the time specified in the contract, and hence that great delay necessarily arose. On the other hand, the engineer of the corporation attributes the slowness of the works to the dilatoriness of the plaintiffs, and the insufficiency of the plant and materials employed by them. It is unnecessary to determine where the fault (if any) lay. Mutual dissatisfaction undoubtedly prevailed, which led the corporation to exercise the power they possessed of determining the contract by a notice from the town clerk, dated the 28th of February 1855. It is admitted, by the plaintiffs, that the corporation were entitled to give this notice, and that it legally determined the contract, and therefore that the rights of the parties involved in this suit must be ascertained and determined upon as they existed at and from this period. It appears that at the time of the determination of the contract, the corporation had paid to the plaintiffs, on account of the works they had done, various sums of money, amounting to 49,942*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* These payments were made from time to time during the progress of the works, either on certificates or from the reports of the engineer of the amounts that had become payable under the contract. On the determination of the contract, the corporation, in exercise of the powers which they possessed under it, took possession of the works which had been executed by the plaintiffs, and of the plant, tools and materials which they had brought on the works and land; and completed all that the plaintiffs had left unfinished. While the contract was subsisting, the plaintiffs were desirous of substituting for the decision of Mr. Hawksley, as to the amount payable to them, the arbitration of some other indifferent person, to which the corporation declined to accede. On the determination of the contract, the plaintiffs sent to the corporation a statement of the amount which they claimed to be due to them for the works they had executed;

and the corporation disagreeing to the amount, Mr. Hawksley, on the 19th of March 1855, appointed Monday, the 26th of March 1855, to proceed with the reference on such claims, pursuant to the terms of the contract; to which the plaintiffs' solicitors replied, that the corporation having given them notice that they had determined the contract, they apprehended the references under it were at an end also. The notice by Hawksley was given with an intention of proceeding under the general clause of reference; but having been advised that he ought to proceed under the clause which applies to the case of the contract having been determined, he wrote to the plaintiffs to that effect. To this the plaintiffs' solicitors replied that as the corporation had declined to refer the matters to an indifferent party, "our clients, acting under our advice, will immediately file a bill in equity for relief. Under these circumstances, we will decline to attend at your office on the 21st inst. for the purposes mentioned in your notice." The bill was filed on the 22nd of November 1855, the corporation and Hawksley being made the defendants, and the latter being charged with having, "under the direction of the defendants, the corporation, aided and abetted them in withholding from the plaintiffs payment of the monies justly due to them in respect of the said contract, and the defendants have joined in acts which amount to a fraud upon the plaintiffs." This is curiously qualified, in a subsequent paragraph of the bill, thus:—"The plaintiffs do not, however, employ the word 'fraud' in its offensive or obnoxious sense, as meaning a fraudulent scheme or intention, deliberately formed or entertained for the purpose of cheating the plaintiffs, but as meaning conduct which would be the instrument of fraud, if it should prevail to prevent the plaintiffs from recovering payment of what is justly due to them." The bill prayed—"That it may be declared that the withholding of the certificates—which the defendant, the engineer, was by the terms of the said specification and contract bound to give to the plaintiffs—of the amount remaining due to them for works executed by them under the said contract, was and is a fraud on the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to receive all such sums of money as they would have been entitled to if such certificates had been duly granted."

To this bill Hawksley demurred, upon the ground that he was improperly made a party to the suit. The Vice Chancellor overruled the demurrer, with costs (1), being of opinion that the charges in the bill (assumed to be true for the purpose of the demurrer) constituted clear grounds of equitable relief, not only against the corporation, but also against the engineer, in respect of his imputed misconduct. The cause then came on for hearing; and his Honour, desiring to be informed whether the plaintiffs had any remedy at law under the contract, requested the assistance of one of the Common Law Judges; and the question was argued before his Honour and Erle, J., whether, on the terms of the contract, and the evidence of the course of conduct of the parties in regard to the execution of the works, the case was one in which, if tried at law, the jury would be directed to find a verdict for the plaintiffs. The learned Judge expressed a very clear opinion in the negative, on the ground that every right to payment during the progress of works was conditional on obtaining the engineer's certificate, and after the determination of the contract, upon the engineer's fixing and determining the amount of work done, and valuing the plant and materials; and that unless the plaintiffs could shew that these requisites had been complied with, they would fail in an action at law. The Vice Chancellor subsequently gave his judgment, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief in equity, and dismissed their bill, with costs (2).

The plaintiffs contend that this decree is erroneous, and have urged very strongly in argument before me, that if there is no remedy at law, it follows, of necessity, that there must be a remedy in equity; otherwise, as they say, this monstrous consequence will follow, that a party entitled to large sums of money is utterly remediless. This mode of putting the plaintiffs' case is, however, open to the objection that it begins by begging the whole question. It may possibly be, that eventually the plaintiffs may be entitled to recover a large amount that they may prove to be due, and yet at the time of the commencement of an action, or the institution of a suit in equity, they may have bound themselves by contract in such a manner that until some preliminary act is done no right of payment accrues. To speak of a person being either legally or equitably entitled under such circumstances, would clearly be incorrect, as the title, which both Courts of law and equity deal with in cases of this description, is not an imperfect, but a complete title. The question is, whether the plaintiffs have shewn that they have a present right to an equitable remedy? In order to determine this question, it will be necessary carefully to consider the mode in which the plaintiffs now shape their case. The idea of founding their claim to relief on fraud is altogether abandoned. All the charges against Mr. Hawksley, whatever their meaning may have been, are withdrawn, and, as to him, the bill has been dismissed, with costs; and as a corporation cannot commit fraud except through the instrumentality of an agent, this part of the case failing as to Mr. Hawksley, must consequently fail as to the corporation. The plaintiffs, therefore, are driven to sustain their bill by insisting that (the contract not binding them to submission to Hawksley's award) the accounts are so complicated, intricate and voluminous, that they cannot be perfectly dealt with or disposed of by any action at law. This is alleged in the bill; but I do not find any satisfactory proof to support the allegation. At the same time I should always be disposed to regard the jurisdiction of Courts of law and equity, with respect to complicated accounts, as so far concurrent, that where the parties have proceeded at law, I should be unwilling to withdraw the case from the Court of law, merely because a Court of equity could more conveniently dispose of it; but I should not think myself at liberty to refuse the aid of this Court, when invoked, because a Court of common law could completely settle the whole of the disputed accounts. As Lord Cottenham said, in The North-Eastern Railway Company v. Martin, "It is impossible with precision to lay down rules or establish definitions as to the cases in which it may be proper for this Court to exercise this jurisdiction. The infinitely varied transactions of mankind would be found continually to baffle such rules, and to escape from such definitions. It is, therefore, necessary for this Court to reserve to itself a large discretion, in the exercise of which due regard must be had, not only to the nature of the case, but to the conduct of the parties." And again, in The Taff Vale Railway Company v. Nixon, he says, "In questions of this sort, each case must be decided according to the circumstances belonging to it." If it is necessary, in order to maintain a bill for an account, that "it should relate to that which is the subject of mutual acknowledgment," as was held, by Vice Chancellor Turner, in Phillips v. Phillips, I have no difficulty in treating the accounts here as mutual, as the price of the work done by the corporation to complete the plaintiffs' unfinished work might be properly treated as so much done for the plaintiffs, and would have to be deducted from the entire sum which the plaintiffs would have been entitled to if they had completed the whole of the work, besides the deductions which the corporation would have to make for "damages, losses, costs, charges, expenses and forfeitures." I do not think, therefore, that the mere fact of the accounts being capable of settlement and adjustment in a court of law, would have prevented the plaintiffs being entitled to an account if there were no other objection their way. But it appears to me that within the contract itself there exists an invincible impediment to the relief which the plaintiffs claim. It has been already seen that by the terms of the contract the plaintiffs are precluded from all remedy at law until the certificate of the engineer has been obtained, or until he has fixed and determined the sum to which the plaintiffs are entitled for the works which they have done, and the value of the plant and materials which were taken to by the corporation. This view of the case at law goes very far towards a similar decision in a court of equity. There is no equitable construction of an agreement distinct from its legal construction. To construe is nothing more than to arrive at the meaning of the parties to an agreement, and this must be the aim and end of all Courts which are called upon to enforce any rights created by and growing out of contract. The plaintiffs, however, contend that the stipulations in the agreement referring all matters to the decision of Mr. Hawksley, are not sufficient to oust this Court of its jurisdiction, and various authorities have been referred to in support of this argument. It is unnecessary to enter in detail into all the cases on the effect of agreements to refer, or the jurisdiction of Courts of law and equity, because they have been, most of them, passed in review by Lord Cranworth in Scott v. Avery, and are shewn merely to establish this proposition, that if I covenant with a man to do particular acts, and it is also covenanted between us that any question which may arise as to the breach of the covenant should be referred to arbitration, the latter covenant does not prevent the covenantor from bringing an action: a right of action has accrued, and it would be against the policy of the law to give effect to such an agreement that such a right should not be enforced through the medium of the ordinary tribunals. This proposition seems to be established by the class of cases at the head of which is Thompson v. Charnock. But it is impossible to pass over altogether the case of Dimsdale v. Robertson, both on account of the high authority of the eminent Judge by whom it was decided, and because it seems to have been entirely overlooked in the decision of similar cases. There, Lord St. Leonards, after the consideration of the authorities on the subject, arrived at a conclusion apparently at variance with them. In the view which I have taken of this case, it is unnecessary for me to consider the propriety of his decision; but I cannot forbear the remark, in passing, that the circumstance upon which he relied as giving greater effect to the agreement to refer, in Dimsdale v. Robertson (namely, the power to make the submission a rule of Court, and the legislative provisions in such a case, giving authority to arbitrators to examine witnesses upon oath) hardly appears sufficient to distinguish the case from the others in which these stipulations were not found; as they are mere directions as to the mode in which the reference is to be conducted, or for enabling the parties to give greater efficacy to it by attachment for disobedience, and do not operate until after the case has been withdrawn from the action of the tribunals, which, the prior decisions establish, the parties could have no power to affect. If, then, there had been nothing in this contract but the general agreement to refer, "in case of any doubts, disputes or differences arising or appearing," I should have thought, on the general authority of the class of cases which I have mentioned, that supposing the plaintiffs in all other respects entitled to an account, they might have been decreed it, notwithstanding this provision. But I am of opinion that an earlier clause than this meets the circumstances that have arisen, and must decide the rights of the parties in their present position under this contract. I refer to the clause, which provides for the case of the contract being determined. On the construction of this clause, the question arises whether the principle upon which Scott v. Avery was decided does not here intervene and render that case a binding authority upon my judgment. That principle is stated by Lord Cranworth in these terms: "If I covenant with A. B. that if I do or omit to do a certain act, then I will pay to him such a sum as J. S. shall award as the amount of damage sustained by him, then until J. S. has made his award, and I have omitted to pay the sum awarded, my covenant has not been broken, and no right of action has arisen." And I may ask with him, as the question to be answered in this case, Does any right of action exist in this case until the amount of damage has been ascertained in the specified mode? In order to determine this question, we must refer again to the clause in the specification upon which it depends. It is: "And in case of the contract being so determined as aforesaid, the corporation may re-let the undertaking of the contractor, or any part thereof, and when the contract shall have been so terminated, or so soon thereafter as the engineer may think convenient, the said engineer shall fix and determine what amount (if any) is then reasonably earned by the contractor in respect of work actually done, and in respect to the value of any materials, implements and tools provided by the contractor and taken by the corporation." Now, suppose the contractors had chosen to agree that they would be paid for their work not a specific sum, nor upon measure and value, but such an amount as the company's engineer might fix—can there be a doubt that such a contract, although a very imprudent one, would be binding, and that the contractors would be bound to submit entirely to the discretion, or even to the caprice, of the person whom they had clothed with this arbitrary authority? What is there more in this case? The contractors agree that, in a given event—namely, the determination of the contract by the corporation—the engineer is to fix and determine what amount, if any, is then reasonably earned by the contractors in respect of the work actually done, and in respect of the value of any materials, implements and tools provided by the contractors and taken to by the corporation. The plaintiffs' counsel agreed (though this was with reference to the general clause of the reference to the engineer) that, if he had made an award even ex parte, the contractors would have been bound by it. I cannot, however, understand how this should be if the contractors are not tied by their contract to the judgment of the engineer—if they refuse to appear before him, or in any way to recognize his right to determine the matter. But I think they would be bound by the engineer's decision under such circumstances, because they had agreed to submit to it; and, having done so, how is it possible for them to say that they are entitled to be paid for their work and plant, not the amount which the engineer shall fix and determine, but what some other forum may think that they ought to receive? It was stated that this clause leaves the contractors wholly at the mercy of the engineer, who is only to fix and determine the amount which they are to receive when the contract should have been terminated, or as soon thereafter as the engineer may think convenient; and it was argued that he might consult his own supposed convenience and indefinitely postpone his determination. I do not think that the proper construction of these words is, that they relate to the personal convenience of the engineer; but, be that as it may, if he were to decline to enter upon the question, or by any affected delay, or any improper proceeding of any kind, were to attempt to delay a decision, a Court of equity would know how to deal with such a state of things, though a Court of common law might be powerless to afford any redress.

(1) 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 227.

(2) 27 Ibid. 641.

The plaintiffs' counsel, however, insist that there are authorities not affected by Scott v. Avery, which have determined that in cases very similar to the present, parties have been held to be entitled to an account, notwithstanding there were equally stringent clauses in their agreements binding them to refer their disputes to arbitration. It will be necessary, therefore, shortly to examine these cases. That which was principally relied upon was the case of M'Intosh v. the Great Western Railway Company. In the earlier stage of that case it has no bearing on the present question. The plaintiff, who was a contractor, agreed to do certain works for the company, and the company agreed to advance money on account of works done and executed, such execution to be certified by Mr. Brunel or the principal engineer for the time being. The bill alleged that Mr. Brunel had refused to certify, and that in doing so he was acting in collusion with the company; and it prayed a declaration by the Court that the withholding such certificates was a fraud, and that he was entitled to recover the amount. To this bill the defendants demurred, and the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce first, and afterwards Lord Cottenham on appeal, decided that the allegation of collusion was sufficient to sustain the bill; and the demurrer was overruled with costs, just in the same manner as the Vice Chancellor overruled Mr. Hawksley's demurrer in the present case, although on the hearing the charges of fraud could not be established. But the case of M'Intosh v. the Great Western Railway Company came on for hearing before Vice Chancellor Stuart, and it is said, that his Honour arrived at a conclusion inconsistent with his decision in this case, having decreed an account. To ascertain whether the two decrees are thus inconsistent, it must be seen whether the contract in that case is in terms like the present. It is not given in the report, but I have been furnished with a copy by one of the learned counsel in the case, from which it appears that the provisions for determining the claim of the contractor were very different from those in the present agreement, there being a stipulation for a general reference of disputes to arbitrators to be named, in these general terms:—"But if any difference of opinion shall arise between the company or their engineer and the plaintiffs as to any matter of charge or account as between the company and the plaintiff, such dispute shall be referred and finally settled and concluded by the arbitration of the engineer on the part of the company, and an engineer to be appointed by the plaintiff on his part; and in case of their not being able to agree, a third person shall be named in writing as arbitrator by such two engineers before they proceed upon the subject of the reference, and the decision of any such arbitrator so named shall be final and binding on both parties." This clause, in itself, would distinguish the case from Scott v. Avery, and would bring it within the class of cases that follow Thompson v. Charnock. I, therefore, think his Honour cannot be fairly charged with inconsistency in his decrees in that case and the present. The case of Ranger v. the Great Western Railway Company appears to me not to assist the plaintiffs' argument. The contract there made the engineer during the progress of the works the absolute judge of the mode in which the contractor was discharging his duties, and of how much of the contract price had from time to time become payable, and his decision was to be final; but, unlike the present case, after all the works should have been completed, the contractor was to be at liberty to call in a referee of his own as to any question of amount due beyond what had been certified. The contractor was unsuccessful in his suit on every point but one. Upon that one the plaintiffs' counsel have relied, as entitling them at least to an account of the value of the plant, tools and materials taken by the corporation. But it appears to me that the account decreed in that case is no authority for a similar one in the present. There, as here, the company was empowered to take possession of the works, and of the whole or of such part of the materials, tools and implements used by the contractor as the company's engineer might consider requisite for carrying on the works. The question was, whether, upon their taking possession, the plant and materials became the absolute property of the company? It appeared there was a clause in the contract, that if the materials, tools and implements so to become the property of the company should be insufficient to cover all the charges occasioned by completing the works, then the contractor was to make good the deficiency; and the House of Lords (adopting the view of the agreement as stated by Lord Cranworth, viz., that the company, though at liberty to seize and appropriate the plant belonging to the contractor, were yet bound to account for its value in settling their accounts with him) decided that the contractor was entitled to an account of the value of the plant, and also of other matters necessarily connected with and incidental to that inquiry. The agreement as to the plant is very different in this case; for, although it is to become the absolute property of the corporation upon their taking possession of it, instead of the value being applicable to make good any liability of the contractors, it is merely to be fixed and determined by the engineer. So that if an account were to be decreed to be taken of its value, it would be an entire departure from the contract, by which that question is agreed to be left exclusively to Mr. Hawksley. It only remains to notice the recent case of Kemp v. Rose, which is also stated to be inconsistent with the present case. It will be found, however, that the Vice Chancellor admitted that if the question had there depended on the contract alone, the contractor was completely at the mercy of the architect; but he fastened on circumstances which he considered might produce an improper bias upon the architect's mind, and on that ground alone put the contract aside, and opened the way to the jurisdiction of the Court in that case. The case of Kemp v. Rose is not at variance with his Honour's decision in this case. I have entered at so much length into this case, partly on account of its great importance, but principally with a desire to shew that there may be extracted from previous decisions principles that may be safely applied to determine the effect of provisions, now so common in contracts for the execution of works, by which the contractor's claims and liabilities are placed at the discretion and under the controul and judgment of the agent of the parties for whom the work is to be done. If the parties to the agreement have provided beforehand for the settlement of any disputes that may arise on the rights and liabilities growing out of the contract by the arbitration of persons mentioned in the agreement, or to be determined when disputes arise, such a stipulation cannot be urged as an answer to either party who prefers to resort to the Courts for the determination of his rights, nor can it deprive the tribunals of the country of their jurisdiction, whatever remedy may be open to the parties against whom proceedings are instituted for the breach of the agreement. But where the contract provides for the determination of the claims and liabilities of the contractors by the judgment of some particular person, this would be incorrectly called a provision for submission to arbitration, as no dispute can exist in such a case, everything being dependent upon the decision of the individual named; and until he has spoken no right can arise which can be enforced, either at law or in equity. I think that Mr. Hawksley stands in this relation to the plaintiffs in this case. They have agreed to submit themselves entirely to his judgment, but now decline his authority. If the Court were to assume the jurisdiction which is prayed, it would not be enforcing the contract of the parties, but acting in direct opposition to it. I think, therefore, that the decree of the Vice Chancellor must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

 Dec. 7. } BIGNOLD v. GILES.

Legacy Duty—Liability of Executors.

A testator directed his estates to be sold, and gave the dividends of one portion of the proceeds to his wife for life, and after her death he gave the capital to A. B. The second portion he gave to A. B, subject to various annuities. By an arrangement between the widow and A. B., the first portion was paid over by the executors to A. B. during the widow's life, and no sum was retained to answer the legacy duty, which would become payable on the widow's death. A. B. sold the second portion to the plaintiff, and the surviving executors of the surviving executor of the testator joined in the assignment for the purpose of admitting A. B.'s title to the property, and stating that they knew of no incumbrance upon it. Upon the death of the annuitants, the purchaser filed a bill against the executors for a transfer of the fund; and the Court held, that the defendants were not entitled to retain the legacy duty payable upon the first portion of the property.

The bill in this case was filed, by the plaintiff, who represented the Norwich Union Reversionary Interest Society, against the surviving executors of the surviving executor of the testator in the cause, praying that a sum of 3,633*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* consols, standing in their names, might be transferred to the plaintiff, less the legacy duty thereon, without deducting therefrom the legacy duty payable on a legacy of 5,099*l.*, which had been previously transferred to the legatee.

The following were the facts of the case:—Joachim Hibberd, by his will, dated the 8th of September 1819, appointed his brother, Joseph Hibberd, and Charles Beale executors, and devised and bequeathed to them and the survivor of them, their or his heirs, executors and administrators, all his monies in the funds, and all other his real and personal property and effects, in trust to sell and convert the same into money, and to divide such money, including therein a sum of 4,300*l.* three per cents., into two equal moieties, in trust, out of one moiety of the said aggregate amount (of which the said 4,300*l.* three per cents. should be a part) to pay and discharge any balance that might by a fair statement of all debts and credits appear due from the testator to the said Joseph Hibberd as his partner in business, together with the testator's just debts and funeral expenses, and the costs and expenses of proving his will, and also certain legacies therein mentioned; and after the payment of the before-mentioned charges and legacies, in trust to invest the surplus of such moiety in the Government stocks or funds, in the names of them, the said Joseph Hibberd and Charles Beale, or the survivor of them, their or his executors or administrators, and to pay the annual dividends and interest thereof and of the said 4,300*l.*, unto his wife Ann Hibberd, during her life, provided she should remain his widow; but in case of her death or future marriage, which should first happen, then he gave and bequeathed such moiety of the said aggregate amount to Ann Beale, the wife of the said Charles Beale, as her own sole property for ever, save and except the said sum of 4,300*l.* in the three per cents., which the testator directed should remain there and be transferred into the names of the said Joseph Hibberd and Charles Beale, or the survivor of them, their or his executors or administrators, for the uses and purposes following; that is to say, as to the annual dividends or interest payable thereon, amounting to 129*l.* per annum, in trust to pay his brother James Hibberd, and his two sisters Patience Lane and Susannah Bowring, one clear yearly annuity or sum of 20*l.* each during their lives, and the remainder of the said dividends or interest of 129*l.* to be paid to his nephew Robert Samuel Hibberd during his life; and as and when the testator's said brother James and sisters Patience and Susannah should depart this life, then that the three several annuities of 20*l.* each should devolve and be paid to Louisa Hibberd, afterwards the wife of Stephen Webb, the said Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth Hibberd, afterwards the wife of John Riley, and since deceased; the eldest taking the first of the said annuities that should fall, and the others in like manner by seniority; and after the decease of the survivor of them the said Louisa Hibberd, Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth, then the testator gave and bequeathed the principal sum of 4,300*l.* in the three per cents. and all interest due thereon (if any), to the said Ann Beale, her heirs and assigns, and to be disposed of by will or otherwise as she might think fit; and as to the other moiety of the said aggregate amount of the testator's real and personal effects, in trust for the other persons and purposes in the said will mentioned.

The testator died in July 1820, leaving Ann Hibberd his widow him surviving, and his will was duly proved by the said Joseph Hibberd and Charles Beale. Charles Beale died on the 3rd of February 1825, and Joseph Hibberd died on the 8th of March 1827, having by his will, dated the 5th of February 1827, appointed the defendant George Giles and James Sheppard, since deceased, his executors, who duly proved his will. Susannah Bowring died in May 1822. Patience Lane died in December 1826, and the testator's widow died on the 21st of May 1835.

By an arrangement between the widow of the testator and Ann Beale, the sum of 5,099*l.*, which was the residue of a moiety of the proceeds of the testator's estate (extra the 4,300*l.*), after payment thereof of debts, legacies, &c., was handed over to Ann Beale, by the executors, but no sum was retained thereof to answer the legacy duty which would become payable when the legacy fell into possession.

By an indenture dated the 17th of May 1837, after reciting, inter alia, that after the payment of Joachim Hibberd's debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, the clear produce of the sales, made according to his said will, of his freehold and leasehold estates, and the conversion of his general personal estate, exclusive of the said sum of stock, amounted to the sum of 13,023*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* sterling, whereof the sum of 5,099*l.*, together with the said sum of 4,300*l.* stock, was appropriated, as appeared by the residuary account rendered by the executors to the Stamp-office in the month of January 1824, to answer and satisfy the purposes declared by the will of the moiety or half part first therein mentioned of the aggregate amount of the produce of the testator's estate, and that the charges thereby imposed as aforesaid upon the said moiety were accordingly satisfied out of the last-mentioned sum of sterling money; that the residue thereof was invested pursuant to the will, and that the dividends thereof, and also of the said sum of 4,300*l.* stock, were duly paid to the said Ann Hibberd, the testator's widow, during her life; that the said sum of 4,300*l.* stock was then held by the said George Giles and James Sheppard, as such executors as aforesaid, in trust to pay with the dividends thereof the said annuities bequeathed by the will of the said Joachim Hibberd to the said James Hibberd, Louisa Webb, Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth Riley, for their lives respectively as aforesaid, and subject thereto in trust only for the said Ann Beale, who had contracted with the said John Wright, the plaintiff Samuel Bignold, and Robert John Bunyon, for the absolute sale to them of the said sum of 4,300*l.* stock, subject to the payment of the last-mentioned annuities, but free from all other incumbrances, for the sum of 806*l.*; and that the said George Giles and James Sheppard had agreed to join in and execute the indenture as such executors as aforesaid, in order to admit the title of the said Ann Beale to the said sum of 4,300*l.* stock, and to supply proof of notice to them of the assignment intended to be thereby made; it was witnessed, that, in pursuance of the said recited contract, and in consideration of the sum of 806*l.* paid by the said John Wright, the plaintiff and Robert John Bunyon to the said Ann Beale, she the said Ann Beale did bargain, sell, assign, transfer and set over unto the said John Wright, the plaintiff and Robert John Bunyon, their executors and administrators, all that the said sum of 4,300*l.* three per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, which as part of one moiety of the aggregate amount of the produce of the real and personal estates of the said Joachim Hibberd, and which also substantively was by the said will of the said Joachim Hibberd given to or in trust for the said Ann Beale as thereinbefore mentioned, and the dividends and the annual produce of the said sum of stock, subject to the payment thereof to the said James Hibberd during his life of the said annuity of 20*l.*, and to the said Louisa Webb during her life of her said annuity of 20*l.*, and to the said Robert Samuel Hibberd during his life of the said dividends originally bequeathed to him, and also the said additional annuity of 20*l.*, and to the said Elizabeth Riley during her life after the decease of the said James Hibberd, if she should survive him, of her said annuity of 20*l.*, and all the right, title, interest, trust, property, benefit, claim and demand whatsoever of the said Ann Beale, in, to and upon the said premises, together with full power and authority, which the said Ann Beale did thereby give and grant, to and for the said John Wright, the plaintiff and Robert John Bunyon, and the survivors and survivor of them, their and his executors, administrators and assigns, in the name or names of the said Ann Beale, her executors or administrators, or otherwise as might be deemed expedient, forthwith, or as and when the said sum of 4,300*l.* dividends, annual produce and premises should become payable, to ask, demand, sue for, recover and receive, and sign and give sufficient acquittances and discharges for the same respectively; to have, hold, receive and take the capital sum, dividends and annual produce and other premises thereby assigned, and every part thereof, subject to the said annuities as aforesaid, and also to the payment of the legacy duty chargeable upon the said Ann Beale in respect of the same premises, unto the said John Wright, the plaintiff and Robert John Bunyon, their executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely, and as fully and effectually as the said Ann Beale ever had, or she, or her executors or administrators, could or might have otherwise had or been entitled to the same.

James Sheppard died in the year 1843, leaving the said George Giles, the defendant, his co-trustee and executor, surviving. Ann Beale died in May 1846, Elizabeth Riley in February 1851, James Hibberd in March 1857, and Robert Samuel Hibberd in January 1858; so that, in the events which had happened, the only annuity chargeable on the dividends of the sum of 4,300*l.* was that of 20*l.* in favour of Louisa Webb, which would be fully met and provided for by a sum of 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, which was proposed to be set apart to answer that purpose.

It was under these circumstances that the bill was filed for a transfer to the plaintiffs of the sum of 3,633*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, the residue of the 4,300*l.* after deducting the 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*; but the defendant having given a bond to the government for payment of the whole legacy duty, not only upon the 4,300*l.*, but also upon the 5,099*l.* so transferred to Ann Beale by anticipation in the widow's lifetime, insisted that he was not bound to make such transfer without the sanction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

It further appeared, that on the occasion of the contract for the purchase of this reversionary interest by the plaintiffs, certain requisitions were made by the purchasers' solicitors, which were answered by the defendant's solicitor in the following manner:—

First requisition.—The vendor must prove, by production of the executor's accounts or otherwise, that the testator died possessed of the 4,300*l.* stock in question, and that no part of this sum was required or taken for payment of his debts, &c., or the legacies charged upon the moiety of his residuary estate given to his wife for life.—Answer: See the residuary account inclosed, under the head deductions; by which it appears that the 4,300*l.* was retained for the benefit of the testator's widow for her life only, and that she had independent thereof 5,099*l.* out of which all incumbrances on her moiety were paid.

Second requisition.—That the 4,300*l.* is now standing in the names of the executors or the representatives of the surviving executor, and is held by them only to answer the annuities given by the will, and subject thereto for Mrs. Beale.—Answer: This shall be complied with, and the document forwarded in the course of a few days.

Fifth requisition.—We should have a letter from the trustees, that they have not notice of any incumbrance on the funds proposed for sale.—Answer: The document which is to be sent in reply to the second requisition will also answer this.

This document was in the terms following:—"George Giles, of Hanging Langford, in the county of Wilts, yeoman, and James Sheppard, of Burcombe, in the county of Wilts aforesaid, yeoman, executors of Joseph Hibberd, late of the city of New Sarum, in the said county, innholder (since deceased), do hereby declare, that the 4,300*l.* in the three per cents., bequeathed by the will of Joachim Hibberd, late of the said city of New Sarum, innholder, deceased, to Ann Beale therein described, subject to the annuities therein mentioned, now stands vested in our names in the said three per cents. as the executors of the said Joseph Hibberd, who was the surviving executor of the said Joachim Hibberd, and that it is held by us only to answer the said annuities given by the will of the said Joachim Hibberd, and subject thereto for the said Ann Beale. Nor have we ever received notice of any incumbrance on the said 4,300*l.* three per cents., except the aforesaid annuities. As witness our hands, the 7th day of March 1837. Signed, George Giles and James Sheppard, executors of Joseph Hibberd. "Memorandum. — The legacy duty on the trust-money bequeathed to Mrs. Beale will be payable on the deaths of the annuitants."

Mr. Goldsmid and Mr. Martindale, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendants ought to be ordered to transfer to them the sum of 3,633*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, being the residue of the 4,300*l.*, after deducting the 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* set apart for answering the remaining annuity of 20*l.*, on payment only of the legacy duty on the 4,300*l.*, and that they could not retain any further sum to answer the legacy duty upon the 5,099*l.*

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. W. Cooper appeared for the defendants.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—With reference to the question which is first raised, namely, the right of these purchasers, that is, the Reversionary Interest Society, represented by the claimant, to have the benefit of this purchase, my opinion, subject to a question of construction, is this:—It was first—at least, as I understand the argument—contended that Messrs. Giles and Sheppard, having joined in this deed, they thereby entered into what amounted to a guarantie on their part against all incumbrances, known or unknown, upon this fund; and I then expressed myself to the effect—and I retain the same opinion—that if that were to be the way in which these gentlemen were to be dealt with, after having, out of consideration and merely for the convenience of the purchasers, executed this deed, expressly stating that they did it only for the purpose of admitting the title of Ann Beale, and for supplying proof of notice to them of the assignment, it would be extremely unjust and unfair. It would be, in fact, catching them in what they never intended, namely, to guarantee this fund against all incumbrances, known or unknown; and it appears to me that what had taken place shews that it was not the intention of the purchasers, or of the trustees (Giles and Sheppard), that such should be the effect of their joining, because in the requisitions that were sent by the purchasers' solicitor to the vendor's solicitor, the second requisition was, "that it should be shewn that the 4,300*l.* is now standing in the names of the executors, or the representatives of the surviving executor, and is held by them only to answer the annuities given by the will, and subject thereto for Mrs. Beale." Now, did that requisition mean that it should be shewn that this stock belonged to Mrs. Beale, without any incumbrance whatever upon it? No such thing. And this is shewn by the fifth requisition:—"We should have a letter from the trustees, that they have not notice of any incumbrance upon the fund proposed for sale." So that they considered that the shewing that Mrs. Beale was entitled did not at all involve the shewing that there were no incumbrances, because they require a letter from the trustees to say, not that there are no incumbrances, but simply, what alone they could be called upon to say, that they had not themselves had notice of any incumbrance. Then, in answer to this requisition, it is said, you shall have such a document as shall satisfy you; and accordingly such a document is sent, by which the executors declare that the 4,300*l.* three per cent. stock, bequeathed by the will of Joachim Hibberd to Ann Beale, subject to the annuities therein mentioned, stands vested in their names, as executors of Joseph Hibberd, who was the surviving executor of the said Joachim Hibberd; and that it was held by them to answer the said annuities given by the said will, and subject thereto for the said Ann Beale. So far, they clearly did not mean to give a guarantie that it was free from all incumbrances, because the very next passage is this:—"Nor have we ever received notice of any incumbrance on the said 4,300*l.* three per cents., except the aforesaid annuities."—"Memorandum.—The legacy duty on the trust-money bequeathed to Mrs. Beale will be payable on the deaths of the annuitants."

Therefore, it appears to me, that it would be most unjust and most unfair to decide that these gentlemen, by what they had done, had in effect given a guarantie against all the incumbrances. I think, however, that the case does not rest upon that ground; but upon this. In order to explain my meaning, I will first suppose that Joseph Hibberd, the survivor of the original executors of the testator, were still living, and that I was not dealing with his representatives; and it appears to me that Joseph Hibberd's duty and that of his co-trustee, Mr. Beale, as long as he lived, was this:—A moiety of the residue is given to the testator's widow for life; and after her death a portion of that moiety, which is to be constituted of the 4,300*l.* stock, is appropriated to pay certain annuities; and subject to those annuities, and to the widow's life interest, the stock is given to Ann Beale; and the whole of the residue, subject to the widow's life interest, is also given to Ann Beale: that is the effect of the will. Now, what would be the consequences when the testator's widow died, as she did, in the year 1835? Ann Beale then, and then only, for the first time, became entitled to the whole moiety of the residue, except the 4,300*l.* stock, which still remained to be appropriated, being the remaining portion of that moiety specifically reserved or appropriated towards payment of the annuities. Supposing that at that time Joseph Hibberd were still living, he would have had, upon the death of the widow, to pay 5,099*l.*, which was all that moiety of the residue, except the 4,300*l.* stock to Ann Beale; and upon paying that to Ann Beale, he would have been bound to have paid the duty to the Government upon that portion, not upon any other portion, but only upon the 5,099*l.* But instead of doing that—instead of waiting until the widow died, when Ann Beale's interest fell into possession in respect to that sum of 5,099*l.*, a few years after the death of the testator, by some arrangement made between Ann Beale and the widow, in which arrangement the trustees concurred—Ann Beale and the widow agree that they will not wait until the death of the widow to have this fund appropriated, but that they should divide it instantly. The duty on that portion was still not payable, of course, until the death of the widow, which happened in 1835; but Joseph Hibberd, the surviving executor, instead of retaining enough to answer the duty, allowed Ann Beale, or Ann Beale and the widow between them, to have the whole of it. What was the effect of that? Why then, of course, Joseph Hibberd made himself liable to the claim of the Stamp Office, whenever the time should arrive at which the duty would be payable. He was then personally liable for it; he might have had or not a claim over against Ann Beale for it; that would depend upon any arrangement between them; but, at all events, he himself became personally liable to Government for the amount of the duty upon that portion of the residue whenever the widow should die. If, then, he had been alive he would have been subject to the claim: what would have been his right, then, with regard to this 4,300*l.* stock? Supposing the period had arrived at which that had also fallen into possession, no doubt he might have had a right between himself and Ann Beale to say, I have handed over to you a portion of your moiety of the residue, without retaining the legacy duty, and I will not hand over this portion to you without retaining the whole of the duty. I apprehend there is no doubt that would have been the right as between Joseph Hibberd and Ann Beale, if that were all. Now, instead of Joseph Hibberd being alive, he had died long before the widow, having, as I have said, dealt with the portion of the residue, so as to have given it all up to Ann Beale, with the concurrence of the widow; and without retaining what was necessary to pay the duty upon that, he made himself, as I have said, personally liable. The present defendants are his executors; they may or may not, for aught I know, be personally liable to the Government; but, at all events, the claim is in effect against them, in the character of executors of Joseph Hibberd, and in that character representing the original testator. I have not heard a word suggested on either side, nor is it necessary for me to express any opinion, whether the claim against them on the part of the Government would be a personal claim against themselves, or whether it would be a claim against them only in the character of executors of Joseph Hibberd, and a claim to be satisfied out of his assets; but, as I understand, Joseph Hibberd did not die insolvent. They received assets of Joseph Hibberd to satisfy his debts, and this duty to the Government undoubtedly had become a debt of his, when it became payable to the Government in the year 1835, on the death of Ann Hibberd, the testator's widow. Now, no doubt, either Joseph Hibberd if he had been living, or the executors of Joseph, he being dead, would have a right to say to Ann Beale, or to any person merely claiming under Ann Beale, "You cannot call upon us to give up this 4,300*l.* stock until the duty is paid to us which we have been compelled to pay the Government." I am supposing that the Government had required Joseph Hibberd, in 1835, or his executors, he being dead, to pay the duty on the 5,099*l.*, and they had paid it, what would be their right? This is not a lien or a charge specifically upon the 4,300*l.*; all they could say would be, "We have an equity, now that we have paid the duty to Government, to come upon that 4,300*l.* stock, as between us and Ann Beale, or as between us and the parties claiming through Ann Beale." Then comes the effect of the deed they executed. What, I have said, would be the effect, supposing Ann Beale had made an assignment to these purchasers without any intervention of the executors? But what do the executors do? The executors, by joining in the deed, although I cannot come to the conclusion that they did, thereby give a guarantie against incumbrances, certainly do say this, that Ann Beale is entitled to this fund, and that they do not know of any incumbrances. Now, it will be observed, that the right to set up the equity against the 4,300*l.* on the part of the executors of Joseph Hibberd accrued when the widow died in 1835, when the duty on the 5,099*l.* became payable to Government. Then their right accrued, but they would have no right of retention until they had made the payment to Government, which they have not done to this hour; they gave a bond that they would pay, but they have not actually paid. Then having joined in the deed for the purpose of admitting Ann Beale's title to the fund, and having stated that they themselves knew of no incumbrance, although it does not amount to a guarantie that there is no incumbrance unknown, it appears to me to amount to this, that they cannot after that set up as against that fund, that is, as against the persons who are purchasing upon the faith of that, in their own right and for their own benefit, a charge or claim upon that fund. They have joined in this deed, upon the faith of which the Reversionary Interest Society has purchased this reversionary interest. Can they, after joining in that for the purpose of representing that the vendor had a right to sell it, afterwards say, now events have happened which give us a right to set up an equity of our own? It appears to me that they cannot. It would be quite inconsistent with principle, and, indeed, with the authorities, to allow them to set up an equity of their own, which although they did not know of it, and it did not exist, in fact, at that time, they might have known would exist whenever they paid the duty upon the 5,099*l.* I take it for granted that they were ignorant about the duty not having been paid. I dare say neither party knew exactly how the fact was; they did not tell anybody further to investigate it, they took it for granted that what ought to have been done was done; they knew nothing about the disposition which had taken place so many years before, and the effect is, that now the executors, either in their character of executors or in their own persons, are liable to Government for this; and how can they say, if we pay that duty to the Government, or the amount of that duty, we will now, notwithstanding our having joined in that deed, set up against this very fund an equity in our own favour? It appears to me that upon that ground, not upon the ground of guarantie, the plaintiffs have a right to insist that the executors cannot retain the fund themselves, merely on the ground of their right to pay out of it anything they may have to pay to the Government for the duty.

Then comes another question, quite irrespective of that, namely, the construction of the will; in other words, whether I can now decide in favour of the plaintiff without having any other person before the Court. Now, that depends upon the construction of this will, which is couched in such terms as not to make the matter very clear. It is suggested that there may be four different persons, or classes of persons claiming as against the right set up by the plaintiff. It is first suggested that those three annuities, which are given by this will, are so given as that Louisa Webb is entitled to all those three annuities; in other words, that as each annuity dropped there was a survivorship of that annuity to the two survivors; and then when the second dropped the third survivor would take all the three annuities: at least, that it is questionable. The second is, supposing that not to be so, still the annuities given are so given as that although they did not survive upon the death of one they did terminate upon the death of one; and that upon the death of one his executors are entitled to his annuity so long as the annuity would last, which they say is, until the fund is given over; so that it is suggested that the representatives of the deceased annuitants would be necessary parties.

The third suggestion is this, that neither the one nor the other of these may be right, that is, that neither was there survivorship of the annuities nor did the annuities continue for the benefit of the executors of the deceased annuitants, but that Robert Samuel was entitled to all the dividends, including all the annuities that dropped, and that therefore his representative must be here. And the fourth suggestion is, that neither of the first three alternatives is the real construction, but that this being a portion of the residue, that is, the intermediate payment of those dividends or annuities being a portion of the residue, it is undisposed of, and the next-of-kin of the testator ought to be here in order to discuss the matter.

Now, the gift is in very peculiar terms. First of all, there is a direction that the dividends of the stock in question, which amount to 129*l.* a year, were to be in trust to pay to three persons, James, Patience and Susannah, a clear annuity of 20*l.* sterling each during their lives, and the remainder of the dividends the testator directed to be paid to his nephew, Robert Samuel Hibberd, since deceased, during his life. Now, stopping there, there is no doubt that each of those three persons, James, Patience and Susannah, would have a life annuity during his or her respective life, and during the life of Robert Samuel he would have all the surplus, including what might have dropped in the shape of annuity, that is, he took the whole surplus, liable only to pay the current annuities. That, I think, is clear. The next gift raises the question—"That, as and when James, Patience and Susannah should depart this life, then he directs that the three several annuities of 20*l.* each should devolve," therefore contemplating that those were continuing annuities, although it is rather a question of words than of substance—that he considers that those annuities were still to continue, not for the benefit of the representatives of the deceased annuitant, but for the purpose which he now declares, that as and when James, Patience and Susannah should depart this life, then the three several annuities of 20*l.* should devolve and be paid to Louisa, Robert Samuel and Elizabeth. Stopping there for a moment, it is a gift of three annuities to three persons, without saying anything about tenancy in common, but in words which would import joint tenancy. It is given to the three and there is nothing to import what the portion of the three annuitants is to be. But, inasmuch as there is no gift over until the death of the survivor, I should say that if it stopped there, there would be a strong ground for arguing that it was a gift to three persons during the life of the three, and the survivor and survivors, to continue so long as that. But it goes on thus:—"The eldest," that is, the eldest person of the second class, of them taking the first annuity that should fall, so that when one annuity falls,—say Susannah's, as she died first—she was one of the first class of annuitants when she died,—then the eldest of the three others—who appears to have been Louisa—Louisa then would take that annuity, and the others in like manner, by seniority. It appears to me that entirely excludes the idea of joint tenancy, because no one annuity is given to all the three, but one annuity is given to one of the three, and another annuity is given to another of the three, and so on. So far I clearly feel that there is no joint tenancy. Then, what is there to give the annuity over, I mean by survivorship, if there be no joint tenancy? I confess I do not see any words which would import that the annuity would survive to the other. I see nothing that would lead me to that supposition. But then comes the question, what is there to determine the annuity? I will take Robert Samuel, who took one of the annuities. On the death of Robert Samuel, what became of his annuity? What is there to determine it? There is nothing really in language to determine it, and it appears to me, therefore, that it is a question I ought not to determine in the absence of the representative of Robert Samuel.

Then, with regard to the question as to the next-of-kin, I really think it is quite clear that they cannot be entitled. It appears to me that either the representatives of the deceased annuitant are entitled or that Robert Samuel, that is, the representative of Robert Samuel, would be entitled, or else it belongs to Ann Beale, or to those claiming under her. Therefore, what I ought to require is, that you should, within a certain time, either get the concurrence of the representative of Robert Samuel to appear and consent upon such terms as you may be able to make with him, or bring him here adversely, so as to have the question decided.

Dec. 15, 22; } PETERS v. RULE.

Practice—Issue—The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858—21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, having expressly left it to the Court to say, whether the trial of a question of fact shall take place before a jury at common law, before a jury in Chancery, or before the Court without a jury, this Court will not at present, unless both parties concur in the application, or there is some special reason of delay, expense or otherwise, direct the trial to be before itself, the confidence of either suitor in the method established by long habit being a circumstance which ought to turn the scale, especially on the first experiment of a different system being required to be made.

Semble—The legislature did not contemplate the trial of issues before this Court as a general rule.

In this case, which involved a question of legitimacy, Mr. E. F. Smith applied for an issue to be tried at law.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Wickens, Mr. Dickinson and Mr. J. H. Palmer, for various parties, referred to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, enabling the Court itself to summon a jury for the purpose of trying questions of fact, and objected that if such questions still continued to be sent for trial at Nisi Prius, the act would be inoperative.

Jan. 15. — WOOD, V.C. having consulted the other Judges of the Court, stated that he had decided to grant the application for an issue to be tried at law.

Jan. 20.—Some misunderstanding having occurred as to the expressions which fell from the Vice Chancellor, in giving judgment in this case, his Honour this morning read the following written statement:—"I have had laid before me, at the request (as I understand) of several gentlemen of the Bar, a printed statement of observations supposed to have fallen from me in a recent case, in which I declined directing an issue to be tried before a jury in this court. It has been intimated to me, I need scarcely say as much to my surprise as my regret, that such supposed statement has occasioned pain to the gentlemen usually practising in the courts of equity rather than in the courts of common law. The statement is as follows, in its printed form :—

“ ‘ PETERS v. RULE.

“ ‘ In this case there had been a motion for an issue to be tried before his Honour by a jury, under the provisions of the act of last session (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), enabling the Court of Chancery to summon a jury and decide issues of fact without the necessity of sending the suitors to a court of common law. In the course of Saturday his Honour mentioned incidentally that after consultation with the other Judges of the Court of Chancery, it had been determined that in cases where an issue was asked for the matter would be sent to a court of common law for trial if either party desired it, it being considered that from the greater experience of gentlemen practising at the common-law bar in cross-examination of witnesses and the conduct of jury cases such a course would be preferred.’

“ It appears to have been considered as expressing an opinion on the part of all the Judges of the Court of Chancery, that the gentlemen of the Bar practising in these courts are not competent to conduct cases before a jury. Perhaps such an interpretation of the words I have read may be the more natural one. If it be, I can only express my extreme regret that I can have been supposed to have uttered any expressions so entirely contrary to my sentiments; and I have lost no time in first correcting a very considerable error in the printed statement of what I am supposed to have said, and then in explaining more fully the short intimation (which alone occurred to me at the time as necessary to be given) of my reasons for sending the particular case before me to trial before a court of common law. First, then, I am certain that, whatever opinion was expressed by myself, I did not attribute to the other Judges of the Court any participation in it. On this point, I am sure that I intended to be, and that I was, very careful. I had before me a case in which some persons of comparatively small means were claiming the property of an intestate who was by the Crown alleged to have been illegitimate. Both the claimants and the Crown agreed that it was a matter to be tried before a jury. The Solicitor General, for the Crown, pressed for the trial of the issue before this Court. The counsel for the claimants pressed for a trial before a Court of common law, alleging that counsel of the common-law bar had been retained, that such counsel were more experienced in the cross-examination of witnesses, and that much would depend on such cross-examination. At the hearing of the application, I stated that I should soon have an opportunity of consulting with the other Judges of the Court on the general question of the trial of issues directed by this Court. On Saturday last, I stated that I had consulted with the other Judges of the Court, and had found that it was extremely difficult to lay down any general rule as to whether a case should be tried by this Court or by a court of common law; but that I had come to the conclusion, that as the two parties did not concur in desiring the issue to be tried by this Court, and one party desired that it should be tried before a court of common law, on the ground of the greater experience of the counsel in those courts in cross-examination, I thought it was not right in such a case to order the trial to be in this court, and should not be disposed to do so in any case, unless both parties concurred in the request, without special grounds. Of the first part of the above statements I am certain—namely, that in which I make the expression of opinion my own alone, and not that of any other Judge. As to the second part, I cannot be so certain of the expressions as I am of the opinion which I intended to express. It never having occurred to me that what I said could be misconstrued, no special pains were taken to avoid misinterpretation. I found one party expressing more confidence in a trial before a court of common law, for the reason which he assigned of the greater experience in trials before a jury of the gentlemen practising in the courts of common law, and what I meant to express was, that if such were the wish of that party, I did not think it desirable that either party in the case before me should be compelled to a new mode of trial. I do not believe that I expressed—I certainly did not intend to express—any concurrence in the view of the party—viz. that his case would be better tried before a Court of common law. I gave his reason, and, unquestionably, had he alleged the inexperience of the Judges of this Court in the conduct of the trial of cases before a jury, I should have repeated that reason also, and have said that I thought any person honestly entertaining that view ought not to be compelled to have the cases tried before this Court, unless some special reason as to delay or expense had occurred, as to which no question whatever arose in the case before me. It is a fact that the Judges of the Court have not as yet had such experience. It is a fact, I conceive, that most of the gentlemen practising in this court have not yet had such experience. The legislature has expressly left it to the Court to say, whether the trial shall take place before a jury at common law, before a jury in Chancery, or before the Court without a jury. I do not find in the act any indication of a preference. The legislature must be taken to have intimated that there are some cases in which the Court may find it more expedient to try the case itself. Probably, regard being had to the amount of business transacted by the Court, it was not contemplated that the other suitors should be delayed by the trial of issues as a general rule before the Court. Probably, also, it was thought that in many cases it would be more expedient to try them in the country. As a Judge of the Court I have, and ought to have, every disposition to give full effect to every provision of the legislature for improving the administration of justice. As regards the particular question of the expediency of conferring on this Court a power to summon a jury and to try issues itself I gave my hearty assent, as a member of the commission issued for inquiring into the proceedings of this Court, to a recommendation that such a power should be conferred; but it appears to me very inexpedient, and calculated to create dissatisfaction in the suitors, if in the administration of justice, without any special reason founded on the saving of delay or expense, or, in fact, any special reason whatever, the Court were to force the suitor to adopt the new mode of trial. I have ever considered, that next to a correct decision, the most important object a Judge can keep in view is, that the suitor should be satisfied that his case has been carefully attended to. In the Chancery Amendment Act, an option is expressly given to either party with reference to taking the evidence on affidavit or orally. The choice of the mode of trial by the act of last session is not given to either party, but a discretion is left to the Court. It was felt, as I have said, by all the Judges, that any definite rule would be extremely difficult. The legislature probably felt the same difficulty. When both parties concur there can be no doubt; but I have come, whether erroneously or not, to the fixed conclusion, that where there is no special reason of delay, expense or otherwise, the consideration of the confidence of either suitor in the method established by long habit is a circumstance which ought to turn the scale, especially on the first experiment of a different system being required to be made. This and no more did I intend to express. I have never intended to intimate any concurrence in the view of the suitor who prefers the old method, nor in the reasons of the particular suitor in the case before me for that preference. I may now with propriety state, that I do not concur either in the one or the other. Experience will, no doubt, be readily acquired, when it shall become necessary to try issues before this Court, both by the Bar and by the Judge; and at the same time they will both be free from some evils which, from long-established habits, have, in my own opinion, grown up and been fostered in the present customary method of examining and cross-examining witnesses. But upon that subject I need scarcely dwell further. I cannot conclude without remarking that, however painful it may be to me to find that I could possibly be so little understood by any gentleman of the bar as to allow a suspicion even of my intending to treat disrespectfully a body to which I had, I hoped, on every occasion evinced not only cordial esteem, but deep gratitude for their assistance, yet I have sincerely to thank those, whose frankness has conveyed to me the existence of such a feeling, for this opportunity of endeavouring at least to remove it."

 LORDS JUSTICES. } HELLING v. LUMLEY.
 Dec. 21.

Contract—Specific Performance—Forfeiture.

W, the lessee of the Opera House, assigned his lease, which contained a covenant for renewal, to a purchaser, reserving box No. 124 during the term mentioned in the lease, and the successive terms to be granted under the covenant for renewal, for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns, or his or their nominees. The assignee, at the expiration of the lease, took a renewal under the covenant from the landlord, which, like the original lease, contained a condition prohibiting the lessee from leasing any boxes, except certain specified boxes to the number of forty-one, not including box No. 124, for a longer term than from year to year. The specified forty-one boxes the lessee was allowed to deal with without restriction. W's interest in box No. 124 afterwards became vested in H, for the benefit of W's creditors. H, having filed his bill in this court for a declaration that he was entitled to the possession of box No. 124, as against the assignee of the lease, or to compensation in money for the same, one of the Vice Chancellors decided that the plaintiff was entitled to such declaration; and that it was no defence to the bill to say that, inasmuch as the assignee of the lease had disposed of the forty-one boxes specified in the renewed lease, a decree in the terms of the prayer of the bill would, in effect, compel him to dispose of more than such forty-one specified boxes, and therefore render him liable to a forfeiture of the lease; and, on appeal,—Held, affirming that decision, that, the defendant refusing to make compensation in money or otherwise, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief sought.

When a defendant resists specific performance of a contract on the ground that he would thereby incur a forfeiture, the Court will look at the circumstance which gave rise to the danger of forfeiture, and if it arise out of the defendant's own acts subsequent to the contract, it will decree specific performance, and leave the defendant open to the consequences of his acts.

The facts of this case, as they appeared from the plaintiff's bill, were as follow:—In September 1816, Edmund Waters became the purchaser of leasehold premises in the Haymarket, constituting the Opera House, at a sale thereof, under the direction of the Court of Chancery, in a suit of Waters v. Taylor. One portion of the leasehold premises thus sold was vested in William Taylor, the defendant in the said suit, for the residue then to come of a legal term of forty-eight years therein, demised to him by an indenture of lease, dated the 1st of August 1792, and the other portion of such premises was also vested in the said William Taylor, for the residue of a term of twenty-two years therein, demised to him by another indenture, also dated the 1st of August 1792.

By articles of agreement dated the 25th of August 1821, reciting the above-mentioned indentures of lease to W. Taylor, a contract was entered into by the duly authorized agent of Edmund Waters, for the sale of all the above-mentioned leasehold premises to Abraham Henry Chambers, for the sum of 80,000*l.*, but subject, inter alia, to the right and interest of the several lessees and proprietors of the several boxes of the Opera House, and lettered as therein mentioned, and also subject "to the right of possession of the said Edmund Waters, his executors, administrators and assigns, to the box numbered 124, hitherto usually occupied by him, the said Edmund Waters, on the east side of the theatre, or his or their nominees, not exceeding in number six persons nightly, during the remainder of the said several terms granted by the hereinbefore-mentioned indentures of lease, and of the terms covenanted by the said indentures of lease to be granted." The contract contained a covenant by the agent of Edmund Waters, on behalf of his principal, that he, the said Edmund Waters, his executors or administrators, should and would procure and obtain an assignment of the premises under the sale made by the order of the Court (which premises, and the residue of the respective terms therein, were then still remaining vested in the said William Taylor), and procure, at his and their own costs and charges, renewals of the two several leases therein-before mentioned, for the several terms of fifty-one years and sixty-six years, to commence from the expiration of the then existing leases, in pursuance of the covenants for renewal contained in the same several indentures of lease, and with the same privileges and liberties to the lessee as therein respectively contained.

By an indenture, dated the 15th of March 1823, Edmund Waters sold and assigned to Henry Winchester all that the said Opera House, and all buildings belonging thereto or occupied therewith; the same Opera House and buildings being held for the unexpired residue of two several terms of forty-eight years and twenty-two years, created by two several indentures of lease, dated respectively the 1st of August 1792, and renewable on the respective expirations thereof, for the respective further terms of fifty-one years and sixty-six years; to hold the same Opera House and buildings, and all other the leasehold property assigned for the residue of the said several terms of years unexpired, subject to the yearly reserved rents, and to the reservations and agreements in the several original indentures of lease thereof reserved and contained, and on the lessee's part to be observed, unto the said Henry Winchester, his executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely, or for the right and interest of the said Edmund Waters therein, upon trust that he, the said Henry Winchester, should sell and dispose of the same property and effects.

By another indenture of even date, made between Edmund Waters of the first part, Henry Winchester of the second part, and the several persons creditors of the said Edmund Waters of the third part, after reciting the said indenture of even date, it was witnessed that Henry Winchester, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, should stand possessed of the money to arise by the sale of the property thereby assigned, upon trust to apply the same in payment of the debts owing by Edmund Waters to his creditors, and to pay the surplus, if any, to Edmund Waters, his executors, administrators or assigns.

Henry Winchester, acting in execution of the trusts of these two indentures of the 15th of March 1823, entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said opera-box, numbered 124, through his solicitor, and continued in such receipt until his death in 1838. After his death the same solicitor, who also acted as the solicitor of Edmund Waters until his death in 1839, continued to receive the said rents and profits of the said box, numbered 124, to the year 1850 inclusive, and applied the same towards payment of a large balance due to him on account partly of costs incurred by Edmund Waters and Henry Winchester, and partly of advances made to Edmund Waters. In February 1823 Abraham Henry Chambers instituted the suit Chambers v. Waters, in this court, against Edmund Waters and William Taylor, for a specific performance of the contract of the 25th of August 1821. This suit was afterwards revived against the legal personal representatives of William Taylor, then deceased, and in February 1826, on the occasion of the bankruptcy of Chambers, his assignees were made parties to the suit by supplemental bill. By the decree in these suits, dated the 21st of May 1829, it was declared that Edmund Waters ought specifically to perform the said agreement of the 25th of August 1821, and that Abraham Henry Chambers became, by virtue of such agreement, the purchaser of the leasehold premises therein comprised, called The King's Theatre, or Opera House, in the Haymarket, not only as against the said Edmund Waters, but also as standing in the place of Edmund Waters against William Taylor, and that the assignees were entitled to the benefit of the agreement in the place of Chambers, and that Chambers or his assignees was or were entitled to receive the rents and profits arising from the said leasehold premises comprised in the agreement, from the 29th of September 1820; and it was ordered that Edmund Waters should procure a renewal of the said two leases in the agreement mentioned, or otherwise that the assignees should be at liberty to procure a renewal of the said two leases, and be permitted to retain the sums of money they might pay for such renewal and in respect of the costs thereof, out of the purchase-money to be paid by Chambers for the said Opera House, and the property and effects appertaining thereto, for the specific performance of the agreement. That decree was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor on the 6th of July 1833 (1).

On the 6th of November 1840, that suit was revived against the administrator of Edmund Waters, then deceased. The administrator subsequently appealed to the House of Lords against the said decrees and orders; but they were affirmed by the House on the 5th of September 1844. On the 13th of July 1853 those suits were finally disposed of, and an order made, whereby the balance found due from the estate of Edmund Waters to the estate of Chambers, in respect of the contract of the 25th of August 1821, was ordered to be paid, with subsequent interest and costs. Notwithstanding the pendency of the litigation above mentioned, Abraham Henry Chambers, soon after the contract of the 25th of August 1821, entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the Opera House by virtue of such contract, and he or his assignees continued in such receipt to the year 1845, during the whole of which period he or they paid the rents and profits of the said box, numbered 124, to, or permitted them to be received by the solicitor and agent of Henry Winchester, and by virtue of the exception or reservation of the said box, which was contained in the contract of the 25th of August 1821. In the year 1845 the assignees of Chambers sold the Opera House to Benjamin Lumley for the then residue of the terms of years subsisting therein, in equity, by virtue of the covenants for renewal contained in the indentures of lease mentioned in the contract of the 25th of August 1821, the terms of years granted by such indentures having then expired; and by the contract for such sale it was provided, that the said sale was subject to such rights to boxes as the said premises were then subject to, as against the assignees of Chambers, under the agreement of the 25th of August 1821. In completion of this contract Benjamin Lumley, by the direction of the assignees of Chambers, and by virtue of the covenants for renewal contained in the expired lease of the Opera House, obtained a renewed lease of the premises to be granted to him, for the term of years therein mentioned, by indenture of the 10th of July 1845, whereby the lessee was restrained, in the same terms as he had been in the original lease, from disposing of boxes for more than one year, except forty-one boxes, to be selected by him within five years, which he was to be at liberty to dispose of at pleasure; but provision was thereby made for his acquiring, with the assent of the lessors, and by exchange or otherwise, the right of disposing of any other boxes. By an order made on the 16th of February 1855, in a suit (Wyatt v. Hazlewood) instituted in 1854, for further carrying into effect the trusts of the indentures of the 15th of March 1823, Joseph Norris Helling was appointed a trustee of the lands, messuages and premises comprised in the said indentures of the 15th of March 1823, in substitution of Henry Winchester, deceased.

By an order made in that suit, on the 19th of March 1856, it was ordered that the said J. N. Helling should be at liberty to take such proceedings in equity or at law as he might be advised for the recovery of the possession of the box numbered 124, with the rents and profits thereof in arrear and unpaid.

By indenture, dated the 5th of May 1856, Benjamin Lumley, for the considerations therein mentioned, assigned his said lease of the Opera House to Lord Ward for the residue of the term therein.

The bill in the present suit was then filed by the said J. N. Helling, as plaintiff, against Lumley and Lord Ward, as defendants, alleging that they, the said defendants, respectively had, at the time of their respective purchases of the said lease of the Opera House, notice of the contract of the 25th of August 1821, which constituted the only title of the assignees of Chambers, and of the reservation of the said box, numbered 124, by such contract, and of the fact that the solicitor of Henry Winchester was, down to 1850, in the receipt of the rents and profits of the said box by virtue of such reservation, and that accordingly Lumley had paid to such solicitor the rents and profits of the said box from the time of his purchase up to 1850. Since that he, as well as Lord Ward, since the assignment to him of the said lease of the Opera House by Lumley, had refused to permit the rents and profits of the said box, numbered 124, to be received by any person under the said reservation.

The bill also stated that the defendant Lumley had still some interest in the said Opera House and managed the same, and that the defendants alleged that the defendant Benjamin Lumley selected within the said five years mentioned in the renewed lease which had been granted to him, forty-one boxes to dispose of, not including the box numbered 124, and that they could not now let the plaintiff have that box without forfeiting the said lease, whereas the plaintiff charged that the defendants could, by purchase or exchange, obtain liberty to give up the said box to the plaintiff, or, at all events, ought to compensate the plaintiff for the same.

The bill prayed that it might be declared that the plaintiff, as the trustee of the indenture of the 15th of March 1823, was entitled to the said box numbered 124 in the Opera House, or, at all events, to an equivalent in money or otherwise, for the same, for the residue of the renewed term of years granted by the indenture of the 10th of July 1845, pursuant to the covenant for renewal mentioned in the contract of the 25th of August 1821, and to sell or let the same box, or an equivalent for the same accordingly.

The bill also prayed for an account of the rents and profits of the said box, and payment of the balance due, with interest, to the plaintiff; and that, in taking the account, the defendants might be charged with a rent for the said box on occasions when they had gratuitously given the use thereof.

The bill also prayed for an injunction against letting and selling, or disposing of or dealing with the box, and from assigning or underletting or dealing with the Opera House, except subject to the plaintiff's right to the box, and for a receiver of the rents and profits; and in case the said box could not be given up to the plaintiff for the residue of the term without forfeiting the said term, that it might be declared that the defendants were equitably liable to compensate the plaintiff for the same by another box or a money payment, and that such compensation might be decreed accordingly.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. W. H. Bagshawe appeared for the plaintiff, and cited—

Bennett v. Colley, 5 Sim. 181; s. c. 2 Myl. & K. 225.

Mr. Malins and Mr. C. M. Roupell, for the defendant Lumley, said that a decree for specific performance would be tantamount to an order upon Mr. Lumley to dispose of box 124, in addition to the forty-one boxes already selected and disposed of by him in exercise of the privilege conferred upon him in the renewed lease. This would at once enable the lessor to put in force the power of re-entry which he had under the lease, if Mr. Lumley disposed of more than such forty-one boxes. A forfeiture of the lease would thus be occasioned which would be attended with the loss to the plaintiff of the right which he claimed. That being so, they submitted that the Court would not decree a specific performance, but would leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law.—

Sainsbury v. Jones, 5 Myl. & Cr. 1.

STUART, V.C. said, that the bill, though, in a sense, a bill for specific performance, might be more properly described thus: it was a bill by a person seeking the assistance of the Court to preserve his possession of a right which could only be kept from him by a violation of contract on the part of the defendants. In such a case the right, if the assertion of it did not involve the violation of any principle of law, would, when proved, be protected by the decree of the Court. The right appeared to be reserved by the agreement of August 1821, in terms which were perfectly clear and effectual for the purpose; and the legality of such reservation was impeached solely by reference to the acts of those under whom the defendants claimed. The reservation was of a right to the box numbered 124 to Edmund Waters, his executors, administrators or assigns. There was nothing illegal in the nature of the right, and the reservation of it being in language perfectly clear, the plaintiff must be taken to have shewn a prima facie title under the deed of 1821 to the benefit of such reservation of right. That Chambers, who agreed to the reservation, and all those who claimed under him were bound by it, was perfectly clear. The defendants, however, urged, by way of defence to the claim of the plaintiff, that, by the acts of those claiming under Chambers, the property to which Chambers became entitled under the agreement of 1821 had been put into such a position that, if the Court were to decree the performance of the stipulation, it would put the defendants in peril of losing all which the contract of 1821 gave them, and that such a decree would eventually result in the loss to the plaintiff of that right which he now asserted. The decree of the House of Lords in the suit of Chambers v. Waters, proceeding upon the submission of the plaintiff therein to perform all the stipulations on his part in the agreement, gave to those claiming under Chambers all the Opera House, reserving to Waters, and to those claiming under him, that which had been specifically reserved. The terms of the reservation in the agreement of August 1821 were to apply, not only to the then existing lease, since expired, but also to the renewed lease obtained under the covenant contained in the leases forming the subject of the sale by such agreement, and were equally binding upon the lessee under such renewed lease. In that state of things, the right of the plaintiff would appear free from doubt. It was argued, however, by the defendants that, since the renewed lease (which renewed lease, as well as the original lease, contained a prohibition to the lessees, under pain of forfeiture, against disposing of or alienating for a longer term than one season more boxes than the number of forty-one), the defendants or their predecessors in right claiming under Chambers, had disposed of forty-one boxes, and that this suit was one to compel them to dispose of one more box, making forty-two; and if they did so, it was said that the alienation of more than the forty-one boxes would involve the forfeiture of the whole lease. It was not, however, for those who had entered into a contract of this kind to say that they had done acts which made it impossible for them to perform their contract. In Fonblanque's Treatise on Equity, b. 1. c. 4. s. 3, it was said that, "Even at law a man is bound to do all that lies in his power; so that if part of the agreement becomes impossible by the act of God, that does not discharge the rest, although it were in the disjunctive, and he is deprived of his election. So if the whole were at first impossible, yet if it may become possible before he is compelled to do it, it is not void; for the law respecteth the right of possibility, and will have nothing to be void that by possibility may be made good." In the present case there was no impossibility, but the defendants said that, although it was possible it would be dangerous to perform the contract, as the defendants might thereby incur the forfeiture of their whole lease; and Wedgwood v. Adams, and other cases, were cited to shew that, under such circumstances, the Court would refuse to decree specific performance. The doctrine upon that subject was clearly and accurately laid down in that valuable treatise, the Doctrine of Equity, by the late Mr. John Adams. There, after referring to specific performance, and stating that it must be really important to the plaintiff and not oppressive to the defendant, the author proceeded to say, p. 83, "If its importance to the plaintiff be shewn, a material step is gained towards obtaining a decree. But the establishment of this fact is not conclusive; for, however important specific performance may be to the plaintiff, yet he has, at all events, another remedy, by damages at law; and it is therefore open to the defendant to contend that a wrong would be inflicted on him, by going beyond the ordinary remedy, greater than would be inflicted on the plaintiff by refusing to interpose." Now, would it, in the present case, be inflicting a greater wrong upon the defendants than upon the plaintiff to protect the right which the plaintiff had asserted and proved? The wrong and injury to the defendants were merely in apprehension; but the wrong and injury to the plaintiff were of the most glaring kind, for it was clear he would be deprived of that very thing to which he was entitled, and it would be left in the possession of the person who had stipulated that it should belong to the plaintiff. A more gross and flagrant violation of justice could hardly be imagined, and nothing but impossibility or illegality could justify the Court in refusing specific performance. As to forfeiture, that was merely in apprehension; but upon what that apprehension was founded did not so clearly appear, for it was not easy to see how the enjoyment of the right claimed by the plaintiff under the terms of this reservation would occasion a forfeiture, or how it could be considered in the light of an alienation at all. The plaintiff was not seeking to have a new title conferred by compelling the defendants to execute a conveyance, but only that they might be prevented by the order of the Court from violating the terms of a clear stipulation into which they had confessedly entered, and by which they had agreed to be bound. Further, the danger they apprehended, if worth attention, was of their own creation. The risk of forfeiture had been created by the deliberate act of the defendants themselves, having at the time full notice of the stipulation by which they were bound. Upon the whole, he (the Vice Chancellor) was of opinion that the plaintiff had established a case for the protection of his right, and for a declaration by the Court for that purpose.

The declaration would be that, as against the defendants, the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the reservation of the box numbered 124, according to the stipulations in the deed of agreement of the 25th of August 1821 in the pleadings mentioned; and that the defendants, and all persons claiming under them, were bound to give the plaintiff and his nominees the occupation of such box, according to the terms of the said reservation, and decree the same accordingly; and there would be an order for an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants or agents, from taking any step or doing any act which might obstruct the plaintiff and his nominees from occupying and enjoying the box numbered 124, according to the terms of the reservation; and an order that the defendants do pay to the plaintiff the costs, after taxation, of this suit. The decree to be without prejudice to any right which the plaintiff, or any person claiming under him, should assert to compensation, in case it should appear that the benefit and enjoyment of the said box numbered 124, pursuant to the said reservation, should have been lost through the acts of the defendants, or either of them, with liberty to apply; and for an account of all monies received by the defendant Lumley in respect of the rents and profits of this box.

Dec. 21.—From this decision the defendants severally appealed.

The same counsel appeared for the parties.

In addition to the cases cited on behalf of the defendant Lord Ward, his counsel referred to the following:—

Johnson v. the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 914; s.c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 291.

Wedgwood v. Adams, 6 Beav. 600.

Croft v. Lumley, 4 Jur. N.S. 903; s.c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 321.

During the argument Mr. Reashaw read to the Court the recitals in the lease of 1845, which are commented on in the judgment.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER asked whether the defendant Mr. Lumley was willing to make compensation in money or otherwise to the plaintiff for the loss of the box No. 124.

Counsel for Mr. Lumley answered in the negative.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This bill, which is filed by a trustee, under the deed of the 15th of March 1823, claims a right to the possession or occupation of the box, No. 124, in the Opera House, "or, at all events, to an equivalent in money or otherwise for the same, for the residue of the reserved term of years granted by the lease of the 10th of July 1845, pursuant to the covenant or covenants for renewal mentioned or referred to in the contract of the 25th of August 1821, and to sell or let the box, or an equivalent for the same accordingly." Then it prays that an account may be taken of the rents and profits of that box which have been received by the defendant Lumley, and seeks to enforce the right of possession and occupation of the box by an injunction to be granted by the Court to restrain the defendants, Mr. Lumley and Lord Ward, from otherwise dealing with the box contrary to the agreement between the parties. The case arises thus :—In 1792 there was a lease of the Opera House granted to Mr. Taylor (under which, in the first place, Mr. Waters, and subsequently the plaintiff became entitled), in which certain specified boxes, including No. 124, were prohibited from being leased for any term exceeding from season to season or from year to year. The lessee was to be entitled to let forty-one specified boxes, in which No. 124 was not included, without any such restriction. That lease having become vested in Mr. Waters, and there being also covenants for renewal contained in the original lease, Mr. Waters, on the 25th of August 1821, contracted to sell to Mr. Chambers the interest in the lease, and also the renewed terms. And in that contract there was contained a reservation in these terms :—"Subject to the right of possession of the said Edmund Waters, his executors, administrators and assigns, to the box No. 124, hitherto usually occupied by him, the said Edmund Waters, on the east side of the theatre, or his or their nominees, not exceeding in number six persons nightly during the remainder of the said several terms granted by the hereinbefore mentioned indenture of lease and the terms covenanted by the said indenture to be granted." So that it was reserved to Waters on the purchase by Chambers for 80,000*l.*, and also he was to have the right of possession of this box, No. 124, to him and his nominees during the term, and during any renewed term to be granted under that lease. Waters having that interest, afterwards, by the deed under which the plaintiff has now become a trustee, the deed of the 15th of March 1823, assigned all his interest in the Opera House to Mr. Alderman Winchester in trust for his creditors. At the hearing of the cause the Vice Chancellor was clearly of opinion that, as against the defendants, Mr. Lumley and Lord Ward, the plaintiff, the trustee under the deed, was entitled to the benefit of the reservation of the box No. 124, according to the stipulations of the deed of agreement of the 25th of August 1821, and that the defendants, Mr. Lumley and Lord Ward, and all persons claiming under them, are bound to give to the plaintiff and his nominees the occupation of it, according to the terms of that reservation. This decree granted an injunction to restrain them from interfering with the rights which the plaintiff was declared to be entitled to, and an account against Mr. Lumley of what has been received of the rents and profits of this box, and with a direction as to the payment of the costs of the suit, and a declaration that the decree is without prejudice to any right which the plaintiff would be entitled to in the event of the agreement not being carried into effect, and this appeal is from that decree.

Now, first, it is said that, if the Court enforces a specific performance of this agreement, the consequence will be a forfeiture of the lease, under which the landlord will be entitled to re-enter. No doubt Courts of equity do not in general grant a specific performance of an agreement on which forfeiture will be the consequence. But when parties set up the consequence of forfeiture as against the right to a specific performance, the Court must be well satisfied, as I apprehend, that forfeiture would follow upon an agreement being decreed to be specifically performed. And I think also the Court must look to the fact, by whose act and by whose conduct that forfeiture would be entailed. The Court, I think, would never permit a defendant to put himself in a position of creating a forfeiture under a lease, and then, by virtue of having acquired that position by his own act, turn round and say, "Now you shall not decree specific performance of the agreement, because I, by my act, have enabled the landlord to enter for a forfeiture if that agreement is specifically performed." I think, that is conduct by a defendant which would prevent him setting up the case of forfeiture as an answer to the plaintiff's case for specific performance of the agreement.

Now, how does this case stand in that point of view? The original leases contained a contract that no boxes, except forty-one, which were specified, should be leased otherwise than from year to year, or from season to season. These leases have expired, and we have, therefore, not to deal with any breach of covenant under them. A new lease was granted in the year 1845, and in that new lease, from the recitals of it which have been read to us by Mr. Renshaw, although they do not appear on the pleadings, I collect that forty-one boxes are not in any way specified, and that the right was reserved to Mr. Lumley to deal with any one of the forty-one boxes which he might think fit to deal with, he having the power of selecting which of the boxes in the Opera House he would take as boxes which he might lease otherwise than from year to year or from season to season. In the year 1845, therefore, Mr. Lumley was in this position: he had a right to select the box No. 124 as one of the boxes which he might lease otherwise than from year to year or from season to season, of which he might make an unlimited lease, extending during the duration of his own term. He, therefore, was in the position in which, by selecting box No. 124, he might have enabled himself fully to perform the contract which was contained in the reservation of the deed of the 25th of August 1821. He thinks proper, however, to select other boxes than box No. 124, and then, having made his selection, he says, "Now I cannot carry out the reservation which is stipulated for by the agreement of 1821, because I have made my selection of forty-one other boxes, and if I select No. 124 I shall select forty-two, and not forty-one boxes, as the subjects of alienation beyond the period of from year to year or from season to season." If, therefore, there be any forfeiture likely to arise under the covenants contained in the lease, that forfeiture is created by the act of Mr. Lumley, and not by the act of the plaintiff, or by the contract which was originally entered into by the plaintiff. Now, Mr. Lumley, it is admitted, takes with notice of the reservation which was contained in the agreement of 1821, and he, therefore, must be bound by the reservation; and if he has put it out of his own power to perform that reservation, the consequence which ensues must fall not upon the plaintiff, but upon him, by reason of his own act being the cause that he is unable to perform the agreement, if any consequences would arise from the granting of the lease. I am not, however, by any means satisfied that any performance of the contract which is contained in the reservation will in any way be a ground of forfeiture by the landlord (whose rights we can in no way deal with in this suit), for this contract will quite admit of this interpretation: that the lessee was to be entitled to let anybody occupy this box from night to night, during the several successive seasons, and I do not see anything on the face of the agreement which would prevent that. However, at the same time, if there were anything to prevent it, that prevention arises from the act of Mr. Lumley, and not from the act of the plaintiff. I think, therefore, on the ground first insisted on, that the consequence would be a forfeiture of the lease, the appeal cannot be maintained. Then, it is said, that there was, in truth, no such right existing in Mr. Waters at the time when the agreement was entered into; that the true meaning of this agreement was only to reserve to Mr. Waters such right as he had at the time when the agreement of 1821 was entered into. Now, I think that that argument scarcely requires any answer, for the right which is referred to by the agreement is plainly the right to the possession of that box during the whole of the original and during the whole of the renewed term. Another argument was attempted to be maintained, on this ground: that the intention was simply that Mr. Waters should enjoy permanently the occupation of this box during the terms which are specified in the agreement. The terms of the agreement clearly do not admit of that construction, because it is not only to be occupied by Mr. Waters, but it is to be occupied by his executors, administrators or assigns, or their nominees, not exceeding six persons nightly during the remainder of the term. It is quite clear, therefore, that on the terms of this reservation, Mr. Waters might, if he pleased, have granted to any person a right to enter that box. I do not see anything which restricts the terms on which he could enter, or which would prevent him selling that right if he thought proper so to do. I think, therefore, the two arguments on that point wholly fail. Some argument has been attempted to be raised on the ground of delay, but there has been possession of that property, and enjoyment of it down to 1850. We are here upon a right and interest in real property, and I do not see how it can be said that there is any such waiver or any such delay or any such conduct as could at all displace the right created by that deed, when Mr. Lumley has taken, subject to the right which was thereby created. I think, therefore, that the appeal wholly fails. Undoubtedly we should have been anxious to avoid the possibility of any forfeiture under the lease arising. We should have been anxious to consult the defendants' wishes, if so expressed on that subject, by giving the defendants the right to make compensation, but as they decline to express that wish, the decree must be amended by insisting that "the defendants declining to make the compensation, which is prayed by the bill" (or any other terms expressing that circumstance), the Court declares that as against the defendants, Mr. Lumley and Lord Ward, the plaintiff is entitled in equity to the reservation mentioned. With that exception, I think the decree is right, and that these appeals must be dismissed with costs; at any rate, the appellants must pay the costs, for as we vary the decree, we cannot dismiss the appeals.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The decree will be varied as the Lord Justice has pointed out, but not the less is the cause, although elaborately contested, an undefended cause: not less would a single appeal have been frivolous and vexatious, nor the less are the two appeals before us doubly so. Of course, the appellants must pay the costs.

FULL COURT OF APPEAL. 1858. Nov. 23, 24; Dec. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. 1859. Jan. 22.	}	In re THE ROYAL BRITISH BANK, ex parte NICOL.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Contributory—Authority of Directors—Fraud.

A chartered banking company were empowered to extend their capital by the issue of new shares. A fraudulent report of the state of the affairs of the bank was made by the directors to a general meeting of the company, and by them adopted. The accounts had been audited by auditors appointed by the shareholders. In pursuance of the desire to have new shares taken, the directors issued a circular, which also contained false and fraudulent representations. N, upon the faith of the report and the circular, and also upon the representation of one of the directors, took shares, and received a dividend upon them. He afterwards employed his broker to dispose of the shares. According to the constitution of the company, the assent of the directors to a transfer of shares was necessary, the evidence of which assent was to be an indorsement on the deed of transfer. The broker employed by the bank purchased these shares, giving the name of E. as the purchaser. The transfer to E. was executed in the form which had been furnished at the bank, with E.'s name inserted as purchaser. E. was not aware of this transfer, but he had given authority to the principal manager to use his name in transfers, and he had accepted some transfers in which his name had been so used. The purchase-money for N.'s shares was paid by the bank. The next dividend was treated as part of the assets of the bank, and the shares were subsequently found in the principal manager's possession, and given up by him to the solicitor of the bank as part of their property. The bank having stopped payment, N.'s name was sought to be placed on the list of contributories, and it was held, that N. was not exempted from liability by reason of the false representation in the report and the circular, as the directors were not agents of the company for the purpose of making fraudulent representations, or beyond the scope of their authority as limited by the charter; but that the assent of the directors to the transfer of the shares by N. had been sufficiently shewn, and therefore his name must be removed from the list of contributories.

This was an appeal, by the official manager of the Royal British Bank, from a decision of Kindersley, V.C., removing the name of Mr. William Nicol from the list of contributories.

The Vice Chancellor's chief clerk certified that Mr. Nicol ought to be placed on the list of contributories, on the ground, which was the only one taken before him, that there had been no complete transfer of his shares so as to absolve him from his original liability. Upon the question being brought before Vice Chancellor Kindersley, it was insisted, on the part of Mr. Nicol, that he never could have been liable to contribute as a shareholder, as he had been induced to take his shares by the false and fraudulent representations of the company. The Vice Chancellor, on the latter ground only, and following his own decision in Brockwell's case (1), and without argument, removed Mr. Nicol's name from the list of contributories. The case was brought before the Court of Appeal and argued, both upon the original agreement for shares and also upon the question whether, if Mr. Nicol was originally liable, his liability had not altogether ceased by the transfer he had made.

Mr. Nicol became the proprietor or allottee of twenty shares in the Royal British Bank, on the 8th of March 1855, on the faith, as he alleged, of the report of the company of December 1854, and of a circular issued by the directors, dated the 6th of March 1855, and also of the representations of Mr. Alderman Kennedy, one of the directors. On the purchase of the shares he paid a deposit of 10*l.* a share, amounting to 200*l.*, and afterwards paid other sums upon them, amounting in the whole to 50*l.* on each share. The shares so purchased by Mr. Nicol were part of the shares authorized by a supplemental charter, procured by the company in February 1855, which empowered the bank to raise additional capital, by the issue of new shares. Mr. Nicol after his purchase executed the supplemental deed, which referred to and incorporated into it the terms and provisions of the original deed. He received a dividend on his shares in January 1856, which he retained and never offered to return. In the month of February 1856 he employed Mr. Braddock, a broker, to sell his twenty shares, and Mr. Braddock sold them accordingly to another broker, named Scott, who acted for the buyer. The shares were, in fact, bought by the order of Cameron, the manager of the bank, on account of the Royal British Bank, the name of Mr. Empson being used by him, and given to his broker as the buyer. Mr. Empson was a solicitor, and was the London agent of the solicitor of the bank. He had some time before these transactions been informed by Mr. Cameron that the bank had taken certain shares, which it would be a convenience if he would permit to be transferred into his name on behalf of the bank, and Mr. Empson consented, on the understanding that he was not to be treated by the company as the holder or owner of the shares. A share account was opened in Mr. Empson's name in the bank books, which contained a regular debtor and creditor account of the shares bought and sold, and he was from time to time called upon to execute, and he did execute, the transfer of some of the shares.

(1) 4 Drew. 205; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 855.

The money which was paid to Mr. Nicol for the purchase of his shares was supplied to the broker out of the funds of the bank; and from this source Mr. Nicol received the price of his shares, amounting to 1,000*l.*, which he had never returned. There was a share account of Mr. Nicol in the books of the bank, but no entry was made in it of the transfer of his shares. There now appeared written in pencil against the shares "query—transferred to the bank," but no evidence was offered as to the time when those words were added. In Mr. Empson's account these twenty shares were nowhere to be found, the last entry of his account being of the date of January 1856, and the alleged transfer of the shares having taken place in the following month. There was no direct evidence of any express consent having been given to this transfer by the directors, nor of its having been submitted to them for their approval; but one of the questions discussed was whether there were not circumstances from which that consent might be reasonably, if not strictly, inferred. After the transfer by Mr. Nicol, a dividend having been declared, the dividend warrant of the shares was made out in the name of Cameron, but the amount of the dividend was carried to the credit of the bank in an interest account.

The bank stopped payment in September 1856, and an order was obtained for winding up its affairs under the Winding-up Act.

The Attorney General, Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the official manager, the appellant. — Whatever might have been the fraudulent misrepresentations upon which Mr. Nicol took these shares, whether made by the circular and reports of the directors, or by Mr. Kennedy in his conversation with Nicol, the company was not responsible for them, and, therefore, Mr. Nicol's contract with the company, in respect of these shares, could not be treated as void. The directors were the agents for the company, but could not be considered as such for the purpose of committing a fraud.—

In the latter case, at p. 136, Lord St. Leonards' observations were here applicable, to shew that the charges of fraud should be more definite than the evidence in this case endeavoured to establish, as that on which the respondent acted. His Lordship said, "We do not admit of general charges of fraud as even a defence, but we expect a party to set forth what is the precise ground upon which he makes out the fraud. For example, in a court of equity a man cannot simply say that he has been deceived and defrauded, but he must tell the Court how he has been deceived and defrauded; and then the Court is enabled to form its own judgment whether the facts alleged do make out the alleged fraud or not." But if it were assumed that the directors were the agents of the company, and that through their misrepresentations Mr. Nicol had entered into the contract, the contract, at best, was voidable only, and not void. Mr. Nicol had done nothing to repudiate the contract, but he had accepted dividends and otherwise taken the benefits of the contract, so that other interests had become involved and other rights had arisen which could not now be repudiated. There were cases at law which shewed that independently of any knowledge or notice of fraud, a voidable contract could not be repudiated after the rights of other persons had become involved. If a man became a member of a joint-stock company, and his deposit formed part of the capital of which his contract authorized the publication to the world, and others had acted upon the faith of his being a shareholder, his contract could not then be avoided, and that upon the fraud of six or seven persons happening to fill the office of directors.—

It was also to be remembered that after Nicol became a member of the company, equally false representations were made, by which, if the company were bound by them, he, as one of the company, was bound. As to the alleged sale, there was no assent of the directors to the transfer as required by the 10th article of the deed of settlement, recited in the charter, which article had been framed pursuant to the 23rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113 (2). Empson, also, the alleged transferee, knew nothing of the transaction. Any right against Empson might or might not depend upon his knowledge, but as to any rights affecting the bank, Empson's knowledge was immaterial.—

(2) The 10th, 11th and 17th sections of the deed of settlement, as recited in the charter, were as follows:—

10. That it should be lawful for every proprietor and every person claiming in his or her right in any way howsoever, with the consent of the court of directors, to sell and transfer by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration should be truly stated, the shares to which he or they should be entitled, or any of them, to any person or persons, subject nevertheless to the conditions or restrictions therein contained, and that the same, when duly executed, should be delivered to the secretary or other proper officer of the company, and be kept by him, and that he should enter a memorial thereof in a book to be kept at the said banking-house aforesaid, and to be called "The Register of Transfers," and should indorse such entry on the deed of transfer, and that for every such entry and indorsement the company should be entitled to 2s. 6d., and that such deed so indorsed should be sufficient evidence of the consent of the court of directors.

11. That the person or persons proposing to make any transfer of shares, or the person or persons to whom the same was proposed to be made, should, seven days at the least before the making or executing any such transfer, deliver to the court of authority, there was an end of the question of transfer.—

Walton and Hue's case, 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 545.

Chartres' case, 1 De Gex & Sm. 581.

In all the cases as to the validity of the transfer of shares, the distinction was drawn between the provisions which were considered to be of substance and those which were of form only. In the present case, the forms which had not been observed were clearly substantial and most important.

Mr. Giffard appeared for the creditors' representative, and proposed to argue in favour of the appeal; but

Their LORDSHIPS considered that he could not be heard.

The Solicitor General and Mr. H. Stevens, for Mr. Nicol.—The questions to be considered were: first, whether or not the original taking of these shares by Mr. Nicol was under circumstances which would enable him to refuse any further contribution; and, secondly, if the former question were determined against the respondent, whether he had not effectually transferred his shares. First, the fraudulent representations were contained in a circular by the directors of the 6th of March 1855, and the report of December 1854. The representations contained in those documents had been abundantly shewn in the proceedings connected directors, at the head banking-house aforesaid, a notice in writing, specifying the number of shares proposed to be transferred, and the name or names, residence or rank, profession or trade (and if representatives their character or title as such) as well of the person or persons so proposing to transfer as of the person or persons to whom such transfer was proposed to be made, and the price or consideration (if any) proposed to be given for the same.

17. That whenever any shares should become forfeited, or duly and effectually transferred to or vested in a new proprietor, qualified to hold the same, the former proprietor, except as thereafter provided, be freed and released from all future responsibility and obligations to the company in respect of such shares, and exonerated and discharged from all subsequent claims and demands of the company in such respect, and from all future observance and performance of the covenants, conditions, stipulations and agreements in the now being recited or in any supplemental deed contained, and that the person to whom any transfer should be made should take the shares subject to the obligations of the person transferring the same.

with the Royal British Bank to be false and fraudulent. The representations made by Alderman Kennedy to the respondent were in accordance with these documents, and not contradictory. Were, then, the statements in these documents the statements of the individuals who were the directors, or were they the statements of the company? It was the business of the directors to make reports to the shareholders; and any act done by them in discharge of that duty, when acquiesced in and sanctioned by the company, became the act of the company, and ceased to be the mere act of the directors. It was said that the directors were not the agents of the company to commit a fraud; but if a person employed an agent, and the agent, in the necessary transaction of the business, committed a fraud, the employer was responsible. In Ranger v. the Great Western Railway Company (3), Lord Cottenham said:—"Strictly speaking, a corporation cannot itself be guilty of fraud. But where a corporation is formed for the purpose of carrying on a trading or other speculation for profit, such as forming a railway, these objects can only be accomplished through the agency of individuals; and there can be no doubt that if the agents employed conduct themselves fraudulently, so that if they had been acting for private employers, the persons for whom they were acting would have been affected by their fraud, the same principles must prevail where the principal under whom the agent acts is a corporation." The accounts in this report were signed by the auditors, who were appointed by the shareholders, not by the directors. There were two cases which shewed how far agency might be considered to go: Burnes v. Pennell (4) and The National Exchange Company v. Drew. In the latter case Lord Cranworth (p. 126) said:—"For the present purpose I will assume that, in order to raise the value of the shares, the company fraudulently misrepresented the real state of the concern, the real amount of its assets, and the real amount of the demands upon it. The question is, what is the consequence of the company receiving such a report (if you can separate the company from the directors) and publishing it to the world? I confess that, in my opinion, from the nature of things and from the exigencies of society, that must be taken as between the company and third persons as a representation by the company. The company, as an abstract being, can represent or do nothing. It can only act by its managers. When, therefore, the directors, in the discharge of their duty, fraudulently (for I assume this to be so), for the purpose of misleading others as to the state of the concerns of the company, represent the company to be in a different state from that in which they know it to be, and the persons to whom the representation is addressed act upon it in the belief that it is true, I cannot think that society can go on without treating that as a misrepresentation by the company. Otherwise, companies of this sort would be in this extraordinary predicament: that they might employ, nay, must employ agents to carry on their concerns, and that those agents might make representations, be they ever so false and ever so fraudulent, and yet, nevertheless, that the company might and must benefit by those misrepresentations, without being at all liable to be told, that is your fraud. It was plausibly argued that these reports were not made by the company, but to the company. In form, that is so; no doubt they are reports made to the company. But I assume for the present that they were made to the company under such circumstances that what they so report is known, and intended to be known, not only to the shareholders, but to all persons who may be minded to become shareholders, just the same as if they were published to the world. I repeat that I think the exigencies of society demand that the reports so made and so circulated should be deemed the reports of the company." Lord St. Leonards' observations also in that case were to the same effect. Different considerations might apply to the circular and to the report; but on the authorities cited, it was submitted that the company was answerable for the fraudulent statements in the report. If, however, there were a doubt as to the report, there could be none as to the circular of March 1855. The directors were authorized to take the necessary steps for selling shares; and in doing so they had made a fraudulent statement, for which the company, whose agents they were, must be responsible. As an objection why relief should not be given to the respondent, it was said that this contract was with other persons, some of whom were innocent; and therefore the contract could not be set aside. This must refer either to innocent persons who afterwards became shareholders, or to persons who, at the time the shares were taken, were innocent of the fraud. If the objection referred to the former class, it was denied that the contract was entered into with them; the contract was simply with the company as it then stood. Then, as to shareholders at the time of the contract, who were innocent, that was reviving the discussion whether the company were bound by these statements of the directors. It was the duty of the directors to make a true statement; but it was in their power to make a false statement. The respondent had a right to defend himself against any alleged liability under the contract, and to proceed against the company for deceit.

(3) 5 H.L. Cas. 72.

(4) 2 Ibid. 497.

[The LORD CHANCELLOR referred to Pilmore v. Hood (5).]

But this circular was intended to be delivered to every person: The cases which were said to be against the respondent were mainly decided with reference to the prospectuses and representations of incipient railway companies and provisional committees; but these had not the remotest analogy to an incorporated company acting by its directors. No case had been cited in which shareholders, having been induced to take shares by the misrepresentation of directors, had been refused relief or held bound. As to the rights of innocent persons, who might have been induced to take shares after the respondent's name appeared as a shareholder, the onus lay on the appellant to shew that there were any such. In reply to the argument as to the contract having been confirmed by the respondent, it was sufficient to say that he had not confirmed it after the fraud had been discovered. Neither the receipt of dividends nor the dealings with Empson could be treated as a confirmation, as at that time the respondent was not cognizant of the fraud.—

(5) 5 Bing. N.C. 97; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 11.

Wilde v. Gibson, 1 H.L. Cas. 605.

Blake v. Mowatt, 21 Beav. 603.

Then as to the transfer, the evidence as to Empson's acceptance was shewn by the general authority given by him to Cameron. The assent of the directors must, under the circumstances, be assumed. The names of the vendor and purchaser were sent to the office; the transfer clerk returned the form of transfer, with the purchaser's name filled in. The money of the bank, under the controul of the directors, was paid for the shares. Scott, the broker for the bank, paid the amount, entered it in his accounts, and this item was allowed in his accounts with the bank. After the transfer a dividend was declared, and the bank took possession of it, and treated it as part of the assets; and this was passed by the auditors, who were appointed by the shareholders themselves. Unless, therefore, there was knowledge on the part of Nicol, he had nothing to do with the appropriation of the shares. No memorial, which was to be prepared by the directors, returned the name of Nicol; but in 1856 Cameron absconded, and Mr. Paddison then, on behalf of the directors, obtained from him these shares. The assent, therefore, of the directors was proved, though not by the certificate required in the 10th article. Where substantially it was shewn that the assent had been given, the form would be dispensed with.—

The Attorney General, in reply.—The result of the evidence was, that the directors did not give their assent to the transfer, but that they did not know of it until Empson applied to them for indemnity, and then they refused indemnity and repudiated the transaction. The consent was to be a personal consent of the directors, exercising a discretion for the benefit of the shareholders; and therefore any subsequent consent was not sufficient.

Jan. 22.—The LORD CHANCELLOR (after stating the case) said:—Upon these facts, three questions have been raised: first, was Mr. Nicol induced to become a shareholder in the bank by such fraudulent representations as to entitle him to repudiate his contract? if so, secondly, has he, by any act which he has done, or by any laches of which he has been guilty, estopped himself from not insisting upon the fraud? and in the event of the first question being decided against Mr. Nicol, upon which the second depends, thirdly, has Mr. Nicol divested himself of his original liability by the complete transfer of his shares?

Upon the first question the Attorney General contended, that Mr. Nicol, having once taken shares, was absolutely bound under the definition of the word "contributory" in the 3rd section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1848, as he thereby became a member of the company, or, at all events, liable to contribute to the payment of the debts due to the creditors of such company. Of course, if it is a fraud which vitiated the contract, to say that Mr. Nicol is not a contributory is the same thing as to say that he is not a member of the company for the purpose of contributing; but although he might not be able to exonerate himself from liability to creditors, yet I think the words "liable to contribute to the payment of debts," &c. applies to the members of the company inter se, and is not meant to apply to the liability to creditors, the original form of expression indicating that it is intended to include those only who were bound with others in mutual obligations to settle and discharge the debts. If this case could be disposed of by a summary appeal to the interpretation clause in the act, a great deal of time must have been unnecessarily consumed in this case in which shares having been taken in a public company, the holders would have endeavoured to avoid their liability to contribution on the ground of the purchase of the shares having been induced by fraud. This question cannot, therefore, be determined without considering the question, whether Mr. Nicol has receded from the ordinary liability as a shareholder by reason of the fraudulent representations alleged to have been made to prevail on him to purchase shares in the bank. For this purpose it becomes necessary to ascertain precisely what are the representations upon which Mr. Nicol relies. According to his further affidavit, he states that he was furnished with, before he purchased, a printed copy of the report and balance-sheet of the bank ending December 1854, and a circular letter of the directors of the 6th of March 1855. It was admitted that these documents contained false and fraudulent representations of the state of the bank; but Mr. Nicol having stated in his evidence that the reports and accounts, joined with Mr. Alderman Kennedy's importunities, were the inducements upon which he took the shares, it was contended that the influence exercised over his mind was not due to the reports and accounts only, and as he had not distinguished how much ought to be attributed to Alderman Kennedy's importunities, and how much to the reports of the directors, he failed to prove that he was drawn in to purchase the shares by the false representations of the directors alone, which was essential to entitle him to rescind the contract. But supposing the reports and other statements formed a material portion of the inducement to him to take the shares, without which that purchase never would have been made, I cannot think that the effect of them is destroyed, because other influences were at the same time at work, which either incidentally or intentionally contributed to the success of those false representations. It will be better, therefore, in the first place, to treat the case as if the report of December 1854 and the circular letter of March 1855 were the only representations by which Mr. Nicol was persuaded to take shares in the bank, which will enable me to consider the effect of the false and fraudulent representations made by the directors of the company, upon the contract of a person who was induced by them to become a shareholder. Unfortunately, this case is not in a satisfactory state upon the authorities. The Vice Chancellor proceeded in this case entirely upon his own previous decision in Brockwell's case. He there held, that the very report of the directors of December 1854, upon which Mr. Nicol partly rests his objection to liability as a shareholder, must be considered as the representations of the company, and that Mr. Brockwell having taken his shares in reliance upon the representations made in that report, and they being false, and in that sense fraudulent, he ought not to be placed on the list of contributories. His Honour treated this question as settled by the decisions of the House of Lords, or rather by the opinions expressed by the Lord Chancellor and Lord St. Leonards in giving their reasons—for that is the more correct way of putting it—in the case of The National Exchange Company v. Drew. I shall have occasion presently to consider the effect of this decision as a binding authority upon this point, but in the mean time I must observe that the opinion expressed by the Vice Chancellor in Brockwell's case, and applied by him to this case, is not to be reconciled with some previous decisions in the Court of equity. In Dodgson's case the present Lord Justice, then Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, said, "the directors only are liable for their conduct: if Mr. Dodgson could associate the whole body in any plan to entrap him into taking shares, I should probably know what to do with such a case;" and, again, in Bernard's case, he supported his opinion previously expressed in Dodgson's case, that the directors cannot be the agents of the company to commit a fraud. In Parbury's case a new ground for holding a party who had taken shares in a company to be liable was adopted, that the false and fraudulent representations relied upon were contained in the prospectus of the company, which was, in fact, an invitation to the public to join the undertaking, and was the inducement to Parbury to take his shares, and the Vice Chancellor said, "If in this company there are persons in a similar situation to his, and equally innocent with him, he is liable to contribute equally with them. It seems to be a just inference that there were various persons in the same situation with Mr. Par-

bury, and as innocent as himself, and I cannot hold that he is not a contributory. If it were established that the only other persons interested in these affairs were the persons who made the alleged misrepresentations, the case might be different." It was upon this last ground that the Master of the Rolls decided Bell's case, which he afterwards explained in Holt's case. In Bell's case, after the company had suspended business, and was known by all to be in an insolvent state, circulars were issued containing misrepresentations, and offering advantages to canvassers for obtaining other persons to become shareholders. His Honour thought, and no doubt correctly decided, that this was a fraud committed by the company to induce the public to share in the losses; that it was the act of the whole company and of all the shareholders. But with reference to the effect produced upon the individual party by other innocent persons in a similar predicament, the Master of the Rolls, in the argument addressed to him in Bell's case, considered that none of the shareholders who became such in consequence of the misrepresentation could be compelled to contribute. Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in Brockwell's case, in answer to a similar argument, said that this might be a ground for entitling the other shareholders to be discharged from their liability, but it could not have the effect of continuing Brockwell's liability. I own I should feel great difficulty in holding Mr. Nicol to be a contributory on this ground, because if other innocent persons were prevailed upon to join the company by fraudulent misrepresentations similar to those which induced him to take his shares, they would be equally entitled if they pleased to exonerate themselves from liability, and if they abstained from doing so that could be no reason why a person should be made a contributory who chooses to rely upon the fraud which vitiated his contract. I pass by several cases cited, because in them the alleged misrepresentations were made by individuals, and could in no sense be regarded as the act of the company. I proceed at once to consider, whether the decision in the case of The National Exchange Company v. Drew has concluded this question in Mr. Nicol's favour. Of course, if the House of Lords has determined that directors making fraudulent representations whereby persons are induced to become shareholders in a company, are to be considered agents of the company for this purpose, every Court in the kingdom is bound by that decision; but upon a careful examination of the report of that case, I do not find those were the grounds upon which the House proceeded, or that it was necessary to the conclusion at which it arrived. The proceedings in that case were in the Court of Scotland, for the purpose of recovering the amount alleged to have been advanced by the company to the defenders for the purchase of certain shares in the company,—what is called in this country an action for money lent. It appeared that the affairs of the pursuers were in a desperate condition, and the defenders, being already shareholders, were solicited by the manager, with a view of raising the price of shares, to purchase additional shares, he assuring them that the company would advance the necessary funds for purchasing the shares, and that the stock would be held until it could be sold at a profit without the defenders being called upon for any contribution in money. Lord Chancellor Cranworth was of opinion that, quite independent of the question of fraud, a reasonable defence was stated which entitled the defenders to resist the demand, for that in his opinion, there was no loan at all, and, of course, if there was no loan no action could be brought to recover back the money alleged to have been lent. Lord Brougham concurred with the Lord Chancellor, although not without great difficulty, and Lord St. Leonards, although differing from the two other noble lords, so far as to consider there was a loan, yet thought the loan and purchase one transaction, and, consequently, that there was no separate and independent advance of money that the company was entitled to recover back. It is obvious that the question of agency of the directors is not involved in the decision of that case, and that the opinions expressed on the subject may be regarded as extra-judicial. Those opinions, however, are very strong, and although not binding as authorities upon my judgment, are entitled to the greatest respect and deference. Lord Cranworth

said, “for the present purpose I will assume that, in order to raise the value of the shares, the company fraudulently misrepresented the real state of the concern, the real amount of its assets, and the real amount of the demands upon it. The question is, what is the consequence of the company receiving such a report (if you can separate the company from the directors) and publishing it to the world? I confess that, in my opinion, from the nature of things and from the exigencies of society, that must be taken as between the company and third persons as a representation of the company. The company, as an abstract being, can represent or do nothing. It can only act by its managers. When, therefore, the directors, in the discharge of their duty, fraudulently (for I assume this to be so) for the purpose of misleading others as to the state of the concerns of the company, represent the company to be in a different state from that in which they know it to be, and the persons to whom the representation is addressed act upon it in the belief that it is true, I cannot think that society can go on without treating that as a misrepresentation by the company. Otherwise, companies of this sort would be in this extraordinary predicament: that they might employ, nay, must employ agents to carry on their concerns, and that those agents might make representations, be they ever so false and ever so fraudulent, and yet, nevertheless, that the company might and must benefit by those misrepresentations, without being at all liable to be told, that is your fraud.” And Lord St. Leonards said, “Now I have certainly come to this conclusion, that if representations are made by a company, fraudulently, for the purpose of enhancing the value of their stock, and they induce a third person to purchase stock, those representations so made by them for that purpose do bind the company; I consider representations by the directors of a company as representations by the company, although they may be representations made to the company: it is their own representation.” To these opinions must be added the weight of Lord Campbell, in the case of Burnes v. Pennell and The Deposit and General Life Assurance Company v. Ayscough. It is unnecessary for me to say that it is with the greatest distrust of the correctness of my own judgment I venture to differ with so many high authorities, but after a careful and repeated consideration of the subject I am compelled to take a different view of the relation which exists between the directors of a company and the shareholders. The difference between joint-stock companies and an ordinary partnership is clearly pointed out by Lord Campbell, in the case of Burnes v. Pennell, and also by Lord Wensleydale in a recent case in the House of Lords—Ernest v. Nicholls (6). The law of ordinary partnership, so far as relates to the power of one partner to bind another is, as Lord Wensleydale says, a branch of the law of principal and agent, but to apply that law and carry it throughout as regards the relation between the directors and shareholders of a company would lead to innumerable difficulties. To illustrate my meaning, I will take the present case of a banking company, incorporated under the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. The deed of partnership is required to contain, amongst other provisions, one for the management of the affairs of the company by directors. In other words, the powers and authorities to be exercised by the governing body are to be limited and defined by the deed, and it is further required by the act that the deed shall contain a provision for the yearly communication of the directors' report and balance-sheet, and the profit and loss account to every shareholder: the object of this of course being that each shareholder may be made acquainted with the state and affairs of the bank. Every person, therefore, dealing with the directors, or acting upon any statements they may publish, has notice by the act of parliament that they possess only a restricted authority, the extent of which by proper inquiry may be ascertained. He would know with respect to the reports of the directors and the balance-sheets that they were only for the information of the shareholders, and that if the directors publish them to the world they are doing an act which cannot be an exercise of the powers conferred on them, but that they are thereby exceeding the limits of their duty. Supposing that after having deceived the shareholders with false reports, the directors thought proper, either for the more speedy communication of them to shareholders at a distance, or for the purpose of attracting public attention to the flourishing state of the affairs of the company, to circulate those statements by means of the newspapers through the country, is it to be said that each and every person who is to be attracted by the publication, and tempted by it to become a shareholder, may afterwards charge the company with deceit practised upon him individually, and repudiate his liability on that ground alone? If the proposition can be maintained to this extent, can you stop short of holding that the directors are in all respects and to all intents and purposes the company, and that, whether they act honestly or fraudulently, within the limits of their duty or beyond it, it is the company acting throughout? Can a person then who has trusted to the reports, and has bought shares in reliance upon their truth, maintain an action for damages for any loss he may sustain by his contract against the company?—or if an innocent shareholder has ordered shares to be sold by his broker, and the purchaser was influenced by the false reports of the directors to become a purchaser, can he rescind the contract on the ground of the false representations? The Master of the Rolls answers, in Duranty's case (7), that he cannot; but if the principle that the statements of the directors are those of the company, is to govern this, then each member of the company is party to the false representation, and a contract induced by it cannot be maintained. If this is the law, it is in vain that the shareholders should try to bind the hands of the directors by carefully specifying the powers to be exercised in the direction of the company. The moment they invest them with the managing authority, they are at the mercy of every act they may do in their official character. I cannot help thinking that the true principle will be found to be, that in all cases, except such extreme cases as that of Bell's, where the whole company was considered to have been party to the fraud, if the directors, in the course of the performance of their duty, make any false or fraudulent representations to the shareholders, and afterwards think proper to give them unauthorized circulation beyond the limits of the company, a stranger who chances to act upon them, and suffers loss in consequence, must either submit or bear what his own voluntary acquiescence in representations which are not addressed to him has brought upon him; or, if he has any remedy at all, it must be against those who, seeking to deceive the public generally, have entitled him to make a case against them out of his own individual deceptions as one of the public. But, assuming that the representations of the directors, although beyond the scope of their authority, must in all cases be taken as those of the company, and may be adopted against them by any person who meets with them in the mode of publication that the directors have sanctioned, Mr. Nicol's case falls short of proof of this description, and contains nothing to shew that any representations were made to him, or authorized to be made to him by the directors, by means of any such publication. It was through Alderman Kennedy that he became acquainted with the report and the circular, for he says that it was on the representations made to him by Alderman Kennedy that he was induced to take shares in the concern, that is to say, upon the representations as to the soundness and prosperity of the concern in the printed papers which he handed to him. It is possible that but for this introduction of them to his notice, he might never have seen the report and the circular letter at all; and in order to make this communication the act of the directors, it is necessary for Mr. Nicol to prove that Alderman Kennedy acted with their authority and their knowledge and sanction, according to the case of Pilmore v. Hood, which I mentioned in the course of the argument. But there is not the smallest proof of any authority given by the directors to Alderman Kennedy to communicate this document, either generally or to Mr. Nicol in particular, or any knowledge by them of any such communication having been made. Now, the case is, therefore, like that of Holt's case, and nothing more than a representation by an individual director, for which he might be responsible, but which could not be considered as an act of the company, upon which alone Mr. Nicol would be entitled to be relieved from being a contributory on the ground of fraud. But even if he established the fraud against the company, still he would preclude himself from taking advantage of it in consequence of the stage at which the affairs of the company had arrived before he attempted to avail himself of it. If a fraud was practised upon him, it was at his own option to use it, as Lord Campbell said, in the case of The Deposit Assurance Company v. Ayscough, "It is now well settled that a contract tainted by fraud is not void, but only voidable at the election of the party defrauded." But Mr. Nicol never, until the last moment, attempted to repudiate his contract: he received a dividend on his shares, which was a benefit to him, out of the common fund, to the prejudice of the other shareholders, and he dealt with the shares so vested in him, and sold them in the market, receiving the purchase-money. The stoppage of the bank happened, and found him in this position. The petition for winding up was presented, and still he did nothing, relying upon what he had done to divest himself of the shares; and it was not until he was sought to be made a contributory that he brings forward his great case of fraud, which he had permitted to lie dormant so long, that, no doubt, he had precluded himself at law from availing himself of fraud, as appears from the case of The Deposit Life Assurance Company v. Ayscough, and more clearly from Clarke v. Dickson, where it was held, that the doctrine of repudiation cannot prevail where a man, by his own act, has put it out of his power to place parties in the same position they were in at the time the contract was made. Mr. Nicol might, within reasonable time after he had discovered the fraud, have filed his bill and offered to return the dividend and claimed to avoid the contract ab initio. But I do not think, either at law or in equity, a person who has a knowledge, or means of knowledge, that a fraud has been committed, can be permitted to hold his shares down to the time when the business of the company is at an end, and its affairs are about to be wound up under the act of parliament, and then for the first time seek to discharge himself upon this ground from all liability as a contributory. Mr. Nicol, then, not being able to avail himself of any misrepresentation to avoid the contract, or having lost his opportunity of doing so by delay, his liability must continue, unless he has divested himself of it by some transfer of his shares to some other person; and whether he has done so or not is the last question to be considered. Although it should appear to the Court that Mr. Nicol has completely transferred his shares, although he is not to be held as a contributory, the previous considerations as to original liability are not altogether unnecessary, as under certain circumstances specified in the Joint-Stock Companies Banking Act, Mr. Nicol might continue liable on his shares for three years from the time that he ceased to be a shareholder. In considering the question of the transfer, I should not consider it necessary to go into the different provisions of the act of parliament to which the attention of the Court was directed, because it appears to be conveniently determined upon the requisitions of the deed of settlement alone. The clauses which regulate the transfer of shares are the 10th and 11th. The 10th clause enables "every proprietor of shares and every person claiming in his or her right in any way howsoever, with the consent of the court of directors, to sell and transfer." Then the 11th clause requires "that the person or persons proposing to make any transfer of shares, or the person or persons to whom the same was proposed to be made, should, seven days at the least before the making or executing any such transfer, deliver to the court of directors, at the head banking-house aforesaid, a notice in writing, specifying the number of shares proposed to be transferred, and the name or names, residence or rank, profession or trade (and if representatives, their character or title as such) as well of the person or persons so proposing to transfer as of the person or persons to whom such transfer was proposed to be made." It is unnecessary to consider the authorities which were cited, on the provisions of this description in the deed of settlement of the company, establishing, first, the distinction between what is formal and may be dispensed with, and what is substantial and must be complied with, because there can be no doubt, that if the consent of the directors to the transfer of shares is required, that is intended as a protection to the shareholders against the introduction of improper persons into the company; and, therefore, without such previous consent, no valid transfer can be made. Before considering the evidence that establishes this consent, it would be necessary to ascertain whether there was a proper transferee of Mr. Nicol's shares. The transaction, by which the company are stated to be the transferee of these shares through Mr. Empson, was illegal, and contrary to the provisions in the deed of settlement; which in this respect is founded on the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113. s. 4. art. 5. But Mr. Nicol knew nothing of the private arrangements between Mr. Cameron and Mr. Empson; and, through his broker, dealt with Mr. Empson as the real purchaser. Mr. Empson allowed his name to be used in these transactions; and the only consequence of the illegality of them would probably be to make him the responsible holder of the shares. As far as that was concerned, the transaction was completed; and it is immaterial that it is not noticed in Mr. Nicol's share-account as the one made in Mr. Empson's name. He had originally given his consent to his name being used in the purchase of shares for the company. He had recognized the transaction by transferring the shares which had been so purchased. He had never withdrawn the consent originally given; and under these circumstances, it was quite unnecessary for him to give express sanction to this particular transaction, in order to render it complete as a purchase by him. Mr. Nicol, therefore, had transferred to Mr. Empson, and he had accepted the transfer; and to render it effectual it was only necessary that the consent of the directors should be given. No formal consent is prescribed by the deed; and therefore anything from which it may be inferred that consent must have been given will be sufficient. The arrangement for the purchase of shares in Empson's name was made by Cameron, who was the general manager of the company, and conducted all its business and affairs under the superintendence and controul of the directors. By the 18th clause of the deed of settlement, the entire, sole and exclusive controul, management and disposal of the funds of the company are vested in the directors. No agreement for the purchase of shares in the company could have been entered into on their behalf by Mr. Cameron without their sanction or knowledge. No portion of the funds, for the purpose of being applied to shares, could be obtained without their authority, for they possessed the exclusive controul and disposal of the funds; and it seems impossible to come to any other conclusion than that they were consenting parties to that transaction, and not only consented to it, for without their having authorized the application of the fund it could not be carried into effect; and if further evidence of their consent were wanting, I think it would be found in their receipt of the dividend, which was paid after the transfer of the shares by Mr. Nicol, the dividend warrant for which was made out in the name of Cameron, and the amount carried to the credit of the interest account in the books of the company, which so became part of the funds at the disposal of the directors. I entertain no doubt that these circumstances supply ample evidence of the requisite consent of the directors, and that the transfer of Mr. Nicol's shares, being in all other respects complete, he had ceased to be a shareholder at the time of the stoppage of the bank; and upon these grounds alone, I am of opinion that his name ought not to be placed on the list of contributories, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Had it, in my opinion, been necessary, in order to arrive at the conclusion reached by the learned Vice Chancellor, to take the ground taken by that able Judge, I should at least have hesitated before doing so. With deference to him, I acknowledge myself not persuaded, not satisfied with its stability. I agree, however, with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that his Honour's orders should be affirmed, for another reason, namely, on the ground of the consent of Mr. Empson and the court of directors to the transfer made by Mr. Nicol to Mr.

Empson. The evidence satisfies me that before the stoppage of the company Mr. Empson sanctioned and acceded to the use of his name in the transaction, and became accordingly the purchaser and owner of the shares in question, the directors, as directors, having also before the stoppage, as the evidence convinces me, consented to the sale and purchase. It is not material for any present purpose whether it was with an improper view or an illegal object, that the purchase was made by Mr. Empson, or in his name, or was on the part of the directors, or any of their officers, consented to, for neither Mr. Nicol nor his broker appears to have been aware, or to have had notice of any such improper view or illegal object. I think that the order under appeal cannot be disturbed.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—There are two questions in this case: the first, whether the respondent, Mr. Nicol, was bound by his purchase of the shares in the bank; and, secondly, whether, if he was bound by his purchase of the shares, he was discharged by the sale of them. The decision of either of these points in favour of the respondent would dispose of the case; but both the questions were fully argued at the bar, and are of so much general importance, that I think it better to state my opinion upon both questions.

As to the first question, the respondent's argument, that he was not bound by his purchase of these shares, rested on this ground: that he was induced to purchase them by false and fraudulent representations affecting their value, made to him by or on the part of the directors of the company. The directors, it was said, were the agents of the shareholders for the issuing of these shares; and it was insisted, therefore, that the shareholders must take the consequence of these misrepresentations. On the other hand, it was contended, on the part of the appellant, the official manager, that the shareholders of the company cannot be affected by any false or fraudulent misrepresentations of its directors. The shareholders, it was said, gave no authority to the directors to make false or fraudulent representations. They are themselves the victims of the fraud of the directors. This argument, on the part of the appellant, seems to me to be based on a false view of the question. Directors of a company are not, it must be admitted, directly authorized by the shareholders to make false or fraudulent representations, but they are authorized by the shareholders to manage their affairs; and the true question is not the broad question which the argument on the part of the appellant has assumed, but the more limited question whether, if the directors of the company, in the course of managing its affairs, make false and fraudulent representations, whereby persons are injured, the shareholders in the company are, or are not, responsible for the injury. In this particular case, the case of contribution, the question may be stated in more narrow terms, whether the shareholders of the company can maintain a claim for contribution against persons who had been drawn in by the false and fraudulent representations of their directors. Looking at this question upon the general principle, there can, I think, be little, if any, doubt. It cannot be denied that persons must be responsible for and can take no benefit under false and fraudulent representations made by themselves. Are they, then, to be responsible for and take benefit under the same false and fraudulent representations, if made by those to whom they have intrusted the conduct and management of their affairs? On general principle, I think they must be equally responsible in the one case as in the other. The law of this country does not, as I conceive, give any countenance to the doctrine contended for by the appellant. That doctrine is met, as it seems to me, by the rule, which is general, qui facit per alium facit per se. It is at variance with what was said in the House of Lords, in the case of Ranger v. the Great Western Railway Company, and it is besides well known in equity, and I take it in law also, that even an innocent party cannot derive benefit from the frauds of others. I am not disposed, therefore, to withhold my assent from the limited proposition, that, generally speaking, shareholders of a company are responsible for and are not entitled to derive benefit from false and fraudulent representations made by their directors—a proposition which I consider to be fully borne out by what was said, in the House of Lords, in Burnes v. Pennell, and in The National Exchange Company v. Drew. I adopt this proposition, however, only as a general rule, the application or non-application of which to any particular case must depend on the circumstances of that case. Adopting, then, this limited proposition, it is to be considered whether this case falls within the proposition. It appears that, in December 1854, the directors of the company issued a report to the shareholders, containing false and fraudulent representations as to the state and prospects of the bank; and that shortly before the respondent purchased his shares—which are new shares, issued by the company under the powers of a supplemental charter obtained for the purpose—which the respondent purchased direct from the company, the directors also, with a view to the issue of those new shares, put forth a circular letter containing similar false and fraudulent representations. But these documents were produced to the respondent by Mr. Alderman Kennedy, one of the directors of the company, and it was on the statements found in the documents, confirmed by the assurance given, that the respondent purchased his shares. It is not disputed that the statements contained in these documents were false and fraudulent. But much was said at the bar upon the question whether the respondent in making the purchase acted upon the faith of those statements; the appellant contended that the respondent purchased mainly, if not wholly, upon the faith of Alderman Kennedy's statement. These documents were undoubtedly produced to the respondent with a view to his becoming a purchaser of the shares; and where false representations are made for the purpose of inducing a purchase, it is, in my opinion, incumbent on those who claim the benefit of the purchase to prove to demonstration that those representations were acted upon. It is not, in my judgment, sufficient for them to prove that there were other representations by which the purchase may have been induced. I attach no weight, therefore, to this objection on the part of the appellant; and if the case rested on this point, I should not hesitate, so far as my voice is concerned, in deciding in favour of the respondent. But the case cannot be disposed of on this ground. It is necessary to consider what was the origin and purpose of these false representations, through whom and under what circumstances they were made to the respondent, and what is the effect of the time which has elapsed, and the acts which have been done, since the respondent completed his purchase. The report of December 1854 was no more than the ordinary report of the directors of a company made to shareholders at or preparatory to the general meeting, with a view to a dividend being declared. It had no connexion with the sale or purchase of shares, and certainly it had no immediate connexion with the purchase made by the respondent. The statement contained in it might, indeed, affect the value of the shares, but it was not the object or purpose of the document so to affect it. Any increase in the price of shares consequent upon the statement contained in this document would be an indirect and not a necessary result. The circular, indeed, is more immediately connected with the sale of the shares, but it is addressed to the shareholders and customers of the bank, a class within which the respondent did not fall. As to both these documents, as far as they reach beyond the persons to whom they were addressed, they could not, I think, be considered otherwise than as in the nature of advertisements issued by the directors. Independent of any special circumstances, they would reach the purchasers only as part of the public, and would not be considered as entering into a contract for the purchase or sale of shares. It is said, however, in this case, that they, in fact, entered into the respondent's contract, for they were produced on the occasion of and in reference to the purchase of his shares. But by whom were they produced? Not by the directors, or in pursuance of any resolution, but by Alderman Kennedy, one of the directors only; and however much the shareholders are to be bound by the representations of their directors, they surely cannot be responsible for the acts of one another. Whatever authority is given by the shareholders to their directors is given to them as a body, not to each of them; and undoubtedly

Mr. Alderman Kennedy's acts, his representations, could not, in my opinion, bind the shareholders; and to hold the shareholders bound would be, in truth, to hold that if a body of directors prepare a document for one purpose, and one of them takes it and applies it to a different purpose, shareholders are liable for the consequences of its having been so applied. I am not prepared to go that length. Looking at this case, therefore, simply with reference to the representations made to the respondent, I think that the argument on this part of the first question cannot be maintained.

There remains on this part of the case a consideration of very great importance—the lapse of time, and what has been done by the respondent since his purchase of these shares. The respondent purchased shares in March 1855, he received a dividend upon them, and he made no complaint of having been defrauded until the company stopped payment, in September 1856. It cannot be denied that if the respondent thus acquiesced in and acted upon the purchase with a knowledge of the fraud practised upon him, he could have had no claim to relief. But it was said that he had no such knowledge; these frauds were not discovered until the failure of the bank. But there are auditors of this company appointed by the shareholders; these auditors were, within the scope of their duties, at least as much the agents of the shareholders as the directors were, and the false and fraudulent representations were discoverable by them. It cannot therefore, I think, be stated that the respondent was without the means of knowledge; and I think in a case of this description, the respondent, if he had the means of knowledge, can be in no better position than he would have been if he had had actual knowledge. Supposing, however, the respondent had not even the means of knowledge, by whose authority was he precluded from these means? Simply by his own act in having executed a deed which precluded him from these means and placed him at the mercy of the directors; and I am not prepared to say that persons who think proper to execute deeds by which they preclude themselves from obtaining information, can, as against third parties, equally innocent with themselves, set up the want of information which they have precluded themselves from obtaining. Some argument in support of the respondent's case was attempted to be drawn from the definition of "contributories" in the Winding-up Acts and the respondent's assumed liability to creditors; but I think the definition referred to does not affect the case. But the respondent, although he may be liable to creditors, and perhaps he may be liable to them under the Banking Acts for the limited period before he parted with his shares, is not therefore a contributory. Upon the whole, for the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that the respondent's argument on the first point fails, and that he is bound by the purchase of these shares.

The question then arises, whether he was discharged by the sale. As to this point, it is first to be observed that no want of bona fides is in any way attributed to the respondent. He sold these shares in open market, and executed transfers of them to Empson, whom he fully believed to be a bona fide purchaser. But it is said, on the part of the appellant, that Empson knew nothing of the purchase or of the transfer, and that the formalities required by the deed were not duly observed; and on these grounds it is insisted that the respondent remains liable in respect of the shares.

Now, as to the first of these points, I take it to be perfectly true that Empson did not personally know of the purchase of these particular shares; but upon the evidence before us, I feel bound to conclude that he had authorized Cameron, the manager of the bank, to use his name for the purchase of shares, and that his name was used for the purchases in pursuance of that authority. The evidence seems to me to establish that Empson knew that shares were from time to time purchased in his name without his previous knowledge, and that he accepted transfers of shares so purchased whenever he was asked so to do. He tells us in terms that the relation in which he stood to the bank, that of conducting their common-law business, obliged him to do so; and if upon these facts we are not justified in concluding, as between him and third persons who were unacquainted with the real state of the case, that he authorized his name to be used for the purchase of shares, I know not what amount of evidence would justify us in drawing that conclusion. This second point of the case, therefore, must, in my opinion, depend upon whether there was such a non-observance of the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113. and of the company's deed as would vitiate the transfer. Several of the sections of the act were referred to in support of the appellant's argument on this point, but the provisions of the act seemed to me to favour the respondent's more than the appellant's case. By the 21st section the persons who are made liable are those whose names appear in the last delivered memorial. Mr. Nicol's name was not in that memorial. By the 23rd section shareholders may transfer; transfers are to be delivered to the secretary; the secretary is to enter them in the register of transfers and to indorse them on the deeds of transfer: and it was argued, for the appellant, that the transfers could not be completed until the indorsement was made. But the statute does not say so; on the contrary, the latter part of this very section, the 23rd, represents the rights of the purchaser as commencing from the time of the delivery of the transfer to the secretary, and not from the time of the indorsement itself. These provisions, therefore, as to the entries of transfers and the indorsements upon them, seem to me to point rather to purchasers than to vendors, and I am much disposed to think that they were intended simply for the purpose of securing the purchasers as against companies in the acknowledgment of their titles. At all events, I think they are of no weight against the respondent under the circumstances of this case. The appellant's argument on this point was attempted to be fortified by a reference to the practice which appears to prevail upon the Stock Exchange upon the sale of shares, to require in doubtful cases undertakings from the purchasers to register; but this fact proves no more than the prudence of such registration: it does not shew it to be necessary—besides the practice of the Stock Exchange cannot govern law.

A further argument was founded on the act of parliament, by the 4th section of which the company were prevented from becoming purchasers of shares; but however much this argument might have availed the company as against Empson, it cannot, I think, avail them as against the respondent, for he dealt with Empson without any knowledge whatever that the company had any concern in the transaction.

Turning, then, from the act of parliament to the company's deed, the 10th clause of the deed was relied upon on the part of the appellant as requiring the consent of the court of directors to the transfer of shares; and it was insisted that there was no such consent. Neither this clause nor any provision of the deed requires or points out any particular form of consent. The clause, indeed, contains the same provision as to the delivery of the transfer to the secretary, and the entry of it by him, and the indorsement of the deed of transfer, as I have also adverted to as having been contained in the act of parliament; and it provides that the deed so indorsed shall be sufficient evidence of the consent of the directors. But it does not provide that no other evidence of such consent shall be sufficient. Nor could it be the intention of the legislature so to provide, for there might obviously be cases in which the specified evidence of consent could not be produced. The deed, therefore, leaves open the proof of consent, and the question we have to consider is, whether in this case there is sufficient proof. The transfers of these shares to the bank were sent to the bank; they were filled up there in the name of Empson; they were returned to the respondent so filled up after his execution of them; they were again returned to the bank and remained there; the purchase-money for them was paid from the monies of the bank; Empson was debited in the books of the company with the money so paid, and was credited, as I think, with these shares; dividends accrued upon the shares after the transfers, and the bank received the dividends. Whatever might have been the effect of any of these acts separately considered, I think that collectively they constitute a body of evidence which renders the conclusion irresistible, that there was consent on the part of the directors to the transfer of these shares. It was said that there is no minute of the court of directors consenting to the transfer, but the deed requires no such minute. Suppose this had been the case of a private banker, with whose consent the sale was to be made, and his books had contained the same series of entries as the books of this company contain, could it for one moment be doubted that he must be held to have consented to the sale? In such a case no statement on his part short of the most clear proof that his consent could not possibly have been given could, I think, countervail such evidence. In this case I think there is not any proof that could warrant us in holding that consent was not given; and on this question of proof of consent I cannot see that the directors of the company, having the management of its affairs, can stand in any different position from that of a private bank. The observations which I have already made upon the acts of parliament render it unnecessary to revert to the arguments on the remaining part of this 10th clause of the deed, as to the registration of the transfer and the indorsement by the company. But it is said that by the 11th clause of the deed seven days' notice in writing ought to have been given to the directors of the proposed transfer, and that no such notice was given; and it is sought to invalidate the transfer on that ground. The object of this clause is merely to enable the directors to form a judgment on the question, whether the transfer ought to be allowed, and if they have formed a judgment upon that question, as I think they must be taken to have done, I do not think that the transfers can be invalidated on the ground that particular provisions that were made to enable them to form that judgment were not resorted to. It cannot, I think, be said that if an eligible transfer were proposed the directors could not allow it without seven days' notice, and if they had dispensed with the notice in one case they could in others, and the provision must be one of form merely. The cases referred to on this point do not, I think, govern it. There is another point upon this part of the case which was not much, if at all, adverted to in the argument, which would seem to me to be deserving of some consideration. It would appear from the evidence of Mr. Empson that attempts were made to put him upon the list of contributories with respect to these shares, and that a compromise has been effected with him. I am by no means satisfied that, as between him and the respondent, he would not in any event be primarily liable; and I very much doubt whether, if this be the case, and the appellant has released Empson, he can be entitled to prosecute his claim upon the respondent. Upon the whole, although dissenting from the terms, I agree in the result, and I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed, with costs, to be paid out of the estate.

Mr. Giffard, for the creditors' representative, applied for his costs, he having been served with notice of the appeal; and

The LORD CHANCELLOR allowed them, to be paid out of the estate.

Mortgage — Receiver — Attornment — Bankruptcy — Subsequent Distress — Estoppel.

*A receiver of an estate was appointed, in compliance with an agreement made between a mortgagor and mortgagee. They both joined in the appointment, and gave him power of distress and entry, and the mortgagor attorned as tenant from year to year to the receiver, at a rent of 3,500*l.* The deed recited all the facts relating to the mortgage, and provided that nothing in the deed should abridge the rights of the mortgagee. The mortgagor afterwards became bankrupt, and the receiver distrained for 3,500*l.* Upon this being claimed by the mortgagee, by a party under a bill of sale, and by the assignees of the mortgagor,— Held, that the powers of distress and entry were determined by the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and that the distress was invalid, inasmuch as it was executed against the goods of the mortgagor after they had vested in the assignees.*

If a co-defendant has an interest in the property claimed by the plaintiff, upon which he intends to rely, he must, upon the pleadings, bring his case before the Court. If he merely disclaims, the Court will decide the case between the litigating parties, and leave the co-defendant to such other remedy as he may have.

Col. Waugh, on the 14th of October 1853, purchased Branksea Island, situate in the harbour of Poole, in the county of Dorset, with its castle, lands and hereditaments, containing in the whole about 700 acres. On the following day he reconveyed the greater part of the estate to Sir Frederick George John Foster, the vendor, and his heirs, by way of mortgage to secure a sum of 10,000*l.* and interest. On the 20th of October 1853 Col. Waugh again mortgaged the same estate to Messrs. Hussey, Kane & Pemberton, to secure a further sum of 10,000*l.*; and on the 16th of March 1855 he again mortgaged the estate to John Jolly, the plaintiff, to secure a further sum of 5,000*l.*

On the 18th of April 1855 Sir F. G. J. Foster, upon payment of what was due to him, transferred his mortgage, and at the same time conveyed the estate to John Jolly and his heirs, to secure the 10,000*l.* and interest.

On the 12th of October 1855 Messrs. Hussey, Kane & Pemberton transferred their mortgage to John Jolly, who paid them 10,100*l.* for principal and interest, and at the same time lent to Col. Waugh a further sum of 4,900*l.* This increased his mortgage upon the estate to 30,000*l.*

By another indenture, of the 12th of October 1855, and made between William Petrie Waugh of the first part, John Jolly of the second part, Weston Aplin of the third part, and William Cary Faulkner and George Bonner of the fourth part, after reciting the indenture of the 18th of April 1855 and the deed of even date, and that it had been agreed that, for securing the regular and punctual payment of the interest of the sum of 30,000*l.*, and also for providing a fund for better securing the gradual repayment of the principal sum, Weston Aplin should be appointed receiver of the rents and profits of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the mortgage securities; and reciting that the hereditaments and premises were at present in the possession and occupation of W. P. Waugh, and that it had been agreed that he should attorn tenant in respect of the same to Weston Aplin, at one entire yearly rent of 3,500*l.*, part of which, (that is to say) 1,500*l.*, was intended to be for securing the punctual payment of the interest on the mortgage debt, and 2,000*l.*, the remaining part thereof, was intended to be applied in forming a fund for the ultimate discharge of the 30,000*l.*: it was witnessed, that W. P. Waugh and J. Jolly did each of them constitute and appoint W. Aplin to be the receiver, agent and attorney of them and each of them, and in the names or name of them, or either of them, or otherwise, to ask for, demand and receive of and from all the present and future tenants and occupiers of the castle, lands and hereditaments mentioned in the schedules to that indenture, all the yearly and other rents, royalties, issues and profits then due and thereafter to become due from them respectively, and in default of payment to use and exercise all such remedies, by entry, distress or otherwise, and generally to do and perform all such other acts as should be requisite or expedient for the receiving and recovering of the rents, royalties, issues and profits: and W. P. Waugh and J. Jolly respectively did thereby direct and require the several tenants and occupiers to pay unto W. Aplin all the rents, royalties and reservations due and to become due from them respectively for the premises, or any part thereof respectively, for which they declared that the receipts of W. Aplin should be effectual discharges. And it was thereby declared that the rents, issues and profits should be applied by W. Aplin as thereafter expressed. And it was further witnessed, that for the consideration aforesaid, he, W. P. Waugh, did thereby attorn and become tenant from year to year to W. Aplin in respect of such parts of the estate and hereditaments as were then occupied by W. P. Waugh, at the yearly rent of 3,500*l.* clear of all deductions, by half-yearly payments at the times therein mentioned. The indenture afterwards contained a proviso, that if W. P. Waugh should make default in payment of the principal sum of 30,000*l.*, or the interest thereof, at the days and in manner

mentioned and appointed for payment thereof in the indenture of even date, then and at any time thereafter it should be lawful for J. Jolly, his heirs and assigns, upon giving fourteen days' notice, to enter upon the premises whereof W. P. Waugh had attorned tenant as aforesaid, and that thereupon the tenancy created thereby should absolutely determine. And it was thereby declared, that if the said W. P. Waugh should from time to time keep down the interest of 1,500*l.* per annum, on the mortgage debt, then during such time the yearly rent should be reduced to 2,000*l.*, but without prejudice to the right of J. Jolly, in the event of subsequent default being made by W. P. Waugh, to require payment of the full rent. It was also declared, that the rent of 3,500*l.* should be applied in keeping down the interest on the mortgage money, and that the surplus should be paid to Messrs. Faulkner & Bonner as a kind of sinking fund, to be applied as it should amount to 10,000*l.* in payment of the principal sum of 30,000*l.* And the deed contained a proviso for appointing another person as receiver in the place of W. Aplin in case of his death or his refusing or declining to act, and that such new receiver should have all the powers and authorities thereby granted to W. Aplin. The deed also contained a proviso that nothing therein contained should lessen or abridge the rights, powers and remedies of J. Jolly, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, under the therein recited indentures of mortgage, or prevent him or them from realizing the mortgage securities either by foreclosure or sale, or otherwise.

On the 13th of October 1855 Col. Waugh again mortgaged the estate to John Edward Stephens, to secure certain monies then due from him; and by another deed of the same date he covenanted with J. E. Stephens to grant a lease to a trustee of certain parts of the Branksea estate, and the sea-shore contiguous, for thirty years from the 1st of May 1855, at a yearly rent of 1*l.*

The London and Eastern Banking Company was incorporated by letters patent, dated the 20th of January 1854; and on the 2nd of November 1855 W. P. Waugh mortgaged the same estate to them and their successors as a security for money lent or which might become due on any account; and on the 6th of March 1857 Messrs. Waugh and Stephens and the London and Eastern Banking Company joined in further charging the estate to J. Jolly, to secure to him a further sum of 7,000*l.* in priority to the company. On the 14th of March 1857 Col. Waugh gave further powers to the London and Eastern Banking Company, whose debt amounted to 244,000*l.* On the 9th of April 1857 the London and Eastern Banking Company transferred their mortgage (with the exception of a bill of sale of the goods and chattels on the estate, dated the 14th of March 1857) to Archibald Francis Arbuthnot, upon trust for raising and paying into the Union Bank the debt due to the London and Eastern Banking Company.

On the 15th of April 1857 Col. Waugh was declared a bankrupt; and William Bell was appointed the official assignee, and William Samuel Price Hughes, William Chickall Jay and William Pearce were appointed the creditors' assignees.

On the 28th of April 1857 W. Aplin, as receiver, distrained the chattels on the Branksea estate for 3,500*l.*

On the 25th of November 1857 Wood, V.C. made an order for winding up the London and Eastern Banking Company; and on the 21st of December 1857 Charles Fife Stuart and W. Bell were appointed the official managers.

On the 22nd of April 1858 the London and Eastern Banking Company were declared bankrupts; and W. Bell was appointed official assignee, and James Thomson the creditors' assignee.

The right to the 3,500*l.* distrained for by W. Aplin was disputed; and it was paid into the London and Westminster Bank, in the names of John E. Coleman, W. Bell and W. Aplin, as severally representing the London and Eastern Banking Company, the assignees of Col. Waugh, and J. Jolly.

The plaintiff claimed the 3,500*l.*, under the terms of the deed of the 12th of October 1855, in part payment of his mortgage.

The official manager of the London and Eastern Banking Company also claimed it, by virtue of the bill of sale of the 14th of March 1857. This deed, however, was only referred to casually in the bill; and it did not appear whether it was registered or not.

The assignees of Col. Waugh also claimed it as part of the bankrupt's estate; and they alleged that the bill of sale was itself an act of bankruptcy, and that at the time the goods were in his order and disposition.

The bill prayed for a declaration of the rights of the parties, and for payment of the 3,500*l.* and interest. It also prayed that the estate might be foreclosed.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Bevir, for the plaintiff.—The legal estate in the hereditaments was in the plaintiff. He had joined with Col. Waugh in the appointment of, and in the attornment to W. Aplin as receiver; the reddendum was to W. Aplin, or any future receiver. He had full right to take the goods for the rent reserved; and Col. Waugh and his assignees were therefore estopped, not only from disputing the distress, but also from claiming any interest in the goods.—

Mr. Dickinson, for W. Aplin, supported the distress he had made.

Mr. Follett and Mr. Tindall, on behalf of parties representing the London and Eastern Banking Company.—Col. Waugh, by a deed, dated the 14th of March 1857, assigned the goods distrained to the company. They had given priority to the plaintiff for 7,000*l.* lent to Col. Waugh, and so far they disclaimed any interest in the 3,500*l.*

Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Giffard and Mr. J. Brown, for the assignees of Col. Waugh.—No tenancy was created by the deed executed by Col. Waugh; neither could any right of distress exist against the goods of Col. Waugh after his bankruptcy, by virtue of any act or deed done by him previous to the bankruptcy. The act of bankruptcy rendered null and void against the assignees any act done or deed executed which related to goods and chattels in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. The interest of the tenant was less than that of a tenant at will. Col. Waugh could determine it by paying off the mortgage, and the mortgagee could also put an end to it on the breach of any of the covenants in his security. The whole facts relating to the receivership and the appointment of the receiver were stated upon the deed; all parties had full notice of the dealings and of the non-existence of any actual tenancy. It was a sham: a means to an end, to be wrought out through a multitude of securities. If there was any estoppel in the case, it was against the plaintiff and his agent W. Aplin. They could not deny the facts stated in the deed, and they knew that Col. Waugh had no reversion in the estate which could enable him to create any estate to support a distress against his goods. The whole transaction rested in contract and covenant, which by leave and licence might enable W. Aplin to seize the goods of the party for a breach of that contract. It gave no interest in the goods either to Mr. Jolly or to his agent. They remained the goods of Col. Waugh, and by his bankruptcy they passed to and became the property of the assignees, and could not be made available, except by his assignees on the general administration of his estate. In Dancer v. Hastings the party took a lease from a receiver of the Court of Chancery, and having done that he could not deny his title or plead that he had not held the estate.—

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.— This question depends on the relative position of the parties. In order to constitute a good distress, it was admitted that the relation of landlord and tenant must subsist between the parties distraining and distrained upon; and, on behalf of the plaintiff, it was argued that this relation was expressly created between Col. Waugh and Mr. Aplin by the deed of the 12th of October 1855, not only by the attornment, but also by an actual demise and other express provisions. It is also argued that if the relation of landlord and tenant did not in reality subsist, still that Col. Waugh and all persons who claim under him are estopped from alleging the contrary by the express words of the deed executed by him, and Dancer v. Hastings is relied upon to support that proposition. In that case a tenant had accepted a lease from a receiver appointed by this Court. The Court of Common Pleas unanimously decided that he was estopped from disputing the right of the receiver to distrain. On the other side it is argued, that the relation of landlord and tenant did not subsist in the present case, and that as the right to distrain was incidental to the reversion in the land, subject to the lease, so no right to distrain existed in W. Aplin, inasmuch as no reversion was vested in him, and that Col. Waugh and those claiming under him were not estopped from alleging this fact, as the deed which is supposed to create the tenancy shews, on its face that W. Aplin had no interest in the reversion or in the lease. It is admitted that the covenants contained in the deed will bind Col. Waugh, and that, consequently, his goods and chattels are liable to any distress made by W. Aplin; but that this covenant cannot go further, and that the peculiar rights attaching to landlords against what have been the goods of the tenant, but have ceased to be such when the distress is levied, do not apply; and that, consequently, although it be true that the goods and chattels of Col. Waugh are liable to the distress, yet as soon as he became bankrupt these goods became the property of his assignees, and could not be taken through a distress levied by W. Aplin by virtue of the power given to him. Upon examination Dancer v. Hastings seems to be less favourable to the plaintiff than it might at first appear. The person distrained on had accepted a lease from the receiver of the Court of Chancery simpliciter, and the Court of Common Pleas held, that he could not afterwards say that the receiver had not demised the land to him. Here, Col. Waugh has attorned to the receiver, but he has done so under the deed, which sets forth and explains the rights and interests of all parties; and by so doing it shews that the relation of landlord and tenant did not actually subsist between Col. Waugh and W. Aplin. On the contrary, it shews that the relation of landlord and tenant existed, if at all, between the plaintiff and Col. Waugh. If the plaintiff, instead of joining in the appointment of W. Aplin as receiver, had, under his mortgage-deed, entered into possession of the property, and had distrained upon Col. Waugh for non-payment of rent, it would have been very difficult for the assignees to have maintained any claim against the validity of that distress. This case, however, depends solely on the effect of the deed. It is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between a distress made by a person in the character of landlord, and the taking of the goods of the tenant under a covenant; this last, though it be called a distress, must be clearly distinguished from the former. The right of distraining incidental to the right to the reversion which exists in the property, subject to the lease to the tenant, is not disputed; if it should be, it is established by an abundance of authority, of which — v. Cooper is an instance. Here the receiver had no beneficial interest in the reversion, and none such was created by this deed. By virtue of his own title, therefore, W. Aplin could not make a valid distress. Is it, then, open for Col. Waugh, or any person claiming under him, to allege this fact? The same occurred in Dancer v. Hastings. The person there distraining had no interest in the reversion; but although this was so, yet it was held, that the tenant was estopped from alleging this fact by reason of the terms of the lease, which was a demise of land from the receiver to the tenant. Two distinctions, however, are to be noticed between that case and the present, one of which seems to have been suggested by one of the Judges at the close of that case, but I cannot say it was that upon which their judgment proceeded. Gazelee, J. observed that, "Probably it was not decided who was interested in the property, so that if the receiver were excluded, there would be no one who could distrain." A distinction was suggested by one of the Judges, which may possibly establish that a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery stands in a different relation to a receiver appointed by the actual owners. A receiver appointed by the owners is merely their agent, and it may be inferred that a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery is so appointed in consequence of the right to the property being in litigation and prior to its being determined who is the real owner; so that, unless some person can be appointed who shall have authority to receive and enforce payment of the rent, a portion of the property on which the Court is about to adjudicate may be lost. Whether this is a distinction which can be relied upon in all the cases I forbear to say. But the other distinction is, the difference between the deed in Dancer v. Hastings and the deed creating the right to distrain in the present case. The deed in that case must be inferred from the case itself to have been a simple demise from one person as owner to another as tenant. The deed is not set out, but I infer that must have been so from the terms of the case. But here the recitals and cove-ments contained in the deed shew that the real owner at law was the plaintiff, and in equity Col. Waugh's right was subject to the mortgage vested in the plaintiff. It was held in Dancer v. Hastings that the tenant is estopped by the deed from alleging the real state of the title—that he could not, in fact, go beyond the deed. But in this case no such estoppel arises. It is not necessary to go beyond the deed, because the deed itself, which alone is supposed to create the right to distrain, discloses what the real title is. In fact, the estoppel cannot be stated in this case without an obvious inconsistency. Estoppel is defined by Lord Coke to be when a man is concluded by his own act from alleging the truth. Accordingly, in Dancer v. Hastings the tenant was estopped by his own act, viz., the execution of a deed accepting a lease from the receiver, and thereby admitting the receiver to have a right to demise the land as landlord, from alleging that the receiver had not the reversion in the land at the expiration of the tenancy. I consider that to have arisen because the indenture of demise contained nothing except a demise, as from the owner of the land to the tenant. But here all the facts are fully set forth in the deed itself, which is supposed to create the right to distrain, and it shews, not only that W. Aplin had no reversion in the premises, but further, that the reversion at law was in the plaintiff. How can a party be estopped from alleging what appears on the face of the deed? This seems to be established by Pargeter v. Williams. But the distinction between the cases does not rest here; for this deed expressly provides that nothing alleged in it shall abridge the rights and interests of the mortgagee; but a lease from W. Aplin to Col. Waugh would very materially abridge these rights, if W. Aplin should grant a lease to Col. Waugh, which he might do if the relation of landlord and tenant simpliciter existed between them. W. Aplin is appointed receiver, not by the plaintiff or his agent, or to stand in his place alone to do what he, the plaintiff, might have done, but he is appointed by both, as the person who under the deed is to receive the rents from the tenants, and in particular the rent from Col. Waugh. Dancer v. Hastings, therefore, does not govern the present case, and under this deed the relation of landlord and tenant was not created between Col. Waugh and W. Aplin; and further, this deed shews that it was not the intention of the parties to create such a relation. The intentions of the parties to the deed are well expressed therein. They amount to this, that Col. Waugh shall pay his rent to W. Aplin for the purposes stated in the deed, but not for his benefit; and that if Col. Waugh do not so pay, W. Aplin is to be at liberty to distrain the goods of Col. Waugh; but that is not in the character of landlord as against the tenant, but by virtue of the covenant contained in the deed. This is then a licence to enter upon the lands of Col. Waugh and take his goods for the rent due; and then, as incidental to the covenant, this consequence follows, that the goods and chattels must be the property of Col. Waugh when taken, and that the moment, by his bankruptcy, they became the goods of his assignees, that moment the licence to W. Aplin became inoperative, and the covenant ceased to apply to the new state of things. It is not sufficient to support the case of the plaintiff to satisfy the Court that the parties to the deed intended to invest W. Aplin with the same powers as those which would have attached to him as landlord, if that character had been created. The law does not admit of that. If the relation of landlord and tenant had been created by deed between W. Aplin and Col. Waugh, the right to distrain would necessarily have been incidental to that character, although nothing was said about distress. It goes even beyond this, for if the relation of landlord and tenant did not in reality exist, but the apparent relation had been created by a deed which estopped the parties to it and all parties claiming under them from alleging the contrary, the distress would still have been valid. But, on the other hand, when the relation of landlord and tenant does not in reality exist, and when the deed which creates the relation between them, such as it is, discloses the real state of the title and of that relation, and, therefore, does not estop any party to the deed from alleging the real state of the title, then the distress levied on goods not the property of the tenant at the time when the distress is made is invalid, notwithstanding that the covenant contained in the deed be to the effect that the receiver shall possess the same powers of distress and entry against the tenant of which the landlord was possessed. And it is invalid for this reason, that it is not in the power of the parties to invest one another with that right and with that liability. A person who fills the character of landlord is entitled, for the purpose of obtaining payment of his rent in arrear, to distrain upon the goods and chattels in the possession of the tenant, or which had been the property of the tenant, but which at the time of the distress had ceased to be so. But such a right and corresponding liability are conferred upon landlords and imposed upon tenants only, and are confined to them; and accordingly, persons who do not fill that character cannot be clothed with those powers, or be made subject to those liabilities. It is true that W. Aplin could, up to the time of the bankruptcy of Col. Waugh, have distrained upon the goods of Col. Waugh for rent in arrear, but not because he was his lessor or landlord, or had any interest in the reversion, but because Col. Waugh by that covenant had enabled him to do so; but Col. Waugh's covenant only bound his own property, and the moment, by operation of law, property of this kind was transferred to the assignees, at that moment it ceased to be a matter which the covenant of Col. Waugh could affect. Freeman v. Edwards seems distinct: there a man seised in fee of certain copyhold lands, mortgaged them to the defendant by a covenant to surrender, and in the mortgage-deed he covenanted that if the interest should be in arrear, it should be lawful for the defendant to enter upon and distrain upon the land for the interest so in arrear, in the same manner as a landlord is authorized to do in respect of distresses for arrears of rent reserved upon leases for years. The defendant was duly admitted to the copyholds. The mortgagor then became bankrupt, and immediately afterwards the mortgagee distrained for half a year's interest then in arrear. It was held, that the relation of landlord and tenant did not subsist between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and that although under the deed the mortgagee might distrain upon the goods of the mortgagor, still, upon the bankruptcy, these goods became the property of his assignees, and the right to levy a distress upon them failed. I am of opinion, therefore, that the distress made by W. Aplin was invalid, and that the 3,500*l.* is the produce of property which, when taken, was the property of the assignees of Col. Waugh, and was not affected by Col. Waugh's covenant, and that, except by means of the covenant contained in the deed, neither W. Aplin nor the plaintiff had any power over it. The money must therefore be paid to the assignees of Col. Waugh, unless, in consequence of any arrangement, they ask that the bill should be dismissed.

Mr. Follett.—The official managers of the London and Eastern Bank hold a security on these goods; as between them and the assignees of Col. Waugh they are entitled to the goods. They had a bill of sale from Col. Waugh, but subsequently, to the extent of 7,000*l.*, they gave the plaintiff a priority. The goods were not in Col. Waugh at the date of his bankruptcy. As between co-defendants the Court will not decide the right to this property. The disclaimer of right against the plaintiff cannot establish a right in a co-defendant, so as to enable the Court to make a decree. The official managers ask, therefore, to have that part of the bill dismissed, or otherwise for an inquiry upon it, so that the question may be raised between the co-defendants. Neither the bill of sale nor the title of the official managers to possession are stated in the pleadings; no issue, therefore, has been raised between the co-defendants. This is not a question of foreclosure or redemption.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot accede to your request. The Court requires a defendant, if he makes a case not as against the plaintiff, but as against some other person, to state that case; and then, though the Court does not decide the point at the hearing between the co-defendants, still it puts it in a course of litigation, similar to what is done when a bill of interpleader is filed. But when a bill is filed against a defendant, and another party who might have a claim is made a party, and that third person disclaims all other title and interest in it, then that person is simply dismissed, and the Court determines the rights and interests in both the other parties only. Whether the disclaimer will affect any proceeding which may be taken hereafter, or whether they are to be treated as if they had not been made parties to the bill, is a question on which I shall not express an opinion. On this state of the record, however, I shall make a decree, declaring that the assignees of Col. Waugh are entitled to the 3,500*l.*, and the plaintiff must pay the costs, but I shall not allow him to add them to his security. In an interpleader suit the person who holds the fund retains his costs, but the litigants claiming the fund pay costs. Mr. Coleman, Mr. Bell, Mr. Aplin and Mr. Thomson must also have their costs paid by the plaintiff.

Production of Documents — Trustees — Cestui que Trust.

A testatrix devised an estate to trustees for fifteen years, and directed them to deliver up possession to such person as within that time should, to the satisfaction of her trustees, make out a right to the estate as heir-at-law to her uncle, who died owner of the estate; but in default of any such right being made out, the testatrix devised the estate to L. W. There were two claimants to the estate; but the surviving trustee, after laying various cases before counsel and taking their opinions, was satisfied with neither. After the expiration of the fifteen years, L. W. filed his bill against the trustee and the two claimants to obtain possession of the estate; and upon a motion by one defendant, a claimant,—Held, that the trustee was not bound to produce the cases laid before counsel, or their opinions, or any of the documents affecting the title to the estate.

Elizabeth Giffard, by her will, dated the 17th of January 1837, devised an estate, called Pont y Gwyddel, to Frederick Charles Philips, Philip Humberston, and Philip Stapleton Humberston, their executors, administrators and assigns, from the day of her decease, for the term of fifteen years, and until the 26th of March next following, upon trust to receive the rents, issues and profits, and apply the same for various purposes therein specified; and she directed that in case any person should at any period during the fifteen years establish his, her or their right and title to the Pont y Gwyddel estate, as heir-at-law of her late uncle, Edward Williams, who died the undoubted owner, to the entire satisfaction of the trustees of her will for the time being, then she directed her trustees to deliver up possession to such person or persons who might have established his, her or their claim to the satisfaction of her trustees for the time being, at the end of the term of fifteen years thereby granted: and she devised and appointed the same estates, subject to a mortgage-debt upon them, to such person and persons, to be settled by her trustees upon them in strict settlement. But in case no person should establish a claim to the same estates to the satisfaction of her trustees for the time being during the period of fifteen years, or if any person whose claim should be negatived by her trustees, and considered not duly established, should file a bill against her trustees, or apply in any way to a Court of equity or law to endeavour to compel her trustees to come to a different conclusion, and to give him, her or them possession of the same last-mentioned estates, then and on such proceedings being taken, she authorized and empowered her trustees for the time being, if they should so think fit, to convey such estates to the uses thereinbefore expressed concerning her estate called Nerquis Hall, and her other estates in the counties of Flint and Chester thereinbefore devised, for the benefit of Loyd Wynne and his family: and she gave, devised and appointed the same accordingly. And in order to assist her trustees in coming to a right conclusion in executing the trusts, and to prevent recourse to the Court of Chancery, she thereby declared that in case her trustees for the time being should have any doubt as to the validity of any claim brought before them with respect to the Pont y Gwyddel estate, it should be lawful for her trustees for the time being to consult any three barristers of eminence whom they might select as to the validity of such claim; and if her trustees should act upon the advice of any two such barristers, the judgment of her trustees for the time being, sanctioned by two of such three barristers, should be final and conclusive on the parties. And she thereby gave, devised and appointed her estates called Pont y Gwyddel to such person or persons who should during the period thereinbefore granted be the object of such determination and final selection of her trustees for the time being; but if none should be so selected during the period aforesaid, then the Pont y Gwyddel estate was to unite with her Nerquis Hall estate as before directed. And the testatrix appointed F. C. Phillips and P. Humberston executors of her will.

The testatrix died on the 19th of March 1842, and her trustees took possession of the Pont y Gwyddel estates.

William Thomas Williams and John Hughes Ellis, with others, sent in claims. Each alleged that he was the heir-at-law of E. Williams, whom the will mentioned as having died owner of the Pont y Gwyddel estate; the trustees, however, laid some cases before counsel and took their opinions, and afterwards intimated that they were not satisfied that the relationship was proved. Upon the expiration of the term of fifteen years the Rev. Loyd Wynne, the devisee of the estates in the event of no claim being established in accordance with the directions in the will, filed his bill in this court against P. S. Humberston, the surviving trustee of the will, and against W. T. Williams and J. H. Ellis, praying that it might be declared that the Pont y Gwyddel estate, notwithstanding the claims of the defendants, became on the 26th of March 1857 united with the Nerquis Hall estate and subject to the same uses and limitations. The plaintiff also prayed that he might be let into the receipt of the rents and profits.

In compliance with an order made on the 2nd of August 1858 by the chief clerk, by consent, upon the application of the defendant W. T. Williams, P. S. Humberston, his co-defendant, filed an affidavit with a schedule attached, setting out the cases and opinions, and the several documents in his possession. He, however, insisted that the cases which as trustee he had submitted to counsel upon the claims made to the estate, with the opinions thereon, and also the copies of certain papers and documents sent with the cases, were privileged and ought not to be produced.

The chief clerk, however, upon application being made to him for production, refused to entertain the objection, and ordered the documents to be produced.

Mr. C. Hall now asked that the order of the chief clerk might be varied: first, because W. T. Williams, as a defendant, was not entitled to ask a co-defendant to produce the documents; and secondly, because the case of W. T. Williams was not known, and the opinions were taken in contemplation of some proceedings, and were within the privilege claimed in such cases.

Mr. Woodroffe, for W. T. Williams, claimed the production of the documents because the defendant P. S. Humberston was a trustee of the estate, and, as such, a trustee for the claimant. W. T. Williams, as cestui que trust, was interested in seeing that the inquiries were duly carried into effect in accordance with the directions of the will. The cases could only be prepared with reference to the claim and to assist in the investigation of the truth; they contained the facts on which a right was to be determined. W. T. Williams, therefore, had a direct interest in both the cases and the opinions, and also in the documents accompanying them. If they established the defendant's position, the trustee had no right to suppress the result; his discretion did not extend so far. If the production were refused on the ground that the applicant was a defendant, it would simply drive him to file a cross-bill — Wood v. Wood (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The defendant has not established any claim to an inspection of these documents. It is the rule that where the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is established, all cases and opinions taken by the trustee to guide himself in the administration of the trust, and not for the purpose of meeting any litigation against him, are open to be seen by the cestui que trust. They are then considered as not merely taken for the trustee to assist him in the execution of the trust, but for the benefit of the persons who are the objects of the trust. This case arises from the position in which the trustee is placed. It is apparently a judicial position, in which his mere decision is to determine the rights of the parties. Without, therefore, regarding the circumstance that W. T. Williams as defendant makes this application against P. S. Humberston, a co-defendant, but considering the application as made by a plaintiff against a defendant, still he is not entitled to see these documents as the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is not established. It is the case of a person who has not made out his title. If his right to inspection were admitted, it would be sufficient for any stranger to claim the estate, and then require the production of all the cases and opinions which had been taken as well as all the papers and documents submitted to counsel. This might be very injurious to the parties who were entitled to the estate. P. S. Humberston, therefore, is not bound to produce the documents, and in that respect the chief clerk's order must be varied.

Jurisdiction—Courts, General and Local—Stay of Proceedings.

Parties to a suit in a local court of limited jurisdiction cannot apply to stay proceedings in a court of general jurisdiction, when a part of the property in question is situate out of the limits of the local court.

The bill in this case was filed, on the 8th of November 1858, by Richard Lifton Wynne and Mary, his wife, she being one of the next-of-kin of John Edwards, who died on the 20th of November 1854, intestate, against Thomas Hughes, another of the next-of-kin, who had obtained letters of administration on the 7th of December 1854, and who also claimed to be the heir-at-law of the deceased, and against Har-mood Walcot Banner, praying for the administration of the real and personal estate of the deceased; the bill also prayed for a receiver, and for an account, including that of the net monies to arise from the conversion of divers real estates.

Two other suits were subsequently instituted in the Duchy Court of Lancaster, the one Banner v. Hughes, and the other Read v. Hughes; the bills in both these suits were filed on the 25th of November 1858. The suit of Banner v. Hughes was instituted by H. W. Banner against Thomas Hughes, for the execution of the trusts of two several indentures, dated the 28th of August 1848, which had been made by John Edwards, and that the rights of all parties might be ascertained in the unsold real estate. The bill also prayed for general accounts. In this suit a question was raised, whether certain real estates, conveyed by John Edwards, upon trust for sale, had been converted into personalty, and if so, whether it had by subsequent acts been reconverted into real estate. In case there had been no reconversion, it would be necessary to sell the real estate. A great part of the real estate was situate in the county of Chester, out of the jurisdiction of the Duchy Court.

The suit of Read v. Hughes was instituted by Margaret Read, one of the next-of-kin of John Edwards, against T. Hughes and H. W. Banner, in order that the personal estate of the deceased might be administered; that the trusts of the two deeds, so far as they were subsisting, might be executed; that the rights of the heir-at-law and the next-of-kin might be ascertained; that accounts might be taken of the personal estate of J. Edwards, and of his debts, &c., and of the property comprised in the indentures, and of the rents and profits, and of the proceeds of the sale, and that the net residue might be ascertained. The bill also prayed for a receiver, and that all sums of money, might be paid into the Duchy Court.

On the 29th of November 1858, there being no opposition, a decree was made in the Duchy Court, in both the suits of Banner v. Hughes and Read v. Hughes; it was immediately enrolled, and was then served on the plaintiff in this suit, and advertisements were published for the heir-at-law and next-of-kin, and several persons claiming to be next-of-kin of the deceased appeared by local solicitors, who entered their names at the registrar's office; but before any further proceedings were taken, Messrs. Banner and Hughes gave notice of motion, asking the Court to stay all further proceedings in this suit of Wynne v. Hughes.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Little, in support of the motion.—Messrs. Banner and Hughes have made the application in this court to avoid a discussion of whether the Duchy Court could stay the proceedings in this court; but had the Duchy Court made any such order, it could only operate in personam to the extent of the person's interests within the Duchy Court. The Duchy Court had clear jurisdiction over lands within its limits; it could also affect lands out of the jurisdiction, provided the parties having the legal estate were subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. It might order a sale of the lands out of the jurisdiction, and enjoin the parties to obey the decree. If these estates were not reconverted, such a decree would, in effect, make Mr. Hughes, who claimed to be the heir-at-law, and Mr. Banner, who had the legal estate in the lands, trustees for the next-of-kin, and upon a sale they could convey the estate to a purchaser. If a testator died in this country possessed of property here, and also seised of real estate in Ireland, this Court would make an order respecting the real estate in Ireland, when once it had ascertained that it had all the parties interested in the testator's estate before the Court.—

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Haynes.—There was no instance of parties to proceedings in a court of limited jurisdiction having ever applied to stay proceedings in a suit in Chancery. To give jurisdiction to a local Court, it was essential that it should have both the parties and the land within its limits. If the land was out of its jurisdiction, a decree appointing a receiver could avail nothing if the tenants refused to attorn. The Court, so far as the parties to the suit were concerned, might act in personam, but it could not act in rem, especially if there were any derivative interests existing in the property out of the jurisdiction.—

Mr. Selwyn, in reply.

Jan. 24.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This was a motion to stay proceedings in a cause in this court, by reason of a decree having been pronounced in the Duchy Court of Lancaster. There can be no question but that if the two Courts have co-extensive jurisdiction, and the two suits are so constituted that all that is required in one may be obtained in the other, this Court will stay the proceedings in the suit in which no decree has been pronounced, and will allow the other to proceed. But it is necessary to consider what the circumstances of this case are. Mr. Edwards, the intestate in the cause, in the month of August 1848, executed two deeds, which were, in point of fact, for one purpose only; one was for the sale of his real estate, and the other declared the trusts of the money which arose from the sale; they were, in point of fact, for the purpose of paying his debts. In the result, a large surplus remained of the property for the benefit of the settlor, and a considerable portion of it was not sold, and though by the deed it was absolutely converted into personal estate, it is alleged that a reconversion took place by the settlor, as he was desirous that it should be reconverted; and in consequence of that the question is, whether the property which now remains is to be distributed as real or as personal estate, in other words, whether it goes to the heir-at-law, or whether it goes to the next-of-kin. The same question arises in both suits, but in the course of the proceedings, and certainly, if the next-of-kin are declared entitled, it may become necessary to sell the real estate for the purpose of distributing the proceeds amongst the next-of-kin. A part of this real estate is situate in the county of Chester; it is out of the jurisdiction of the Duchy Court of Lancaster. I, therefore, cannot say that the suit in this court ought to be stayed. I should, however, not hesitate in staying the proceedings if the Duchy Court of Lancaster had complete and entire jurisdiction over the whole matter. It was argued that the decree of the Duchy Court acts in personam, and that, although it has no authority over the land itself, yet as it had authority over all the persons who are interested in the land in any manner whatsoever, it could, when all those persons were parties to the suit, pronounce a complete and effectual decree in the matter. It was also argued that no receiver could be appointed over the entire real and personal estate. It was also clear that a sale under a decree or order of the Duchy Court of land over which it had jurisdiction was a perfectly different and distinct thing from what it was where it directed persons who were before the Court to sell land over which the Court had no jurisdiction. Questions would arise of payments of money into court, of opening biddings, if the land were sold by the decree of the Court; in fact, the sale cannot take effect under a decree of the Duchy Court of Lancaster; and without going into long details familiar to every person accustomed to the practice of the High Court of Chancery and the various questions that arise out of it, I am of opinion that the plaintiff in Wynne v. Hughes might be put to considerable difficulties if I were to say that he was not to proceed with the suit at all. The proper course, therefore, is not to stay the suit of Wynne

v. Hughes, but to refuse this motion. At the same time, I shall reserve the costs of the motion until I see the course that may be taken, and the mode in which the suits of Banner v. Hughes and Read v. Hughes are conducted (1).

WOOD, V.C. { TAYLER v. THE GREAT Dec. 2; Jan. 13. { INDIAN PENINSULAR RAILWAY COMPANY
AND OTHERS.

Vendor and Purchaser—Deed executed in Blank—Negligence.

T, being the holder of certain shares in a company upon which 20*l.* each had been paid up, and being also entitled to other shares in the same company upon which 2*l.* each had been paid, instructed his broker to sell the 2*l.* shares. The broker sold the 20*l.* shares, and brought to T. for execution by him deeds of transfer in which blanks were left for the name of the transferee, and for the number and numbers of the shares. The deeds bore stamps high enough to carry the 20*l.* shares, and were executed in blank by T. The deeds were delivered in this condition, together with the share certificates for the 20*l.* shares, which had been fraudulently obtained by the broker, to bona fide purchasers, who filled up the blanks. Upon a bill filed by T.—Held, that the deeds of transfer were void, and that he was entitled to the shares expressed to be transferred thereby, and to have his name restored to the register.

The bill in this case was filed for the purpose of having it declared that certain transfer deeds of shares in the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company signed by the plaintiff were void, and for an injunction to restrain the registration of the deeds or any other dealing with the shares, and for other relief.

The plaintiff, a barrister, was the owner and registered holder of 120 shares in the company, upon each of which 20*l.* had been paid up, and he afterwards became entitled to sixty new shares in the same company, subject to the payment of 2*l.* deposit per share, making altogether 120*l.*, for which he gave his broker, Mr. Bourdillon, a cheque, with instructions to pay the deposit. Shortly afterwards, being desirous of selling the new shares, he instructed Bourdillon to sell them, and Bourdillon afterwards informed him that he had sold them, and brought him two printed forms of deeds of transfer, which the plaintiff signed, believing them to be deeds of transfer of the sixty new shares; but the name of the transferee was not then inserted in either of the deeds, and in each deed a blank space was left for the name of the transferee as well as for the number and numbers of the shares purported to be transferred, and the broker then informed the plaintiff that the blanks could not be filled up until it was known how the shares were to be divided. These deeds, when executed by the plaintiff, were stamped respectively 5*l.* and 3*l.*, and when the blanks were filled up, the deeds appeared to be transfers of 20*l.* shares; one of the deeds being for fifty such shares, and the other for thirty.

On receiving notice from the secretary, that these transfers had been presented for registration, the plaintiff discovered that the blanks had been filled up with 20*l.* shares, and that the deposit upon the 2*l.* shares had never been paid by Bourdillon, though the cheque for 120*l.* was returned by the bankers as cashed. The plaintiff thereupon wrote to the secretary, requesting that the transfers might not be acted upon, and filed the present bill against the company and the transferee.

The defendants, the purchasers of the shares, by their answer stated, that when the deeds of transfer were handed over to them by Bourdillon, they contained the number and description of the shares; but admitted that the numbers of the shares as well as the consideration, 1,000*l.* and 600*l.* respectively, were added by their authority. They insisted that the purchase-money was really paid in full to Bourdillon, by whose acts, as the accredited agent of the plaintiff, the plaintiff must be bound.

With regard to the blanks for the names of the transferees, it appeared that the purchasers, who were stock-jobbers, purchased the shares to sell again; but not having re-sold them by the settling-day, they, in accordance with the long-established usage of the Stock Exchange, desired

Bourdillon not to fill in the name of the transferee, which they would fill in themselves when they had disposed of the shares; the object of this being avowedly to save the expense of the extra stamp.

It further appeared that, at the time of delivering over the deeds of transfer, Bourdillon had also handed to them the share certificates of the eighty 20*l.* shares, which he had fraudulently obtained from the company.

It was not disputed that the shares had been bona fide purchased from Bourdillon, who had misappropriated the money, and the only question was, upon whom, under these circumstances, the loss should fall.

The account of the transaction which was given by the defendants, the purchasers, and which was adopted by the Vice Chancellor, was as follows:—"We are stock and share dealers, and members of the Stock Exchange, London, and I, the said Stephen Spurling, for several years past, have carried on business extensively as a dealer in stock and shares, and from the month of January last we have carried on such business in co-partnership together. In and for several years previously to the month of July last, Charles Bourdillon carried on business as a stock and share broker, and was also a member of the Stock Exchange. Previously to the 28th of July 1857 we had had various transactions with the said Charles Bourdillon in the way of his business as a stock and share broker, and the said Charles Bourdillon was, on the said 28th of July, and for several weeks subsequently, in full credit as, and was a duly qualified and accredited broker, carrying on business on the Stock Exchange. On the said 28th of July last, the said C. Bourdillon as such stock and share broker as aforesaid, offered to me, the deponent, S. Spurling, for sale on the Stock Exchange, sixty Great Indian Peninsular Railway 20*l.* shares, which he represented he had for sale as a broker, and I accordingly agreed with him for the purchase of such sixty shares, at the price of 19½ per share, being the then market price of such shares, and a note of such purchase was entered in our books, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange. In the latter part of the same 28th day of July last the said

C. Bourdillon offered to sell to me twenty more of the said Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company 20*l.* shares, which he represented he had for sale as a broker, and I agreed with him for the purchase of such further 20*l.* shares, at the price of 19½ per share, being the then market price of such shares, the market having in the course of the day somewhat declined, and a note of such last-mentioned purchase was made in our books; the said purchases were made on account of me and my said co-partner in the usual course of our partnership business. . . . According to the usual course of business, as between brokers and dealers on the Stock Exchange, we, on the then next settling-day, being the 30th of July, adjusted our account with the said C. Bourdillon for the said eighty shares, and for some other transactions we had had with him during that month, when there appeared to be a balance in his favour, including the purchase-money of the said shares, of 1,624*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, which last-mentioned sum, on the following day, being the 31st of July, was paid by us to the said C. Bourdillon, by a cheque on our bankers, and which cheque was duly paid when presented. Contemporaneously with such payment, and in exchange for the said cheque, the said C. Bourdillon delivered over to us the certificates of eighty 20*l.* shares in the said Great Indian Peninsular Company, together with two deeds of transfer of the said shares executed by the plaintiff, one of such deeds of transfer being on a 5*l.* stamp, and purporting to be a transfer of fifty shares in the said company, and the other being on a 3*l.* stamp, and purporting to be a transfer of thirty shares in the said company. We say that we, being dealers in shares, purchased the said shares to sell again, and not intending to hold them; but not having resold them by the settling-day, we, in accordance with the long-established usage of the Stock Exchange, desired the said C. Bourdillon not to fill into the transfers the name of the transferee, but to leave it in blank, and we would fill in the name ourselves when we had disposed of the shares; and a few days afterwards, having a loan open with Messrs. J. H. Spurling & Son, we, with their consent, filled in the name of the defendant P. Spurling into the said two deeds of transfer, as the transferee of the said shares, and in part satisfaction of the said loan, and at the same time added thereto the numbers of the shares, according to the certificates which had been delivered to us."

With regard to the practice on the Stock Exchange, several dealers made affidavits to the following effect:—"It is the constant practice of brokers and dealers on the Stock Exchange to have the transfers of shares which they have to sell executed by the vendors in blank, and to fill in the name of the purchaser, the amount of the consideration-money and the particulars of the shares intended to be sold, after the bargain is made with the purchaser. A broker having in his possession the certificates of the shares proposed to be sold, and a blank deed of transfer executed by the party in whose name the shares stand, is, according to the invariable practice and usage of the Stock Exchange, considered and dealt with as the authorized agent of the party in whose name the shares stand, to sell and receive the purchase-money for the shares. This usage and custom is so firmly established that it is daily acted upon. I have myself frequently acted upon it, and bought and sold shares upon the credit of blank transfers signed by the vendors; and it would, as I verily believe, most materially interfere with the course of business on the Stock Exchange, and introduce great delay and difficulties in the transaction of business, if the practice should be interfered with."

The following passages occurred in other affidavits made by dealers:—

"As far as I know, this transaction would be considered amongst the jobbers a regular and usual transaction. I cannot speak about the brokers. In my opinion, it would make no difference in the regularity of the transaction, if the consideration and the numbers of the shares were omitted, with such men as Spurling and Bristowe; with other men the omission of the name of the transferee might make a difference. With some men I would not enter into a time bargain at all. If the stamp were on the transfer that would represent the amount of consideration that must be filled in. In this case an 8*l.* stamp was on the transfer, which would shew that the shares were meant to be 20*l.* shares. If there was a stamp on the name of the transferee, and the number or numbers of the shares omitted, I think that would make no difference, because the certificates would have to be delivered with the transfer, and these would give the numbers. All the difference would be, that the buyer's clerk would enter the numbers instead of the seller's. We only know the broker. We know no one else in the transaction. It is for the accommodation of the jobber, and usually at his request, that the transferee's name is omitted."

"I have known many instances of such practice. The jobbers, for their own convenience, are always desirous to make use of this practice. . . . As far as I have seen blank transfers, the name of the shares and the numbers of them are generally filled in, but not invariably so. The consideration-money most frequently is not filled in. If the numbers are not filled in, but the certificates are handed over, the only practical difficulty is, that there might be a mistake. It would also be a satisfaction to the seller to see that he is only signing a transfer for the shares of which he has given up the share certificates. The number is inserted for the seller's protection."

Mr. Rolt, Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Walford, for the plaintiff.—The deeds of transfer are absolutely void. Bourdillon could have no authority to fill up the blanks without a power of attorney; and if the purchaser, leaving the documents with all the blanks, had filed his bill for specific performance he must have failed.—

Mr. Rolt replied.

Jan. 13.—WOOD, V.C., after stating the facts at some length as narrated above, said that, undoubtedly, Mr. Tayler was guilty of considerable negligence in executing the transfers in blank, as of course he expected the transaction to be completed through the operation of the instruments so signed by him in blank, and also in not noticing that the stamps were sufficient to carry the 20*l.* shares. As soon, however, as he had by a fortunate accident received from the secretary notice that the two transfers had been left for registration, he immediately wrote a reply, saying he had only signed transfers for sixty 2*l.* shares, and also wrote to Bourdillon for an explanation. There was no laches after this, and the question now was, whether he was entitled to have these transfers declared void as against himself, and several authorities had been cited to shew that he must be held to have lost his right with respect to the shares in question. The first question raised was, whether the transfers themselves were operative. Upon that there could hardly be the shadow of a doubt after the decision in Hibblewhite v. M'Morine. It would be absurd after that decision to contend that the transfer was valid. In that case Tayler—

v. Evans (4), where Lord Mansfield held that a bond was valid which was given with the name of the obligee and sum in blank to a broker to obtain money upon it, was cited as an authority for the validity of a transfer deed executed with the name of the purchaser in blank; but the Court of Exchequer expressly overruled the decision. It is said that Hibblewhite v. M'Morine was decided on merely technical grounds, but if the policy of the law is to be maintained it follows that before an agent can legally fill up blanks in an instrument, he must be authorized to do so by an instrument equally solemn in form. There is no question whatever, therefore, that when these instruments were delivered to the purchasers they passed on the face of them no legal interest. The question then arises, how far the plaintiff is answerable for his own negligence. The case of Schultz v. Astley was the case of a bill of exchange, and it was held no objection to its validity that the acceptance and indorsement were written before the bill was drawn. But no seal is required to a bill of exchange, and the Court considered that there was an implied agency. Young v. Grote, which was cited on the question of negligence, was a case where a person having an account at a bank left with his wife certain blank cheques signed by himself, with directions to her to fill them up, and she caused one to be filled up with the words "fifty-two pounds two shillings," the "fifty" being commenced with a small letter, and placed in the middle of the line and the figures "52, 2" being also placed at a considerable distance from the printed £. The person to whom the check was delivered having inserted the words "Three hundred and" before the "fifty," and the figure "3" before the "52," and the banker having paid the 352*l.* 2*s.*, the question was upon whom the loss must fall, and the Court held that it must fall upon the customer, proceeding partly on the ground of negligence and partly, by analogy to the doctrine applicable to bills of exchange, on the ground that the banker was bound to pay to the order of his customer. In that case the alteration was made in such a manner that no person using due and ordinary diligence could have discovered that it had been made improperly. But if the added words had been interlined or badly written, the banker would not have been exonerated. These are the sort of cases that have been cited for the defendants. Then the rule laid down by Ashurst, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason, has been cited, that whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it. Of course there can be no doubt about that proposition; but the contention of the defendants is, that, through the negligence of the plaintiff, though they have no legal title, they have acquired the equitable right. I think they have plainly no right. They must be taken, as everybody must be taken, to have known the law; and when Bourdillon presented to them these transfers they knew that both the numbers of the shares and the name of the purchaser were left in blank. But then it is said that, according to the custom prevailing between brokers and jobbers, the person holding the share certificates is considered as having the title, and it is the universal practice to accept transfers signed in blank. But how can the Court recognize that as a custom of trade which is plainly illegal? One of the witnesses states candidly in his affidavit that it is done for the purpose of avoiding the stamp. Surely no Court can recognize such a custom as that as a legal one, or one which Tayler was bound to take notice of.—[His Honour referred at some length to the evidence adduced as to the custom, the effect of which is already stated, and proceeded:]—The defendants have themselves been guilty of great negligence in taking a transfer in such a form as this. For all they knew, Bourdillon might have had in his hand the certificates for the 2*l.* instead of the 20*l.* shares. Tayler's negligence was unquestionably very great, but if these defendants had done what the law required them to do, they would have had nothing to complain of; and, therefore, though Tayler's negligence was the primary cause of the misfortune, yet, as they have preferred following an illegal practice to one which would have made them safe, they must abide by the consequences of their own acts. Then, it is said further, that the plaintiff is not entitled to come into equity for relief, but must stand on his legal rights alone; but he is obliged to come here for the injunction, and also for the purpose of having the shares re-delivered to him. It must be declared that the several deeds of transfer are void, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the shares expressed to be transferred thereby, and to have his name restored to the register. He trusted Bourdillon to the extent of the sixty 2*l.* shares, and he must give up the money received in respect of them; and upon his submitting to that, he will have his costs of the suit.

Ward of Court—Marriage after Twenty-one—Settlement—Fund in Court—Jurisdiction.

A female ward of Court married a fortnight after attaining twenty-one. Upon a joint petition of herself and her husband, asking for payment of a fund in court, part of her fortune, to her husband, the Court refused to examine the lady, who offered to attend for that purpose, and it also refused to accede to the prayer of the petition, but made an order directing the dividends of the fund to be paid to the husband during the joint lives of himself and his wife, without prejudice to any question. The order of the Court was made precisely on the same footing as if the lady had been examined in court, and had expressed in the strongest manner her desire that not any part of the fund should be settled.

The facts of this case are reported ante, p. 40. Application was made to the Lords Justices, by way of appeal from the order made by the Master of the Rolls, or rather that their Lordships would be pleased to hear the petition without the parties being put to the trouble and expense of a formal petition of appeal.

Mr. Dean supported the application.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The Master of the Rolls has made the order; it is therefore impossible to hear the petition without the parties being at the trouble of presenting an appeal.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—If, upon application to the Master of the Rolls, his Honour shall think fit to withdraw the order, and express a wish that we should hear the original petition, we may be able to do so.

Mr. Dean, on the same day, stated that the Master of the Rolls had consented to withdraw the order, and requested the Lords Justices to hear the petition.

Their Lordships ordered the case to be put into the paper on the first petition day after the term.

Dec. 4.—Mr. Dean read from the affidavits of the mother, daughter and husband that the intimacy had lasted for two years, and that the property to which the daughter was entitled in possession was 483*l.* consols, 96*l.* reduced, and 1*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.* cash; that there was due to her mother for her support about 400*l.*, which all parties had agreed should be paid to that lady; that the husband was fully competent to support his wife, and that the mother was the tenant for life of a considerable sum of consols, which at her death would be divisible among her three daughters, of whom Mrs. Jackson was one.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—My impression is that a contempt has been committed, though I do not give any conclusive opinion. I have no objection, however, to the husband receiving out of court the sums to which his wife is entitled at once, if he expresses a willingness to execute a settlement, if called upon, of the reversionary property to which she will become entitled in possession on her mother's death.]

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—If the small sums are paid out, I think the easiest way will be for the lady to appear before us, and that at the same time a draught of a settlement of the reversionary property should be submitted to the Court. I give no opinion whatever on the question of contempt.]

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Mrs.

Jackson can communicate to us when it will be agreeable to her to appear for examination, and her husband to say whether he accedes to the views expressed by this Court as to the settlement.]

Mr. Dean said that their Lordships' pleasure should be communicated to the parties; and though he would not trouble the Court with any statement of the cases on this important subject, yet he might say that in those of marriage, even so soon after an infant had attained twenty-one as one day, a contempt was held not to have been committed.

Jan. 11.—Mr. Dean stated that the pleasure of their Lordships had been communicated to the parties, but that Mrs. Jackson positively declined to accede to the proposition made by the Court as to a settlement, and expressed her desire that the prayer of the petition should be acceded to. It was in total ignorance on the part of the lady, of her mother and of her present husband that the young lady was a ward of Court; that that gentleman made her an offer of marriage, but the mother objected that her daughter ought not to marry under the age of twenty-one, and in that decision the young lady concurred. The marriage was accordingly postponed until August last, and then, a fortnight after she attained her majority, the marriage took place.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE observed that it seemed quite clear that where a ward of Court married during infancy, the Court would retain its hold over the property of the ward, and, if a female, would pay no regard to her wishes, but settle the property as in its discretion it thought most for her benefit. What, however, was doubtful to his Lordship was, whether, where an infant ward of Court receives proposals of marriage during her infancy, and a marriage takes place after her majority on the footing of the proposal before made, such a marriage did not stand in all respects as regarded property on the same footing as if it had taken place during minority.]

Mr. Dean then proceeded to argue that if the rule was to be established according to the intimation just thrown out by the Lord Justice Knight Bruce, that when a marriage takes place with a female ward of Court after her majority upon the footing of an engagement or understanding entered into while she was under age, the parties should be treated in precisely the same way as if they had married while she was an infant, it would be carrying the doctrine much further than any previous authorities had placed it. The rule regarding such a subject was thus distinctly stated by Lord Eldon, in the case of Austen v. Halsey (1), which was a leading case. His Lordship said, "He wished it to be understood that though a female ward of the Court, when of age, might make whatever settlement of her property she pleased, and might effectuate this by consenting personally in court, or under a commission for the purpose; yet that, where this was not done, her property would never be discharged from the protection of the Court, except by the order of the Court, and, consequently, until such proceeding, she and her property must always be considered as having the protection of the Court still around her." If a female ward of Court could make whatever settlement of her property she pleased, what difference, it might be asked, could it make that she chose to make no settlement at all? That case was followed by Sir John Leach, in Long v. Long (2), where the marriage took place the day after the ward attained twenty-one, and yet it was held that no contempt was committed, and that that portion of the lady's property, to the payment of which she had given her consent in court, was bound by that consent. The same principle was recognized by Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in Money v. Money (3), where the marriage was purposely postponed until a few days after the ward attained twenty-one. So also their Lordships, sitting in the full Court of Appeal, had, in an unreported case, decided on the 5th of March 1858 (4), followed the same rule, and had overruled a decision of the Master of the Rolls, directing a settlement on the ground that the marriage had taken place three days after the ward attained the age of twenty-one years.

(3) 3 Drew. 256; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 684.

(4) Longbottom v. Pierce.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I have totally forgotten that case.]

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I have examined my note book of the day, and find nothing of such a case.]

The registrar's book of the 5th of March 1858 was handed up, but the only note of Longbottom v. Pierce was, that the full Court agreed with the Master of the Rolls that no examination was necessary.

Mr. Everitt Stiffe, counsel in Longbottom v. Pierce, said that the full Court of Appeal appeared to think that the rule ought to be settled, and that if the Court had jurisdiction over the property of a ward after majority for one day, it had jurisdiction indefinitely. He also stated that the order was made on the mere volition of the lady. The sum there was small.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE, for himself, said, if he had expressed himself differently in Longbottom v. Pierce to what he had said in the case before the Court, he considered that he was in error.]

Mr. Dean.—If the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, and followed by Sir John Leach and Sir Richard Kindersley, and supposed to have been followed by their Lordships, were not to be adopted as the settled rule of the Court, where is the line to be drawn? There must be some time when a woman, whether married or single, becomes the absolute mistress of her property under the controul, or at least in the custody of the Court; and it is difficult, if not impossible, to say that any time could be fixed, except that recognized by the law of the country, as the period of majority. At that time a lady may dispose of her real estate by deed, acknowledged in conformity with the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74), and it has been held, that she may equally dispose of her personalty by giving her consent in court, after being duly examined as to her wishes on the subject. The only cases in which the rule of Lord Eldon has been departed from are when a contempt of the Court has been committed, or when, if no actual contempt has been committed, yet so strong a case of concert has been established to defeat its intentions, and in some instances the positive directions of the Court; in all which cases the Court has held the parties bound —

Re Anne Walker (5) (a gross case of contempt), Martin v. Forster (6), Ball v. Coutts (7). In the present case there can be no question the Court has done all it can to obtain a proper provision for the wife, but both she and her husband at present positively decline to accept the benefits intended for her by the offer their Lordships had already made. She again tenders herself for examination, and will hear, respectfully, the suggestions the Court may kindly throw out for her guidance. If, however, their Lordships should refuse to examine her as to her understanding of her rights, and as to her wishes on the subject of her property, it will be depriving her of the advantages of the highest advice which, even at this late stage of the proceedings, she might have to induce her to alter her determination. If she, even then, should still refuse to have a settlement, it is submitted that the Court has no jurisdiction to settle her property against her own wishes; and if it has not the power to direct a settlement, there is no reason why she should not have the same enjoyment of it and controul over it as she would have over any real estate she may have. In conclusion, he (Mr. Dean) was instructed to say that the parties declining, as they did, to make the settlement proposed by the Court, would, rather than accept the offer of their Lordships on a former occasion, have the whole matter referred into chambers on the question of settlement. It was extremely desirable that the Court should at once state its opinion whether the parties were bound, in the circumstances of the case, to make a settlement.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—No. We are not about to make any such declaration. We shall not say you are bound to make a settlement, nor are we about to give the money.]

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—If a settlement be made of the reversionary property, we shall have no difficulty about the money in court.]

Their Lordships then, on the application of Mr. Dean, allowed the petition to stand over.

(7) 1 Ves. & B. 292.

Jan. 24.—Mr. Dean asked that the Court would also name a day on which the lady might appear and be examined by their Lordships, and state whether she still objected, as she did at present, to make a settlement of her property, and if it should appear that she still objected, their Lordships would then decide whether they would think fit to hold the property to which she was entitled until the death of herself or her husband.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—If there were no objection to a settlement, of course there would be no difficulty in the matter. The lady's declaration, that she objects to a settlement, will make no difference whatever; so far as I am concerned, it will not have the least weight with me.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—You have the opinion of the Master of the Rolls against you, Mr. Dean, on the principal point in the case. His Honour's order was discharged by himself, but the opinion remains the same.

The order made was:—"Let the cash in court arising from the dividends of the stock be paid to the petitioner, Mr. Jackson, the husband, as also the dividends to accrue in future during the joint lives of himself and Mrs. Jackson until the further order of the Court, without prejudice to any question, with liberty to apply in the mean time."

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—You should understand, Mr. Dean, and the parties themselves should be informed, that the order now made is precisely on the same footing as if Mrs. Jackson had been examined in court, and had expressed in the strongest manner an opinion against having any part of the funds settled.

Legacy—Gift to A. R. and her Children.

A testator gave leasehold premises to M. R. for life, and at her death to A. R. and her children; but if they should die without issue, in that case the property was to be divided between four persons, nominatim. A. R. had no children either at the death of the testator or of the tenant for life:—Held, that A. R. took only an estate for life, with remainder to her children.

Held, also, that the rule in Wild's case has no application to personality.

By a lease, dated the 25th of June 1803, certain leasehold property, now the site of Hanserd Place, Blackfriars Road, was demised to Thomas Hanserd and his assigns, from the 24th of June 1803, for the term of ninety-five years, at the rents and subject to the covenants therein mentioned.

Thomas Hanserd, by his will, dated the 18th of August 1818, bequeathed Hanserd Place to his daughter, Mary Rossiter, during her life, and at her death to the defendant, Amelia Rossiter, and Amelia Rossiter's children; but if they should die without issue, in that case the property to be divided between William Hanserd, John Tuttle and John Learry and Maria Learry.

The testator died on the 6th of February 1819, and his will was proved by his widow, Mary Hanserd, and by William Hanserd and John Tuttle, whom he appointed his executors. On the 1st of July 1834, Amelia Rossiter intermarried with Joseph Horn.

On the 9th of January 1835 Mary Rossiter died, at which time there was no child born of Amelia Horn.

By an assignment, dated the 6th of December 1843, Joseph Horn and his wife and William Hanserd mortgaged the premises comprised in the lease, with the appurtenances, to secure to John Audsley the repayment of 220*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent.

On the 21st of January 1849 John Audsley made his will, and appointed the plaintiffs, Elizabeth and James Audsley, his executor and executrix. He died on the 27th of February 1849, and they proved his will.

On the 24th of March 1852, J. Horn and his wife and W. Hanserd further charged the same premises to secure to the plaintiffs the sum of 198*l.* 5*s.* and interest, in addition to the 220*l.* and interest, and declared that the premises should not be redeemable until both sums were paid.

Joseph Horn died on the 17th of April 1857, leaving his widow and six children surviving, and then in possession of the premises.

The bill in this case was filed, by the executors of J. Audaley, against Amelia Horn, and by amendment against her children, praying for a declaration that she was absolutely entitled to the leasehold premises, and that in default of payment of what was due upon the mortgage, she might be foreclosed from all equity of redemption.

Dec. 6.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—

As an ordinary rule, nothing ought to be determined in such a suit as this but the validity or invalidity of the mortgage. The parties to the mortgage-deed, or those claiming under them, are usually the only parties to the cause, but by an arrangement, or at least by a proceeding on the part of the plaintiffs, acquiesced in by the defendants, persons not parties to the mortgage are made defendants to the bill, that they may argue and have determined a question arising upon the will of Thomas Hanserd as to what estate or interest Amelia Rossiter took in the leaseholds mortgaged to the plaintiffs. The gift was to her and her children, but if they should die without issue then over. Amelia Rossiter had no children at the date of the will or at the testator's death, or at the death of Mary Rossiter. It is contended that the gift was either a quasi estate tail in Amelia Rossiter, upon the principle of Wild's case, or that it was an estate to Amelia Rossiter and her children as joint tenants; and that upon the latter assumption, as there were no children alive at the time when the gift took effect, Amelia Rossiter took the whole absolutely. Wild's case, however, cannot apply to the present case. The devise there was to R. W. and his wife, and after their decease to their children. Here the gift is to Amelia Rossiter and her children, but if they should die without issue then over; and this distinction seems to have been noticed in Sugden's Law of Property, 237, in the comment upon the decision of Stokes v. Heron; but, with the exception of that case, it does not appear to have been laid down or even stated obiter that the rule in Wild's case applies to personal estate. In Stokes v. Heron this point was not decided by the House of Lords, though Lord Brougham expressed his opinion to that effect strongly, and he held that it applies equally to personal as to real estate; but it should be observed, that it was not necessary for the decision in that case, and that the applicability of this rule to bequests of personalty has been disputed in a great variety of cases, as Knight v. Ellis (1), Buffar v. Bradford and Stone v. Maule. Upon a review of all the cases, and setting aside some not easily reconcileable, I think the tendency of modern authorities has been, in cases like the present, to hold that in personalty the bequest gives an interest for life in the mother, with an interest in remainder to the children. Thus, in Crawford v. Trotter (2), a bequest to one and her children was held to give an interest for life to the mother, and a remainder to her children. In Morse v. Morse a bequest of a sum of money to the testator's daughter and her children was held to give an interest for life in the daughter, with remainder to all her children. This, notwithstanding there are cases not easily reconciled, is the view most consonant with the line of modern cases, and their tendency generally, and most in accordance with the spirit and intention of the testator. In Dawson v. Bourne and in Jeffery v. De Vitre (3) I adopted this view.

In this case, I must hold, that the bequest gave a life interest to Amelia Rossiter only, and that upon her death the leaseholds are divisible among her children, and, consequently, that all that the plaintiffs are entitled to is to foreclose the life interest of Amelia Horn. Therefore, as against the defendants who have been added by amendment, the bill must be dismissed, both because they are no parties to the mortgage-deeds, and also because the only question on account of which they have been made parties, has been decided in their favour.

Trustees — Appointment — Separation Deed.

Upon a separation between husband and wife a deed was executed, in which a trustee covenanted that, in the event of the husband allowing the wife to live separate and have the custody of their children, the trustee would indemnify the husband against the debts, &c. of the wife. Upon the decease of the trustee,—Held, as the deed contained no power to appoint new trustees, that the Court, under the Trustee Acts, had jurisdiction to appoint new trustees of the property.

By a settlement, dated the 19th of July 1844, made in contemplation of the marriage of Ann Clark with George Matthews, a sum of 1,000*l.*, secured by a promissory note, was vested in Stephen Clark and Benjamin Whitford, upon trust to invest the produce when got in and pay the income to arise therefrom to Ann Clark for her separate use for life, with remainder to G. Matthews for life, and after the decease of the survivor, upon trust for the children of the marriage, and in default thereof for the appointees or next-of-kin of Ann Clark.

(3) 24 Beav. 296.

In 1845 G. Matthews assured his life in the Provident Life Assurance Society, for a sum of 1,500*l.*, payable on his death, in consideration of the annual premium of 39*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*

G. Matthews subsequently borrowed of William Brooks a sum of 750*l.*, upon mortgage of a real estate at Dorn, in the county of Worcester, of which he was seised, and upon an assignment of the policy of assurance on his life.

In 1852 S. Clark purchased the equity of redemption of the real estate at Dorn from G. Matthews. At the same time he agreed to pay and relieve him from certain debts he had contracted. In the April previous he had also paid 39*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* for keeping the policy on foot.

On the 1st of October 1853, in consequence of differences, a deed of separation between G. Matthews and his wife was executed, and, after reciting the facts above stated and that there were two children of the marriage, viz., Sarah and Stephen Clark Matthews, it was witnessed that, in consideration of being indemnified from the debts of his wife, of the sum of 39*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*, and of himself and family having been maintained by S. Clark, he, G. Matthews, assigned the policy of assurance on his life, and also his reversion in the income to arise from the 1,000*l.* settled upon his marriage, to Stephen Clark, his executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust either to keep the policy on foot or at any time thereafter, except in the event thereafter specified, to sell or surrender the same and stand possessed of the money or other the sums payable on account of the policy, upon trust, after reimbursing himself all money and costs which he should have incurred in keeping the policy on foot, inclusive of the 39*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., to invest the money on government or real securities, and pay the income to Ann Matthews for life for her separate use, and after her decease for the children of the marriage and of their issue born in his lifetime, as she should appoint, with remainder in default for the children of the marriage equally, and in default of any who should attain a vested interest, upon trust for such persons as Ann Matthews should appoint by will, with remainder in default to her next-of-kin.

The deed also, in the event of the death of Ann Matthews, contained powers to maintain and educate the children. It also declared that the income to arise from the 1,000*l.* should be applied in payment of the premiums on the policy, and subject thereto as Stephen Clark, his executors, administrators or assigns, should in his or their discretion think fit, for the benefit of the children of the marriage, and, subject thereto, upon trust for G. Matthews and his assigns.

The deed also declared that it should be incumbent upon S. Clark to keep the policy on foot, unless the income of the monies assigned should be sufficient for that purpose, or to effect a fresh policy in case it should have been sold before the income of the monies assigned fell into possession, but he was to keep the policy on foot in the event of its not being sold when the income fell into possession.

G. Matthews then covenanted that so long as S. Clark, his executors, administrators and assigns, performed his covenants thereinafter contained, he, G. Matthews, would permit his wife to live separate as a feme sole, and to have the custody, charge and entire controul over the children, and that he, G. Matthews, without the consent of S. Clark in writing, would not take up his abode or permanent residence at any place within twenty miles of Chipping Norton, or come within five miles thereof for a temporary residence, or visit oftener than twice in any one year, and would not remain within the town or five miles thereof on the occasion of such visit or temporary residence longer than one week; and that in the event of any breach he would pay to S. Clark, his executors, administrators or assigns, 50*l.* within a month after demand.

Stephen Clark then covenanted that so long as G. Matthews should observe and perform his covenants, he, S. Clark, his heirs, executors and administrators, some or one of them, would at all times keep G. Matthews, his heirs, executors and administrators, indemnified against all liability or obligation to provide for and maintain his wife, and against her debts and engagements, and all actions, suits, claims and demands in respect thereof.

Stephen Clark died on the 18th of October 1858 intestate, and no person had taken out letters of administration to his estate.

Mrs. Matthews from the time of the separation had, with the assistance of her brother, maintained herself and her infant children, and she now presented this petition under the Trustee Acts, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, and the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55, praying the Court to appoint John Edwin Jenkins, John Warland and Thomas Haynes trustees of the deed of the 1st of October 1853, and to vest the property in them upon the subsisting trusts.

Mr. Charnock, in support of the petition.

Mr. Selwyn, for George Matthews.—There is no ground for asking the Court to appoint new trustees; it would in effect subject the husband to be harassed doubly, by the administrator of the deceased trustee and by the new trustees. The assignments made by the deed were, in consideration of covenants made by the deceased trustee, for the protection of the husband: the new trustees would not be liable to these. The petition, therefore, ought to be dismissed, and the costs paid by the next friend.

Hope v. Hope, 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 417.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am not asked to carry the provisions of this deed of separation into effect. It has been entered into between the parties and the property was vested in a sole trustee, who is since dead, and the deed contains no power to appoint new trustees. I am now asked to appoint three other persons to be trustees in his place, and I think the jurisdiction given by the acts enables me to make the appointment. This will neither alter the rights of the parties nor vary their interests under the deed: it will not affect the covenants entered into or the liabilities of the parties under them: it will merely appoint parties whose duty it will be to protect the property. I shall therefore make the order.

Legacy for Life—Power to appoint.

A residuary estate was bequeathed to trustees upon trust to permit the testator's wife to receive the income for life, and also to apply such parts of the capital to her own use as she should think proper, and after her decease to apply the residue to such persons as she by will should direct. The widow used no part of the capital, but by her will she directed that the property should be distributed as directed by the will of her husband:—Held, that the widow took a life interest only in the fund, with power to apply the capital for her own benefit, and if not so disposed of, with a power to appoint it by will.

The Rev. Charles Lionel Scott gave all the residue of his estate and effects, of what nature or kind soever, unto his wife, Sarah Scott, and James Josselyn (whom he appointed executrix and executor of his will), upon trust to permit his wife to receive or retain the annual produce thereof for her own use and benefit during her life, and also to apply to her own use and benefit so much and such parts of the capital thereof as she should think proper; and after her decease the testator directed that James Josselyn, or the trustees for the time being of his will, should stand possessed of the residue of his estate and effects, or so much thereof as should remain after such application of any portion thereof by his wife in manner aforesaid, upon trust for such person and persons, and for such intent and purposes in all respects as his wife by her will, or by any testamentary paper by her legally executed, should direct or appoint, and, in default of such appointment, he directed that the residue of his estate and effects, or so much thereof as should remain as aforesaid, should be holden upon trust to pay thereout the sums of money therein specified unto the several persons therein named, viz., amongst others, the sum of 1,500*l.* to his nephew, the plaintiff Thomas Edward Scott, and 1,600*l.* to his niece, the plaintiff Sarah Anne Stuart; and as to all the surplus of the residue of his estate and effects, the testator gave the same upon trust for the defendant, James Josselyn, his executors and administrators, for his and their own use and benefit absolutely. The testator died on the 18th of April 1845. The testator's widow received the annual produce of all the residue of the testator's estate and effects during her life, but she did not apply to her own use and benefit any part of the capital thereof. By her will, dated the 11th of May 1854, she expressly declared her mind and will to be that nothing therein contained should be deemed or construed to be an execution or exercise of the power of appointment given or reserved to her in and by the last will and testament of the said Charles Lionel Scott, her late husband, deceased, as to the residue of his estate and effects, or in any manner alter or affect the directions, trusts and dispositions, in the said will expressed, declared and contained thereof, in default of appointment, but that, on the contrary, the same trusts, directions and dispositions should be and remain in full force and effect; and the testatrix thereby nominated and appointed her brother, the above-named defendant, James Josselyn, and her nephew, James Josselyn, executors of her will. The testatrix died on the 29th of April 1858. The plaintiffs, as legatees under the will of the testator, instituted this suit, praying that their legacies might be paid out of the testator's estate. A question, however, was raised as to the extent of interest which the widow took in the estate of her husband.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Elderton, for the plaintiffs.—A limited interest only was given to the wife. This was followed by words giving her a power to dispose of the fund. She, therefore, took no absolute interest in the fund, but had merely a power of appointment.—

In re Sanderson's Will, 3 Kay & J. 597; s.c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 804.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. R. Moore, for the defendants.—The gift in the first instance was absolute, and the intention was explained by giving her power to dispose of the capital. Another power of appointment was then given, with a gift over in default, but this was inconsistent with the prior gift, and it was consequently void.—

Barton v. Barton, 3 Kay & J. 512.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In this case the residue was given to trustees for the wife for life, with a power to dispose of the capital in her lifetime, that is, they were authorized to pay it to any person she might direct. This was followed by a power enabling her by will to appoint what might remain. Her will merely referred to the gift to the plaintiff and others, in default of appointment. It appeared, therefore, to be plain that the widow took a life interest in the property, with a power to appoint the principal by her will. By her will she directed the funds to go in such manner as they had been disposed of by the testator in default of appointment. I must, therefore, make a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled.

Vendor and Purchaser — Advowson — Charge under Queen Anne's Bounty — Compensation.

A contract for sale, by the defendants to the plaintiff, of an advowson was entered into, subject to conditions of sale, one of which provided that if any objections and requisitions should be made which the vendors were unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendors might, notwithstanding any treaty or discussion in reference thereto, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same, annul the contract, without payment of costs. After the purchaser had accepted the title, disclosed in an abstract delivered to him by the vendors, and his solicitor had sent to their solicitor a draft conveyance for the vendors' approval *and execution, the purchaser's solicitor, upon a search at the office of Queen Anne's Bounty, discovered that the rectory was subject to a mortgage or charge payable to Queen Anne's Bounty, of which upwards of 600*l.* then remained undischarged. The vendors having refused to comply with the requisition that compensation should be made in respect of the deterioration of the value of the advowson by reason of the charge on the benefice, and insisting upon their right to rescind the contract according to the terms of the condition of sale, the purchaser filed his bill for specific performance of the contract with compensation. One of the Vice Chancellors made a decree for specific performance, but without compensation, and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of the suit; and, on appeal, the Lords Justices affirmed the decision in all respects, and the appeal was dismissed, with costs.*

Under a power contained in the will of Sir Edward Antrobus, Bart., deceased, the devisees in trust named in such will, with the consent and by the direction of Sir Edmund Antrobus, the tenant for life of the estates devised, signed an agreement, dated the 29th of May 1857, for the sale to William Edwards-Wood of the advowson of the rectory and parish church of Hasleley, in Warwickshire, being part of the property devised by the will. The contract expressed that the sale was to be at the price of 2,800*l.*, and subject to the stipulations following:—

1. That the sum of 2,800*l.*, the said purchase-money, should be paid on the 24th of June then next, at the office of Messrs. Farrer & Co., of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the vendors' solicitors, at which time and place the purchase was to be completed; but if from any cause whatever the said purchase should not be then completed, the purchaser should pay interest on the purchase-money, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, from that day until completion; but this provision was to be without prejudice to the right reserved to the vendors by the last (the seventh) of the said stipulations.

2. That the vendors would, within fourteen days from the date of the contract, at their own expense, deliver an abstract of title to the said advowson to the purchaser, subject, nevertheless, to the stipulations thereafter contained, and within twenty-one days after the actual delivery of such abstract, all objections and requisitions should be delivered; * * * and if any objections and requisitions should be made which the vendors were unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendors might, notwithstanding any treaty or discussion in reference thereto, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same, annul the said contract without payment of costs.

7. If the purchaser should fail to comply with the above stipulations, or any of them, the vendors should be at full liberty to resell the said advowson, either by public auction or private contract; and any deficiency in price in such second sale, together with all expenses attending the same, should, immediately after such sale, be made good to the vendors by the present purchaser; and in case of non-payment should be recoverable by the vendors as and for liquidated damages.

The purchaser having accepted the title of the vendors as disclosed in an abstract delivered to him by them, his solicitor sent to their solicitor a draft conveyance to him of the advowson.

In this stage of the proceedings under the contract, a search was made by the purchaser's solicitors, at the office of Queen Anne's Bounty, which resulted in the discovery that the advowson or rectory was subject to a mortgage or charge payable to Queen Anne's Bounty for the sum of 696*l.*, of which there then remained upwards of 600*l.* undischarged.

Thereupon the following correspondence ensued between the respective solicitors of the vendors and purchaser:—

“Daventry, Dec. 30, 1857.

“Dear Sir,—On inquiry at the Bounty Office to ascertain whether there was any mortgage upon this rectory, I find there is one existing for 696*l.*, in which Sir Edmund Antrobus joined, four instalments only of which have at present been repaid, leaving a balance of upwards of 600*l.* still due upon it. You will agree with me, I believe, that the purchaser is entitled to some compensation for this, as the income of the incumbent will be seriously affected for many years; and the next presentation Mr. Edwards-Wood intends to dispose of consequently decreased in value. Will you consider what compensation should be made under the circumstances, as speedily as it is convenient to you? and if it approaches at all what is fair and equitable, I shall advise my client to accept it. Yours faithfully,

“Dear Sirs,—We should agree with you if we had made any representation of value or income, but the fact is, Mr. Edwards-Wood made his own inquiries, and founded his opinion upon them. We have no doubt you will find, on inquiry of Mr. Edwards-Wood, that he was aware of the mortgage in question. We did not know of it. Yours truly, Farrer, Ouvry & Farrer.”

“Haseley Advowson.

“Dear Sirs,—I have this morning heard from Mr. Edwards-Wood, who states that his knowledge of the rectory was solely derived from the sale particulars of 1852, and that he never knew of the mortgage, or had any suspicion of it, until after the contract was made, Sir Edmund having told him that he had given Mr. Hadow 100*l.* for the improvement of the rectory; and Sir Edmund had probably altogether forgotten that this was in aid of the mortgage in which Sir Edmund seemed to have joined, and which ought to have been, as you will agree with me, in the abstract. Mr. Hadow has now informed me of the particulars of it, and, except as to four instalments, it appears still to be unpaid. I think it quite clear that the purchaser is entitled to an abatement, and I do not think Sir Edmund will, under the circumstances, object to make one. The mode of calculation will be, the value of the life of the incumbent, deducting it from the mortgage, and abating the balance, whatever it may be, from the purchase-money. This, of course, must be done by an actuary; at least I am not myself capable of making a valuation. Perhaps the better plan will be to state a case between us of the facts, and then submit them to a competent person. Yours faithfully,
E. S. Burton.”

"Haseley.

"Dear Sir,—We feel a difficulty in advising the trustees to accept your suggestion as to an actuary's valuation, because we feel that an advowson is not substantially affected in value by the fact of the mortgage, though it may to some extent depreciate the sale of the next presentation. Under the circumstances, perhaps the better way will be to cancel the contract. Yours truly,

"Farrer, Ouvry & Farrer."

"E. S. Burton, Esq."

The plaintiff having declined to cancel the contract, the defendants' solicitors wrote as follows:—

"66, Lincoln's Inn Fields, Jan. 15, 1858.

"Sir E. Antrobus's Trustees to Mr.

"Edwards-Wood.

"Dear Sir,—We cannot advise Sir E. Antrobus's trustees to make compensation. We have no power to compel the incumbent to pay off the mortgage, and it therefore becomes our duty to say that we are unable to comply with the objection you have made; and in accordance with the second clause in the contract, we hereby, on behalf of the vendors, annul the sale. We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

"Farrer, Ouvry & Farrer."

The purchaser then filed the bill in this suit against the vendors, insisting that the circumstance of the advowson or rectory being subject to the mortgage or charge was not a question of title, but either a matter of compensation by abatement from the purchase-money, or that the existing amount of the mortgage or charge should be paid off by the defendants; and that the defendants were not at liberty to recede from the contract.

The bill prayed for the specific performance of the contract, and, inasmuch as the plaintiff was satisfied with the title of the vendors, that they might be ordered either to pay off the mortgage or charge, or that a pecuniary compensation might be made to the plaintiff, either by abatement from the purchase-money or otherwise, as the Court should think fit.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Schomberg, for the plaintiff, submitted that, as the existence of the charge upon the benefice diminished in a considerable proportion the value of the advowson, the plaintiff had not got by his contract all that the vendors had contracted to sell to him, and that he was therefore entitled to a decree in the terms of the prayer of the bill. They referred to—

Burnell v. Brown, 1 Jac. & W. 168.

Milligan v. Cooke, 16 Ves. 1.

Dale v. Lister, Ibid. 7.

Nelthorpe v. Holgate, 1 Coll. 203.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Hobhouse were for the defendants, but were not called upon.

STUART, V.C. said, the incumbrance, though not upon the advowson itself, must be regarded as in some degree affecting the value of such advowson; but he doubted whether it did so to any material extent. Assuming, however, the value to be deteriorated by it, still, as it did not appear that there had been any warranty, or any misrepresentation or studied concealment on the part of the vendors, the rule caveat emptor applied. The case was a novel one, and its circumstances peculiar, but he could not satisfy his mind that there was any right in the plaintiff to compensation; and his opinion was, that there should be a decree declaring the plaintiff entitled to the specific performance of the contract, but without compensation. The plaintiff to pay the costs of the suit.

From the foregoing decision the plaintiff appealed, the same counsel appearing for the parties as in the court below.

Dec. 17. and 18. — For the appellant, besides the cases cited below, that of Edwards v. M'Leay (1) was relied on; and for the defendants it was submitted, that all the plaintiff was entitled to was, to have the contract cancelled, which the defendants had offered to agree to. It was as well in the power of the plaintiff to ascertain the fact of the incumbrance before as after the contract. They referred to Sugd. Vend. and Pur. (last ed.) 279.

Mr. Malins was heard in reply.

(1) 2 Swanst. 287; s. c. Coop. Cas. in Chanc. 303.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In a suit for the specific performance of a contract, instituted by the purchaser — for specific performance, that is, with an abatement from the purchase-money—he has obtained a decree, but for specific performance without abatement, and he has been ordered to pay the costs of the suit. Not pleased with this catastrophe, he has brought the matter hither, and we have to say whether he was entitled to compensation, and whether it was fit to order him to pay the costs. The matter, as it appears to me, stands substantially thus:—The owner in fee of an advowson, held by a good title and free from incumbrance, contracts to sell. After the contract the purchaser comes to the vendor and says, “I think I have agreed to give too much money for this advowson. I thought the income of the living more than it proves to be. I considered the income to be of such and such an amount. I desire, therefore, that you will abate to me from the purchase-money an amount corresponding to the difference between the income as I supposed it to be and the income as it is.” Answers the vendor: “I must be excused from agreeing to your suggestion. I was and am unwilling to sell the advowson at a less price than that which you agreed to give and I to take. I proceeded upon my notions of value; you probably proceeded upon yours. You asked me no question about the income, and must be taken to have formed your own judgment upon such grounds as appeared to you sufficient. I had rather not sell the advowson for less than the agreed price, but I am willing to relinquish the purchase if you wish it, and therefore, if you desire the contract to be cancelled, let it be.”—“No,” replies the purchaser, “I would rather have the advowson, even if obliged to pay for it what I agreed to give, even if compelled to adhere to my agreement. What I will have is the advowson and an abatement out of the purchase-money founded on the calculation that I have mentioned; and if not, I will put you into Chancery.”—“Be it so,” rejoins the vendor, and into Chancery they go. That substantially, according to my view of the matter, is the dispute that has been so ably and zealously argued by the learned counsel for the plaintiff—a view, however, which renders the plaintiff's claim so almost incredibly absurd, that it is due to him probably to state the matter somewhat more in detail. It seems that, some years before the contract, the incumbent had become desirous of rebuilding the parsonage-house; and, for the purpose of raising the money to that end, had resorted to the very usual and familiar course, known almost to all mankind, of obtaining money from Queen Anne's Bounty-office on the usual terms; namely, that out of the fruits of the living there should be paid interest at a certain rate, and a certain proportion of the principal annually, so as to secure its gradual liquidation by sums to be paid by the incumbent for the time being extending over a certain number of years. The patron at this time was the vendor, and he therefore must have known, and did know it. Whether he remembered it or not, is, in my view of the matter, entirely immaterial. At the time of the treaty and contract the subject is not mentioned; the purchaser offers a certain sum, not informing the vendor upon what, if any, calculations, or upon what basis, the offer is made, and the vendor accepts it. The question is, whether there has been any the least degree of impropriety of conduct, any the least degree of breach of duty, in the fact of the vendor not having mentioned this circumstance affecting the value of the living of the incumbent to the purchaser. Now, if the vendor had been asked any question upon the subject, if he had been told what were the elements of the calculations, if any, made by the purchaser, what had been the inducement of the purchaser to make the offer for the property; or if the vendor had had any reason to believe the purchaser misled or ignorant upon the subject, the vendor possibly might have been bound either to make some compensation or to relinquish the contract; but not one of these circumstances exists. For anything that the vendor knew, for anything that the vendor had any reason to believe, the purchaser was aware of every fact and every circumstance connected with the value of the living. And if he was not, why was he not? He had but to go to the incumbent of the parish; he had probably but to go to the parish-clerk, the churchwardens, the vestrymen, or any person connected with the business of the parish; he had but to go to Queen Anne's Bounty-office to ask the question, and he would have received every information. To Queen Anne's Bounty-office he does go, apparently of his own accord and from his own knowledge, after the contract has been made. Why did he not go before the contract, if the matter was of any interest to him? A man of business, as he once was, a person of education and good fortune as he seems to be, he wilfully and deliberately shuts his eyes to a fact which he might have ascertained by opening them—by making any inquiry upon the subject. This is not a case of concealment; this is not a case of latent vice; this is the case of a circumstance affecting the value of the living in point of income, to which the purchaser must have known that every living in England was, by the general law of the country, liable. He must have known that there was not a single living from Cumberland to Cornwall in which this might not be the case; he must have known upon any inquiry, without the slightest difficulty he might have ascertained, the truth: he does not; he does not even ask a question of the vendor upon the subject, and he says there has been an improper concealment with respect to it. It is such a proposition as I have never heard advanced in a court of justice. I repeat, that the case might have stood very differently if the vendor had had any reason to believe that the purchaser was mistaken or ignorant, or he had been asked by the purchaser for information upon it. That is not the case before the Court. It is not every circumstance connected with the property in treaty that a vendor is obliged to mention to the purchaser. He must act uprightly; he must act honestly; he must conceal nothing; but, as we all know from a book with which boys and men are alike familiar, though the latter, I believe, are fonder of it than the former: "aliud est celare, aliud tacere" (2); and again, "neque enim id est celare, quidquid reticeas; sed cum quod tu scias id ignorare emolumenti tui causâ velis eos quorum intersit id scire" (3). There is nothing of the kind here. Is it fraud? Fraud has been expressly disclaimed. It must be either fraud or nothing, and nothing it is. I repeat, therefore, that according to my view of the case, the description which at the outset of the few words that I have said I gave to this case, I still believe to be the accurate description, though I have gone somewhat more into detail. Such cases as Edwards v. M'Leay, and such cases as Nelthorpe v. Holgate, have nothing in common with this case. I think the bill and the appeal are equally unreasonable; both unreasonable in the highest degree; and as the bill was dismissed with costs, so must be the appeal.

(2) Cic. De Off. lib. 3. s. 12.

(3) Ibid. s. 13.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I agree, and for the same reasons. We are not here to consider the question of whether this contract can be set aside, as the purchaser desires to abide by the contract, even if he cannot have the compensation which he claims. With reference to the question of compensation, my learned Brother has gone very fully into it. Let me put another case in which this purchaser might have claimed compensation. Supposing the bishop had required an additional curate to be employed in this parish, could the purchaser have said that, because the bishop in the exercise of his discretion has required an additional curate to be appointed to this parish, and the effect of that requisition has been to bring a charge upon the living by the appointment of the curate, therefore I, the purchaser, am entitled to compensation in respect of the diminution in the value of the living by reason of there being the salary of the curate to be paid out of it? Now, I do not mean to give any concluded opinion upon the question which I mooted in the course of the argument, whether the principle of compensation at all applies to a case of this description. It is obvious that if you apply the principle of compensation, if this purchaser does not go to a sale, he gets both the advowson and the compensation without any loss which can be estimated, because he loses only the difference between the right to present to a living of a given amount, and the right to present to a living which for some years must be less productive; and I doubt whether the principle of compensation has ever been applied to cases where there is no estimable loss to the purchaser, unless he shall happen to go to a sale of the estate. I do not mean, however, to conclude that question, but it certainly seems to me to be a matter of very considerable difficulty. Upon the whole, I agree with my learned Brother that this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Settlement—Rent-Charge—Covenant—Recital.

By the settlement made on the marriage of R. J. M. with S. D., it was recited that upon the treaty for the said marriage P. M. proposed and agreed to secure, in manner and subject as thereafter expressed, to S. D., after the decease of the survivor of them the said P. M. and R. J. M., an annual sum or yearly rent-charge for her jointure, to be issuing and payable out of the manors and other hereditaments thereafter charged therewith, and of or to which the said P. M. was seised or entitled in fee simple. By the operative part of the deed P. M., in consideration of the intended marriage, gave, granted, bargained, sold and confirmed unto S. D. and her assigns, in case the marriage should take effect, and she should survive P. M. and R. J. M., an annual sum or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*, to be charged and chargeable upon and yearly issuing and payable out of all and singular the manors, or reputed manors, of M, N. and R, and also all that mansion-house called M. in the same county, and also all and singular the messuages, &c. in the several parishes of R, &c., in the county of K, of or to which he the said P. M., or any person in trust for him, was or were seised or entitled for an estate of inheritance at law or in equity; and by the same deed P. M. covenanted, granted and agreed with S. D. that so often as the annuity should be unpaid for twenty-one days she should have power to enter and distrain upon the manors, &c. charged therewith; and for further securing the annuity P. M. granted, bargained, sold, demised and confirmed to trustees the manors, &c. thereby charged therewith for a term of 100 years. P. M. and R. J. M. died, leaving S. D. surviving. It was subsequently determined that P. M. had only a life interest in the estates charged. In a suit to administer the estate of R. J. M. a small portion of the estates charged which belonged to R. J. M. in fee was sold, and S. D. received the purchase-money in part discharge of the arrears of her annuity. Upon her claim against the general estate of P. M. in respect of the annuity, it was considered, by Bramwell, B. and Watson, B., that there was no covenant in the settlement on which S. D. or the trustees could maintain an action; and accordingly Wood, V.C. held, that there being no covenant, S. D. could have no special or separate equity against the estate of P. M.; but the Lord Chancellor, considering that the deed contained a covenant, reversed the decision, and allowed the claim.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wood, V.C., assisted by Bramwell, B. and Watson, B., which is reported 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 369. The facts are fully stated in the former report, and are recapitulated in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Baggallay and Mr. Honyman, for the executor.

Com. Dig., Vol. 3, pp. 285, 383.

Jan. 31.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case arose out of a suit instituted by the executors of Phillips Monypenny, for the administration of his estate. A decree having been made, a claim was brought in on behalf of Susannah Monypenny, widow, on account of an annuity of 300*l.*, created by her marriage settlement, dated the 10th of June 1835. The Vice Chancellor Wood, on the matter being brought before him, thought it was a purely legal question, and that if he were to hear the case, he ought to have the assistance of a common-law Judge. The case having been accordingly postponed, it came on again before his Honour, assisted by Bramwell, B. and Watson, B. After argument, and time taken to consider, Bramwell, B. delivered the judgment of himself and Watson, B., that the claimant had no right at law under the deed, on the ground that it contained no covenant binding the executors of Phillips Monypenny. The Vice Chancellor, after hearing the opinion of the learned Judges, stated, that it being purely a question of law, he concurred with them; but it having been contended that the claimant had an equity beyond her legal rights, his Honour considered that in the absence of all legal right there was no equitable right arising out of the deed, and, therefore, disallowed the claim. The matter has been brought before me by way of appeal, and has been very fully and ably argued, the counsel apparently acquiescing in the view taken by the Vice Chancellor, in which I entirely concur, that the question is a legal one, and that if the claimant fails in establishing the legal construction of the deed which she contends for, she has no equitable right or remedy. The whole question is on the deed, which must, therefore, be carefully examined. It was made on the marriage of Robert Joseph Monypenny with Susannah Dearden, and Phillips Monypenny, who was the uncle of Robert Joseph, was a party to it. The deed recited that “upon the treaty for the said intended marriage, the said Phillips Monypenny proposed and agreed to secure, in manner and subject as hereinafter is expressed, to the said Susannah Dearden, after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Phillips Monypenny and Robert Joseph Monypenny, in case she should survive them, an annual sum or yearly rent-charge for her jointure to be issuing and payable out of the manors and other hereditaments hereinafter charged therewith, and of or to which the said Phillips Monypenny is seised or entitled in fee simple”; and then the said Phillips Monypenny, in consideration of the said intended marriage, gave, granted, bargained, sold and confirmed unto the said Susannah Dearden and her assigns, in case the said intended marriage should take effect, and she should survive both of them, the said Phillips Monypenny and Robert Joseph Monypenny, an annual sum or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*, to be charged and chargeable upon and yearly issuing and payable out of all and singular the manors or reputed manors of Maytham, Nether Forsham and Rensham, in the county of Kent, and also that mansion-house called Maytham Hall, in the same county, and also all and singular the messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments in the several parishes of Rolvenden, Tenterden, Benenden, Sandhurst, Newenden, St. Mary in Wittersham and Stone, in the Isle of Oxney, in the said county of Kent, of or to which he the said Phillip Monypenny, or any person in trust for him, was or were seised or entitled, for an estate of inheritance at law or in equity. And by the same indenture Phillips Monypenny, for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenanted, granted and agreed with Susannah Dearden, her executors, administrators and assigns, that in case and so often as the said annual sum or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*, or any part thereof, should at any time or times be behind and unpaid for twenty-one days after any of the days on which the same ought to be paid, then and so often it should be lawful for the said Susannah Dearden, her executors, administrators and assigns, but subject and without prejudice as aforesaid, to enter into and distrain upon the manors, hereditaments and premises thereby charged with the payment, or any of them, or any part thereof, and to dispose of the distress and distresses then and there found, according to law, as in case of distress for rent reserved on common leases for years, to the intent that thereby the said Susannah Dearden, her executors, administrators and assigns, might be fully paid and satisfied the said annual sum or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*, and every part thereof, and all costs, charges and expenses attending the recovery of the same; and also, that in case and so often as the same annual sum or yearly rent-charge of 300*l.*, or any part thereof, should at any time or times be behind or unpaid for forty days next after the same should become due and payable as aforesaid, then and so often, although no formal demand should have been made thereof, it should be lawful for the said Susannah Dearden, her executors, administrators and assigns, but subject and without prejudice as aforesaid, to enter into and upon the manors, hereditaments and premises thereby charged with the said annual sum or any of them, or any part thereof, and to have, hold and enjoy the same, and receive the rents, issues and profits thereof, to and for her and their own use and benefit.

Phillips Monypenny created a term of 100 years in trustees, for the better securing the payment of the rent-charge. Phillips Monypenny died in 1841. After his death it was discovered that of the Maytham Hall estate, which was the principal part of the property charged with the annuity, Phillips Monypenny was only tenant for life; and on his death Robert Thomas Monypenny became entitled to this estate as equitable tenant in tail. The husband, Robert Joseph Monypenny, died in 1842. After his death, a suit for the administration of his estate was instituted, in which a decree was made for the sale of his real estate. Mrs. Monypenny was a party to this suit, and a question arising whether Jobs Cross farm formed part of the estate, the opinion of the Court was taken on that; and the decision being in the affirmative, Mrs. Monypenny presented a petition claiming the whole of the proceeds, and received the amount of 1,100*l.*, part of the arrears of her annuity. It was insisted in argument that by her petitioning and receiving the proceeds of the real estate, the claimant had determined her election to make the rent-charge real, and that she had no power now to treat it as an annuity, and to sue for it as such. According to Littleton, s. 219, "if a man grant by his deed a rent-charge to another, and the rent is behind, the grantee may choose whether he will sue a writ of annuity for this against the grantor, or distrain for the rent behind, and the distress detain until he be paid. But he cannot do or have both together, &c. For if he recovers by a writ of annuity, then the land is discharged of the distress," &c. Lord Coke's commentary upon the latter words is: "Here it is to be observed that this determination of the election of the grantee must be by action or suit in court of record; for albeit the grantee distrain for the rent, yet he may bring a writ of annuity and discharge the land." It seems to me quite unnecessary in the present case to consider what is the effect of the abolition of the writ of annuity by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, upon the right of election at the present day, because it must be conceded that if there is no remedy by covenant then the only right which can exist is that which attaches upon the land, and if there is a covenant as well as a power of distress, it is not a case of election at all, but the grantee has a double remedy, and may have recourse to either as he pleases, as often as the rent-charge is in arrear. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether the petition of Mrs. Monypenny to have the proceeds of the real estate paid to her, for the arrears of her rent-charge is equivalent or not to the action or suit in a court of record which Lord Coke says is necessary to the determination of the election of the grantee. If there is a covenant in the deed which binds the executors of the grantor, she may avail herself of the covenant against his personal estate, although she has received a portion of the arrears out of the estate.

The important question, therefore, to be determined is, whether such a covenant is to be found in the deed. The learned Barons who assisted the Vice Chancellor in putting a legal construction on the deed, were clearly of opinion that there were no words in it creating a covenant. They examined the recital, the grant, and the power of distress in succession, and dismissed each of them in its turn, with the remark, that it did not operate as a covenant. Even the strong and appropriate words used in the creation of the power to distrain did not shake their opinion; for as to them they say, "Nor do we think that the words used in the creation of the power to distrain, extensive as they are—'covenants, grants, and agrees that it shall be lawful, when the rent-charge is in arrear, for the grantee to distrain on the premises'—are an express covenant that he shall have power to do so. We think that 'covenants and agrees' mean no more than 'grants.'" Then the learned Judges proceeded to inquire whether there is any implied covenant arising out of the general words used by the grantor, and properly observe, that such a covenant must be a covenant at law, and that there cannot be a covenant implied from such words; that the covenantor had an equitable estate; and they conclude that the deed contains neither an express nor an implied covenant, of which the claimant can avail herself to enforce the payment of her jointure. After the most careful consideration of every part of the deed, I cannot bring my mind to a similar conclusion. In the course of the argument of the counsel against the claim, I have been earnestly requested to examine the whole scheme of the deed, in order to be enabled to put a satisfactory construction upon those parts of it which involve the question to be decided. Undoubtedly, as Sheppard says (Touchstone, 87.) in the construction of all parts of all kinds of deeds, amongst the rules to be universally observed is one, "that the construction be made upon the entire deed, and that one part of it doth help to expound another, and that every word (if it may be) may take effect, and none be rejected." Where words are ambiguous, or the intention is not manifest and plain, it is useful and necessary to recur to other parts of the deed for an interpretation; but this mode of construction is frequently invoked for the purpose of giving a different meaning to words from that which they ordinarily bear; and on the present occasion, the assistance of the whole scheme of the deed seems to be used, not that every word may take effect, but for the purpose of weakening the appropriate words. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to resort to any more of the deed, except to observe that the marriage consideration runs through every part of it. It was clearly to Phillips Monypenny's interest that Mrs. Monypenny should have a rent-charge out of his estate, and he believed himself to be the absolute owner of the Maytham Hall estate. The deed therefore contains a recital that, "upon the treaty for the marriage he had agreed to secure to her an annual sum or rent-charge, to be issuing and payable out of the manors and other hereditaments hereinafter charged therewith, and of or to which he, the said Phillips Monypenny, is entitled or seised in fee-simple"; and in the granting part, "he gives and grants the annual sum, or rent-charge to be issuing out of certain manors and lands, and generally out of messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments in the several parishes in the county of Kent, of or to which he, or any person or persons in trust for him, is or are seised or entitled for an estate of inheritance at law or in equity." It is said that the alternative words in the recital and in the grant express an uncertainty as to the nature of the title of Phillips Monypenny to the estates charged; and that according to the case of Right d. Jefferys v. Bucknell, they created no estoppel against Phillips Monypenny. But in that case the question related to two houses only, which were mortgaged, and the deed reciting that the mortgagor was legally or equitably entitled to the premises, and he covenanting that he was legally or equitably seised in his own demesne as of fee, it was clear that there was no certain or precise averment of any seisin in him. There the charge was intended to apply to various lands of the grantor; and as it is an undoubted canon of construction, that if possible you should give effect to every part of a deed, I find no difficulty in considering the words both in the recital and in the grant, not as expressive of any uncertainty, but as applying to lands held by different titles, and therefore, reddendo singula singulis, to all the lands mentioned, whether Phillips Monypenny was legally or equitably entitled to them. The effect of this mode of reading the recital and the grant will be, that the annuity will be a charge upon all the land, whether Phillips Monypenny's title to them was legal or equitable, although the power to distrain would be limited to those only of which he had the legal estate. The converse of this is put by Lord Coke, in p. 147. in his Commentary, where he says, "If a man seised of lands in fee, and possessed of a term for many years, grant a rent out of both for life in tail or in fee, with clause of distress out of both, this rent, being a freehold, doth issue only out of the freehold, and the lands in lease are only charged with the distress." It will be said that the words "give, grant, bargain and sell," cannot operate as a covenant, because they merely assert a power to give or create an annuity; at the same time, the plain and ordinary effect of the word "covenant" has been denied, and it has been treated as synonymous with the word "grant." But in construing this deed, I should be much more disposed to give the word "grant" the operation of a covenant, than to transform the word "covenant" into a grant. It is undoubtedly law, that a deed that is intended and made to one purpose, may accrue to another; for if it would not take effect in the way that it is intended, it may take effect another way—Shepherd's Touchstone, 82. There is an admirable judgment of Lord Chief Justice Willes on this subject, in Roe d. Wilkinson v. Trumien (1), which has a considerable bearing on the point in question. There Thomas Kirkley, in consideration of natural love to his brother Christopher, and for 100*l.*, granted, released and confirmed to Christopher the premises in question after his (Thomas's) death, and covenanted and granted that the premises should, after his death, be held by Christopher and the heirs of his body, and after their decease to John Wilkinson and his heirs; and it was held, that the deed would not operate as a release, because it attempted to convey a freehold in future, but that it was good as a covenant to stand seised: and the Chief Justice said, there is likewise one thing in the present case much stronger than in any of the cases which have been cited on the one side or the other, for here is not only the word "grant," which has often been construed as a word of covenant, but likewise the grantor expressly covenants, in two places in the deed, that the estate shall go to John Wilkinson in such a manner as he granted it. In the present case, if the words creating the annual sum or yearly rent-charge are to be construed strictly as a grant and nothing more, then it was absolutely void from the first, and never could have any inception, because it was not to begin until after the death of Phillips Monypenny, and, on his death, the estate on which it is charged came to an end. Why, under these circumstances, it being the clear intention of these parties that the deed should operate, if it could not take effect as a charge, should it not be construed to be a covenant to pay the annual sum of 300*l.*, which would be binding upon the executors of Phillips Monypenny, though not named? It is unnecessary to multiply authorities to shew that, according to what Lord Mansfield says, in Lant v. Morris (2), "no particular technical words are requisite towards making a covenant," for in this deed there is a clause in which this peculiar and appropriate word is to be found in giving the grantor a power to distrain for the rent-charge—"Phillips Monypenny, for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenants, grants and agrees." I asked more than once in the course of the argument, what would have been the effect of the deed if it had simply contained this clause of distress? I was not aware my question almost received an answer from Littleton himself; for he says, in the course of section 221, "Also, if one make a deed in this manner, that if A, of B, be not yearly paid at the feast of Christmas for term of his life 20 shillings of lawful money, that then it shall be lawful for the said A, of B, to distrain for this in the manor of F, &c.: this is a good rent-charge, because the manor is charged with the rent by way of distress." But he adds—"And yet the person of him who makes such deed is discharged in this case of an action of annuity, because he doth not grant by his deed any annuity to the said A, of B, but granteth only that he may distrain for such annuity." Now, upon this, put the case that a person "covenants, grants and agrees," for a power of distress for an annual sum or rent-charge upon land in which he has nothing. If it is a rule that every word in a deed must have effect given to it if possible, and none ought to be rejected, and there is another rule that if a deed cannot take effect in the way intended, it shall take effect in another way,—why should not these words have each its due effect, and after the creation of the rent-charge by the grant of the power of distress, why should not the covenant, applied to the words "annual sum," create a personal liability in the grantor and his executors? I am aware that the grantor in this clause of distress binds only his heirs and assigns, and not his executors; and it was insisted, though not very strongly, in argument, that this shewed an intention that his executors should not be bound. I inquired whether there was any authority to be found that executors in such a case would not be liable, and I was told that none had been discovered; and I should have been surprised to have learnt that, the rule being that heirs are in general only bound if named, and that executors are bound although not named, the naming the heirs for the purpose of binding them should be considered to amount to an exclusion of the executors, whom it was unnecessary to name. But had there been any such authority, I should have thought it inapplicable to the present case, in which there being no heirs to be bound, as there was nothing to descend, the naming them could have no greater effect than if they had been altogether omitted from the covenant.

(1) Willes, 682.

(2) 1 Burr. 290.

It is not necessary for me to consider the question as to whether a covenant could have been implied from the words of the deed if there had been no express covenant. I proceed on the covenant, which I consider to be expressly created by the language of the parties. I am happy to think that in thus arriving at a conclusion opposed to the judgment of the learned Judges who have decided this question, I am able to support myself by very high authorities, founded upon reasons which recommend themselves strongly to my mind, and that in the decision which I feel bound to pronounce, I shall not determine anything which will be found inconsistent with justice, or contrary to the obvious intention of the parties to the deed. I think the appeal must be allowed, and the claim allowed also.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } ESPIN v. PEMBERTON. (1)
Dec. 8. }

Equitable Mortgage—Priority—Notice—Solicitor and Client.

A solicitor borrowed money from the plaintiff, and deposited with him the title-deeds of a leasehold house by way of security, at the same time agreeing by writing to execute an assignment of the premises when called on to do so. The solicitor, who had acted for himself in the first transaction, subsequently assigned the same property to another person, his articulated clerk, but the assignee neglected to obtain the title-deeds, although he made several applications for them to the mortgagor. The plaintiff claimed priority in respect of his equitable security:—Held, that the assignee could not be considered to have had constructive notice, through the mortgagor, as his solicitor, of the plaintiff's security, and that the omission on the part of the assignee to obtain the deeds did not prevent him from having the benefit of his assignment.

The bill stated that in the month of January 1855 the defendant W. A. S.

(1) See this case on appeal, post, 311.

Pemberton was carrying on business as a solicitor, at No. 8, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury, and that he applied to the plaintiff, John Espin, to lend him the sum of 300*l.*, which the plaintiff agreed to do upon having the said sum secured upon a mortgage of the house then occupied by the defendant Pemberton. In the said month of January 1855 the defendant delivered to the plaintiff the following memorandum:—"I, William Augustus Sadler Pemberton, of No. 8, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, solicitor, do hereby acknowledge and declare that as a consideration and inducement to Mr. John Espin, of No. 50, Bedford Row, in the county of Middlesex, solicitor, to advance me the sum of 300*l.*, and previously to his advancing the same, I did agree to charge, and in pursuance of that agreement, I do hereby charge, and for myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, do agree to do and execute any act and deed that shall by the said John Espin, his executors, administrators or assigns, or his or their counsel, be reasonably required or deemed necessary for the better and more effectually charging by assignment or otherwise the lease of certain premises situate and being No. 8, Southampton Street aforesaid, from his Grace the Duke of Bedford to J. Mallock, Esq., dated the 27th of March 1843, and the assignments of such leases dated respectively the 21st of December 1846 and the 2nd of January 1854, on being required by the said J. Espin, his executors, administrators or assigns, to give such further security; as witness my hand, this 11th of January 1855, W. A. S. Pemberton.—Witness, J. Sanson." The money was, thereupon advanced by the plaintiff, and the defendant at the same time gave the plaintiff his promissory note for 300*l.* at three months' date, and handed over to him the deeds relating to the property. The promissory note was renewed from time to time until the 9th of August 1857, when it was dishonoured.

On the 6th of November following the plaintiff called at No. 8, Southampton Street and saw Mr. Frederick Moojen, who had been a partner with Mr. Pemberton, but their partnership had been dissolved. On that occasion the plaintiff informed him of his security upon the premises for 300*l.*, and Mr. Moojen then stated that Pemberton had assigned the lease to another party for 500*l.* The plaintiff called again on Mr. Moojen, who then told him that the assignment was, in fact, made to the defendant W. E. Browne, who was the step-son of Mr. Pemberton and his articled clerk, and that Browne's assignment had been registered on the 12th of November. He also agreed to accept service of the notice of the plaintiff's security on behalf of Browne and as his solicitor. On the 23rd of November the plaintiff received a letter from Mr. Pemberton, in which he stated that the assignment to Browne was subject to the plaintiff's claim; that the lease was valuable, and that the plaintiff should not be a loser, but that he had been subject to pecuniary embarrassments, which compelled him to absent himself from London.

The bill was then filed against Pemberton and Browne, alleging that inasmuch as Pemberton had acted as solicitor in the mortgage transaction with Browne, and as he knew of the plaintiff's security, that must be considered as constructive notice to Browne of the prior mortgage, and that Browne had been guilty of negligence in not obtaining the deeds relating to his mortgage, which were held by the plaintiff, and that no consideration had, in fact, passed from Browne to Pemberton, who was insolvent at the time of the transaction. The bill, therefore, prayed that the plaintiff might be declared entitled to his equitable security in priority to the assignment to Browne.

The defendant Browne, by his answer, stated that he attained the age of twenty-one in January 1857; that in the following month of April he lent to Mr. Pemberton the sum of 1,500*l.*, which he had borrowed from the North British Insurance Company for the purpose of the loan. That on the 8th of September the lease of the house in Southampton Street was assigned to him by Pemberton as security for the sum of 500*l.*, part of the said sum of 1,500*l.* That at the time the assignment was executed he had requested Pemberton to hand over to him the title-deeds, and that subsequently he had repeatedly asked for the deeds, but was informed by Pemberton that they were mislaid, and that he should have them as soon as he could obtain them. He also denied that Moojen had acted as his solicitor.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. T. H. Terrell appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that there had been constructive notice to Browne of the plaintiff's security by reason of the defendant Pemberton having acted as solicitor in both transactions; that Browne had been guilty of negligence in not obtaining the deeds affecting his security, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to priority over Browne in respect of his equitable security. They cited—

s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 69.
Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & K. 699;
s. c. 6 Sim. 6.

Mr. Baily, Mr. Beales and Mr. H. Browne appeared for the defendants, but were not called upon by the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Although at first sight there are no doubt circumstances attending this case which might well induce the plaintiff to entertain a strong suspicion of the honesty of the transaction, yet those circumstances, when you examine them, seem to bear a reasonable explanation. No doubt Pemberton did promise to give Browne the security of this property, which, unknown to him, was equitably secured to the plaintiff, and that security was afterwards given in the shape of an absolute assignment, in consideration of 500*l.* out of the 1,500*l.* lent by Browne. It seems that the assignment was not stamped until the 7th of November, but that was natural, because if they had gone on for two days more they would have exceeded the period of two months. I do not think there was anything suspicious in that. Then, as to the deed not being registered, I do not see that there was anything wrong in the omission to register. This is the case of a young man whose step-father wanted to obtain money, and he was induced to raise the money for him, upon the understanding that he was to have a security, which was afterwards executed. So far as regards fraud in this transaction, I think that the relationship between the parties, and the fact that the money was actually borrowed, shews that there was no ground for that. The grounds on which the plaintiff asks relief are, first, that Mr. Pemberton must be considered to have acted as solicitor in the transaction for Browne, and that, inasmuch as he knew of the previous equitable mortgage to the plaintiff, that made it constructive notice to Browne through Pemberton; and, secondly, that there was negligence on the part of the defendant Browne in not asking for his title-deeds, which were in the possession of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, his security ought not to prevail as against the prior equitable incumbrance of the plaintiff. Now, in the case of Hewitt v. Loosemore, it appears that Lord Justice Turner, then Vice Chancellor, came to the conclusion, in a similar case to the present, where a mortgagor was himself a solicitor, and no solicitor was acting for the mortgagee, that there the mortgagor quà solicitor was to be considered as solicitor of the mortgagee. I confess I think I am bound to state that if it were not for the opinion expressed in that case, I doubt whether I should arrive at a similar conclusion, but the long experience and ability of that learned Judge are such that, although I should consider it probable that his opinion is right and mine wrong, yet I should hesitate to apply the principle in every case. It might be, for instance, that the intended mortgagor was a retired solicitor, and thought fit to act for himself. How could I say, in such a case, that, because the mortgagor happened to be a solicitor, he was to be considered as solicitor for the mortgagee? Or suppose the mortgagor were a barrister who was not in practice; he might say he could take care of himself, and could act for himself. It would be very hard in such a case to say that he was therefore to be taken to have acted professionally for the mortgagee. I should also feel great difficulty in a case like the present, where the gentleman is being educated as a solicitor, and is, in fact, an articled clerk. He has got, at least, some knowledge of what should be done. I do not see the reasonableness of saying that because Mr. Pemberton was a solicitor, consequently he is to be treated as solicitor for his articled clerk. Therefore, if it were not for the expression of opinion found in the case of Hewitt v. Loosemore, I should not have come to the same conclusion; but as it is I dare say the Lord Justice is right and I am wrong; but suppose Pemberton were to be treated as solicitor for Brown in the transaction, it would be a monstrous perversion of the doctrine of constructive notice to say that, because Pemberton knew of a prior mortgage to the plaintiff, that is constructive notice to the subsequent mortgagee of the prior mortgage. It appears, however, that, in the same case I have mentioned, the same Judge refused to add to the constructive solicitorship the additional ingredient of constructive notice, and I entirely concur in the justice of that conclusion. Then, as to the alleged negligence in not procuring the title-deeds, no doubt the rule is, that where there is a subsequent mortgagee, though he has no notice of the prior mortgage, if he does not get in the title-deeds, then the Court will consider that tantamount to a fraud, and that he had constructive notice of the prior mortgage; but is there not sufficient reason shewn here for his not having obtained the title-deeds? It appears that he did ask for them; in fact, they say he asked for them too much, and therefore they say he is charged with negligence in not making his requisitions more effectual; but he is a young man, the articulated clerk of the mortgagor who married his mother, and the step-father says 'you shall have the deeds as soon as I can get them,' and he further says you have got the assignment. There is nothing in this to make the young man guilty of fraud, or to shew that he was assisting Pemberton to commit a fraud.

I cannot in this case come to the conclusion, that there is any such negligence or omission with regard to not procuring the title-deeds as to lead me to say that the defendant is not entitled to his security.

I cannot help adverting to this, that if a person will take an equitable mortgage only when he may have a legal mortgage, particularly when he is entitled to come for a legal mortgage, it must be considered that he has less reason to complain. The plaintiff took an agreement from Pemberton that he would, by assignment or otherwise, give him a charge upon the property. He agreed that he would make it effectual, then why did not the plaintiff call for such a charge? If he had done so there would have been no such second mortgage. His omission to do this has occasioned all the trouble. He is not, therefore, entitled to so much sympathy, although it is true that equitable mortgages are quite common. The question, however, is, whether the plaintiff has made out such a case of suspicion or of fraud as to entitle him to the decree he asks. I think there is neither one nor the other; on the contrary, the circumstances which appear suspicious are removed, and I must, therefore, dismiss the bill with costs.

Equitable Mortgage—Priority—Notice—Solicitor and Client.

Where an assignee of a lease, upon the occasion of the assignment, made bond fide inquiries for the deeds, and a reasonable excuse was given for their not being produced, he was held to be entitled to the benefit of the assignment, free from a previous equitable charge which had been made by the assignor by deposit of the deeds.

Where a mortgagor is a solicitor and prepares the mortgage deed, no other solicitor being employed in the transaction, the mortgagor will not be considered as the solicitor for the mortgagee, so as to affect the mortgagee with notice of facts within the mortgagor's knowledge, unless there be some consent on the part of the mortgagee to constitute the relation.

Hewitt v. Loosemore (1) observed upon.

This was an appeal from Kindersley, V.C., who had dismissed the plaintiff's bill, with costs (ante, 308). The suit was instituted under the following circumstances:—In January 1855, the plaintiff lent to the defendant, W. A. S. Pemberton, a solicitor, the sum of 300*l.*, on the security of Pemberton's promissory note, and the deposit of the deeds relating to his house of business, No. 8, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury. The lease of the house and the assignments were accordingly deposited with the plaintiff, accompanied by a memorandum, dated the 11th of January 1855, and signed by Pemberton, whereby he charged the lease with the payment of the 300*l.* and interest, and agreed to execute when required any deed for more effectually charging by assignment or otherwise the lease and the assignments. The promissory note was made payable three months after date, and was several times renewed, but in August 1857 was dishonoured. In November 1857, the plaintiff gave notice to Moojen, who had been a clerk to Pemberton, and afterwards his partner, of the charge of January 1855, and subsequently Moojen informed him that an assignment of the lease had been made to the defendant Browne, a stepson of Pemberton's, and also his artied clerk, to secure 500*l.* Moojen stated that he acted as Browne's solicitor, and accepted service of notice of the charge for him. Browne's assignment was dated the 8th of September, and was registered in Middlesex, on the 12th of November 1857. The plaintiff, under these circumstances, claimed priority to Browne's assignment. Browne, by his answer, denied that Moojen was his solicitor, and stated that when the assignment was executed, Pemberton accounted for the original lease not being given to him by alleging that it was mislaid. Browne had attained his age of twenty-one in January 1857, and he borrowed 1,500*l.* of the North British Assurance Company to lend to Pemberton, which he did in April 1857, 1,000*l.*, part of the loan, being secured to him by a bill of sale of the furniture in the house in Southampton Street, and in which Browne was then living. Kindersley, V.C., dismissed the bill, with costs.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. T. H. Terrell, for the plaintiff, the appellant, contended that he was entitled to the relief prayed, as Browne had been guilty of gross negligence in not requiring the delivery of the deeds to him; and further, that he must be considered as having had constructive notice of the plaintiff's charge. If a person purchased an estate without requiring the production of the title-deeds, that was such gross negligence that the Court would presume that he wilfully abstained from inquiry. But if there had been an inquiry, and a sufficient answer to that inquiry had been given, the proposition must be modified to that extent.—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff, who is an equitable mortgagee by deposit of a lease, is entitled to priority over the defendant Browne, who subsequently acquired the legal estate by assignment of the lease. The question depends upon whether the defendant is a bond fide purchaser for value, without notice, either actual or constructive, of the plaintiff's prior incumbrance. The plaintiff contends that Browne is not a bond fide purchaser for value, and that the assignment of the lease to him was merely colourable. It appears that Browne, who was a young man of about twenty-one years of age, and who had been the artied clerk of his step-father, the defendant Pemberton, was applied to by Pemberton, in the beginning of the year 1857, to advance him a sum of 1,500*l.*, and that Browne was induced to obtain that amount from the North British Assurance Company, and to make the advance upon an understanding, as it is said, that he should have, as a security for that advance, a bill of sale of the furniture in the house, and an assignment of the lease. In August 1857, in pursuance of that arrangement, a bill of sale of the furniture was executed by Pemberton. It was certainly an instrument of rather an extraordinary character, and was evidently intended to permit the step-father and mother of Browne to have the advantage of the furniture for an indefinite period, leaving to Browne the opportunity, when he pleased, of putting an end to that enjoyment by taking possession; and there can be no doubt that such a bill of sale would have been invalid against Pemberton's creditors. The bill of sale, however, disclosed on the face of it the real transaction between the parties, and it was duly registered. It was to secure 1,000*l.*, part of the advance of 1,500*l.*, and 500*l.* remained uncovered. The assignment in question, which was executed on the 8th of September 1857, was intended as a security for that 500*l.*; and it is alleged, on the part of the plaintiff, that it was the original intention of Browne not to have taken an absolute assignment, but to have had merely a security upon the lease, and that he abandoned that intention in consequence of the knowledge which he acquired of the embarrassed circumstances of his step-father. That circumstance, however, appears to me very strong in favour of the defendant, because if the transaction was intended to be merely colourable, and to protect the property and interest of Pemberton, there could be no reason why, upon any knowledge which had been acquired by Browne of the circumstances of his step-father, the original intention which he is said to have had should have been abandoned, and that he should have taken an assignment instead of a security. Upon that assignment various observations have been made on the part of the plaintiff. In the first place, the form of the assignment has been strongly commented upon. It was said, that the transaction, as it appears upon the face of the deed, was an advance of money made at the time of the execution of the assignment, whereas it was intended as value for an antecedent debt. It was also said that there is a receipt for the consideration-money indorsed upon the deed, as if money had actually been advanced at that time; and observations are made arising out of the delay in stamping the deed and of registering it within some short time of its execution. Observations are also made on the part of the plaintiff as to the absence of the attesting witnesses; and all the circumstances together are considered by him to be so suspicious as to induce the Court to come to the conclusion, that the transaction itself was colourable. Now, it is admitted, that the 1,500*l.* was actually advanced by Browne to his step-father. There was an arrangement made as to the nature of the securities which he was to receive, and these were carried into effect to a certain extent by this bill of sale, which certainly was given in pursuance of the original undertaking. As to the form of the deed, I believe it is the most ordinary form where the deed is executed in consequence of the existence of an antecedent debt, and the receipt for the consideration-money is nothing more than an acknowledgment by the assignor that he has received the money.

With respect to the absence of immediate registration and of stamping the deed, those are in themselves very slight circumstances. If there were anything that rendered the deed suspicious in any other respect, they might certainly be thrown in as weights in the scale against it, but in themselves they are really perfectly insignificant, and, at all events, as Pemberton, the step-father, had the management of the whole transaction, it would be very hard to affect Browne by any circumstance of that kind. With regard to the absence of the attesting witnesses, that is really matter of observation only. It raises no suspicion; it does not in the slightest degree impeach the deed, and it may be observed that, although attesting witnesses are most important when the question of the execution of a deed is brought into dispute, yet they are probably the persons who know the very least of the contents of the deed. Therefore I think that, all these circumstances considered, there is nothing whatever to induce me to come to the conclusion that Browne was not a bond fide purchaser for value of this lease. Then, the next question, which is a very important one, is, whether the defendant had notice of a prior incumbrance. This will, in the first place, depend upon whether Pemberton was the solicitor of the defendant Browne in the transaction, and whether, as he, of course, knew of this incumbrance, his knowledge can be imputed to the defendant. The notice which a principal is supposed to receive through a solicitor is generally treated as constructive notice, but I cannot help thinking it would be better if it were classed under the head of actual notice. The notice which affects the principal through a solicitor does not depend upon whether it is communicated to him or not. If a person employs a solicitor who either knows or has intimated to him in the course of his employment, a fact that is hostile to his interest, he is bound by it, whether the fact is communicated to or is concealed from him. Constructive notice is properly the knowledge which the Court imputes to a person, the contrary presumption being so strong it cannot be allowed to be rebutted; and the knowledge must exist either from his knowing something which ought to have put him on further inquiry, or from his wilfully abstaining from inquiry to avoid notice. I should, therefore, prefer calling the knowledge which a person has either by himself or his agent actual knowledge; or, if it is necessary to make a distinction between that which a person knows himself and that which is known to his agent, the latter might, I think, be called imputed knowledge. Was Pemberton, then, who came to the transaction with a perfect knowledge of the plaintiff's incumbrance, the solicitor of the defendant? I find it very difficult to accede to the proposition, however high the authority from which it proceeds, that when a mortgagor is himself a solicitor and preparing the mortgage-deed, the mortgagee employing no other solicitor, the mortgagor must be considered to be the agent or solicitor of the mortgagee in the transaction. I think there must be some consent on the part of the mortgagee to constitute this relation. If he is imprudent enough to entrust his interest to the mortgagor, who is himself a solicitor, he may do so and take the consequences; but he may not desire to have any solicitor, he considering himself equal to the protection of his own interest, and then his mere omission to communicate the circumstance to the mortgagor, who is preparing the deed, cannot constitute him the solicitor. If the mortgagor, under these circumstances, becomes the solicitor of the mortgagee, it is impossible to stop short in applying all the consequences of the relation, and then the knowledge which the mortgagor possesses becomes the knowledge of his client, the mortgagee. It is difficult to escape from this conclusion unless you apply the principle of Kennedy v. Green and exclude this particular knowledge, because the mortgagor was committing a fraud in the transaction which he could not be presumed to communicate, or rather, perhaps, because the very commission of the fraud broke off the relation of principal and agent, and therefore prevented the possibility of imputing his knowledge to his client. I think Pemberton was not the solicitor of Browne in the assignment, and there is not only no proof of consent that he should act in that capacity, but something approaching to a proof of the contrary. This brings me to the remaining question, whether Browne must be presumed to have had constructive notice of the plaintiff's incumbrance in consequence of his not having made proper inquiries respecting the deeds? There, it appears to me, the case of Hewitt v. Loosemore is a clear and distinct authority. It is said that Sir G. Turner, then Vice Chancellor, in that case laid down a new doctrine when he held, that where a bond fide inquiry is made for the deeds, and a reasonable excuse is given for their not being forthcoming, there is no ground for imputing knowledge which a further and fuller inquiry might have imported; and this decision was said not to have given satisfaction to the profession. But it would appear that Sir G. Turner founded himself on a long course of prior authorities, examined them all with his usual care, and arrived at his conclusion only after the most full and careful examination. I think that judgment is consonant with the prior decisions, which will govern me in this case. It appears to me that the inquiry made by Browne precludes the possibility of supposing that he abstained from all inquiry for fear of hearing something adverse to the title, and the answer which he received was a sufficient excuse to induce him not to prosecute his inquiries further. The case, indeed, bears a singular resemblance in all respects to the case of Plumb v. Flutt, which has been followed in the various cases cited in Hewitt v. Loosemore. It is said that this case is of great importance to the commercial world, and that the doctrine which it asserts will alarm bankers and others who have advanced their money upon the deposit of deeds, and that they will be rendered liable to have their securities affected by secret assignments; but the only effect of such a doctrine, if it were new, would be to prevent persons obtaining advances of money with such facility upon the deposit of their deeds, and whether any great mischief would arise from a check being put upon equitable mortgages of this description may be extremely questionable. The law, however, has been settled for a great number of years, at least from the time of Plumb v. Flutt, which is now sixty years ago, and it has not been found that it has rendered persons unwilling to advance money upon such securities. But considerations such as these can have no effect, unless to prevent any new rule of law being laid down; and, whatever the consequences may be, I am bound by the prior decisions, and I am only following the uniform course of them when I arrive at the conclusion, that there is no such gross neglect on the part of Browne in not pursuing the inquiry he had made as would induce the presumption of notice of the plaintiff's incumbrance. Agreeing, therefore, with the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

INDERSLEY, V.C. }
Dec. 22, 26. } WARDE v. DIXON.

Vendor and Purchaser—Conditions of Sale—Time for raising Objections—Power to rescind Contract.

A vendor put up for sale "the absolute reversion to the sum of 2,000l. consols," with conditions that any objections to title should be made within ten days after delivery of the abstract, and that the vendor, in case he should be either unable or unwilling to meet any objection that should be raised, might rescind the contract upon return of the deposit without interest or costs. The vendor filed a bill for specific performance, and the case came on upon motion for a decree:—Held, that notwithstanding the expiration of the time allowed for making objections to title, the purchaser was entitled to raise objections in respect of matters not disclosed upon the face of the abstract, which he had subsequently discovered, and which would render the title bad or doubtful.

Held, also, that the vendor could not rescind the contract under the condition without first dismissing his bill, with costs.

The Court refused the motion for a decree, with costs.

The bill in this case was filed, against the directors and trustees of the National Reversionary Investment Company, for the specific performance of a contract entered into by their agent, on behalf of the company, for the purchase of the reversionary interest in a sum of 2,000l. consols.

The case now came on upon motion for a decree.

It appeared that by a settlement made in the year 1832, upon the marriage of the Rev. W. Lloyd and Miss Jeffries, a sum of 7,000l. consols and a policy of assurance for 4,000l. were vested in trustees for the benefit of the husband for life, remainder to the wife for life, and then in trust for the children of the marriage, as the husband and wife jointly or as the survivor should appoint, and in default of appointment, to be divided among the children equally. There were four children of the marriage, one of whom was Frances Ann Lloyd, who attained the age of twenty-one in the month of August 1854.

Mrs. Lloyd died in February 1843. On the 1st of January 1855 Mr. Lloyd, who had just then obtained the chaplaincy at Port Natal, exercised the power of appointment given him by the settlement, and appointed the sum of 2,000l. in favour of his daughter F. A. Lloyd.

On the 3rd of January 1855 Miss Lloyd mortgaged the reversionary interest in the 2,000l. so appointed to her, to Mr. Gay for 300l., and on the next day she further charged the property to Mr. Gay for 100*l.*, making together a sum of 400*l.*, which was to be repaid on the 3rd of February, that is, one month after the execution of the mortgage, and in default of payment there was a power of sale contained in the mortgage.

Mr. Lloyd and his family embarked from Gravesend for Port Natal on the 7th of January, and on the following day, while the ship was lying off Deal, Mr. Lloyd came up to London with a clerk of Mr. Dodd, his solicitor, for the purpose of making a statutory declaration with respect to the circumstances under which the power of appointment had been executed, but was unable to fulfil his intention on account of the office being closed. He promised, however, to send home such a declaration from Port Natal, but this was never done.

On the 11th of January Mr. Dodd and his clerk made two statutory declarations on the same subject. Subsequently, an attempt was made to sell the property to the Law Reversionary Interest Society under the power contained in the mortgage in consequence of the non-payment of the mortgage money at the time specified. This society, however, refused to become the purchasers, considering that a doubt was thrown upon the title by the circumstances of the case. On the 31st of May another attempt was made by Mr. Gay to sell the reversionary property by auction, but in this he was also unsuccessful. On the 12th of February 1856 the property was again put up for sale with a reserved bidding of 490*l.*, but no sale then took place. Subsequently to this attempt to sell, certain communications took place between the plaintiff's solicitor and the auctioneer, which resulted in the purchase of the reversion by the plaintiff, Mr. Warde, for the sum of 510*l.* On the 7th of January 1858 the plaintiff put up the property for sale by auction, describing it in the following terms:—"The absolute reversion to the sum of 2,000*l.* consols, part of a larger sum standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, and transferable on the death of a gentleman holding a public appointment abroad, now in his fifty-sixth year. A stop order has been lodged on the fund by the vendor. Succession duty of 1*l.* per cent. to be borne by the purchaser." The conditions at the time of the sale comprised the following, viz., "All requisitions upon or objections to the title shall be made and sent to the vendor's solicitors within ten days after the delivery of the abstract, and in default thereof they shall be considered to have been waived;" and also a condition "entitling the vendor, in case he is either unable or unwilling to meet any objection that may be raised, to rescind the contract at his pleasure upon a return of the deposit without interest or costs;" and a further condition that "the vendor, who had purchased from a mortgagee, with full power of sale, should not be bound to enter into any covenant for the production of the settlement under which the reversion was derived, nor should the concurrence of any other person be required." No sale was effected upon the day of the auction; but on the 13th of January following an application was made to the auctioneer, by the defendant, as representing the National Reversionary Interest Society, who agreed to become the purchasers of the reversionary property for the sum of 770*l.*

The abstract was then delivered, which stated only the fact that Miss Lloyd attained twenty-one in August 1854; the appointment to her by her father on the 1st of January 1855 of the 2,000*l.* in reversion; and that on the 3rd and 4th of the same month Miss Lloyd had mortgaged this reversion for 400*l.* to Mr. Gay, who had sold it to Mr. Warde, the vendor. After the expiration of the ten days allowed by the conditions for making objections to the title, the defendants discovered the previous transactions as to the circumstances under which the appointment was made, the failure in the attempt to sell to the Law Reversionary Society, and the fact that certain statutory declarations had been made to avoid the objections to the appointment; and they thereupon declined to complete the purchase on the ground, that these material facts had not been disclosed, and that they were calculated to throw a doubt upon the validity of the title. A correspondence then took place, in the course of which the defendants' solicitor wrote a letter to the plaintiff's solicitor, stating, that the difficulty might be, perhaps, removed, if Miss Lloyd would join in the conveyance; but no result having been arrived at, this suit was instituted for specific performance of the contract.

The defendants, by their answer, stated their willingness to complete the purchase, provided a good title could be shewn. Evidence on both sides had been produced, and the case now came on upon motion for a decree.

Mr. Amphlett and Mr. C. T. Simpson appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that the appointment was bond fide, and the father had full power to make it; that there was no evidence to shew that Miss Lloyd had not benefited by it, and it was clear that her outfit and passage-money had been paid out of the proceeds of the mortgage. They also contended, that the plaintiff had power to rescind the contract by the conditions of sale, without payment of costs, and this he claimed to do, unless the Court decreed specific performance. They cited M'Queen v. Farquhar (1).

Mr. Baily and Mr. G. Lake Russell, for the defendants, submitted that the plaintiff ought to have stated upon the abstract of title the facts which had subsequently been discovered, and therefore the defendants were justified in raising objections upon those facts, although the time for making objections had expired; that from the subsequent evidence it appeared the appointment had been made in fraud of the power according to the rules of the Court, for that the money obtained under it had never been applied to the benefit of the appointee, who was living at the time of the appointment under the controul and influence of her father; and that the circumstances which had now come to light were sufficient to prove, either that the title was bad, or that it was so doubtful that a purchaser could not be compelled to complete.

Mr. Amphlett was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This case comes on upon motion for a decree, and when a case is brought on in that form, it is competent for the Court to, and it is expressly directed that it shall, deal with the question and with the case as justice requires. The Court may either simply refuse the motion, leaving the case in statu quo, or it may make a decree, either with or without costs, or may direct the motion to stand over, in order that further evidence may be adduced. In short, the Court may take such course as it thinks fit, with a view to work out the justice of the case between the parties. What it appears to me that I ought to do now is, to adopt the first course, and dismiss the motion, with costs, leaving the suit as it stands. I will first consider the case supposing it were entirely unencumbered by any question arising out of the correspondence between the solicitors and anything special appearing in the answers or in the bill. Here is a case in which certain property is put up for sale, which is thus described:—"The absolute reversion to the sum of 2,000*l.* consols, part of a larger sum standing in the name of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, and transferable on the death of a gentleman holding a public appointment abroad, now in his fifty-sixth year. A stop order has been lodged on the fund by the vendor. Succession duty of 1*l.* per cent. to be borne by the purchaser." From this description one may, of course, infer that the property was an absolute reversion, and that the vendor was not the original reversioner, but one who had purchased. I allude to the statement that there is a stop order, and that that stop order had been lodged on the fund by the vendor, from which the inference may be drawn that the person selling was not, as in fact he was not, the original reversioner, but one who had bought from the reversioner. When the abstract of title was delivered, it appeared from it that the reversioner was Miss F. A. Lloyd, who had attained the age of twenty-one in the month of August 1854. It also appeared that she was not simply and originally a reversioner, but that she became entitled to this 2,000*l.* by virtue of the exercise of a power of appointment. That fact was for the first time disclosed on the abstract, and it appeared that the power of appointment was one which might be executed by the father

among his children, by virtue of a marriage settlement. The father exercised that power on the 1st of January 1855, appointing to his daughter, who had attained twenty-one some four or five months previously, the sum of 2,000*l.*, out of a larger sum of 11,000*l.* That is to say, there was 7,000*l.* consols or stock, and a sum of 4,000*l.* besides, which was secured by a policy of assurance, kept up by means of the dividends on the stock, and was a perfectly secure fund. The father exercised his power in favour of this daughter to the extent of only 2,000*l.*, which was considerably less than would have been her equal share of the property. It further appeared by the abstract that, on the 3rd of January 1855, Miss Lloyd, having had the appointment made in her favour on the 1st of the month, mortgaged that reversionary interest to Mr Gay to secure 300*l.*, which was to be repaid on the 3rd of February following, that is, a month afterwards; and, in default of payment, there was a power of sale. Then, on the following day, there was a further charge in favour of Mr. Gay of an additional sum of 100*l.*, making the whole of the sum secured to Mr. Gay 400*l.* It further appeared that, on the 3rd of March 1856, Mr. Warde, the present plaintiff, and the vendor in the sale which is now sought to be enforced, had purchased this reversionary interest from Mr. Gay, the mortgagee, who sold under his power, for 510*l.* That was the whole of what appeared upon the face of the abstract, or the whole of what it is necessary to refer to now. Before I revert to what subsequently turned out to be the facts, I will state my view of what actually appeared upon the abstract. Here was an appointment made in favour of a young lady, one of several children, and immediately afterwards she raised 400*l.* upon it by mortgage. That appointment was made about five months after she attained twenty-one. What suspicion then arises there? No doubt it would cross the mind of any one that this was probably not for the benefit of the daughter, considering that she was then young, and that she had immediately mortgaged it, and had evidently contracted to mortgage it before the appointment was made in her favour. There would be a certain degree of suspicion, though not, perhaps, a very strong suspicion, arising out of these circumstances, but a thousand suggestions might be made of the most probable kind as reasons why that was a most proper transaction. A young lady having just attained twenty-one might want the money. She might have been about to marry, or she might be going out to some colony or into some business, or she might require it for any other advancement in life, and by means of this appointment in her favour, she would be acquiring the power of raising a sum of money by mortgage. Therefore, although I think a certain degree of suspicion might arise from what appeared upon the abstract, yet it would not be such a suspicion as would necessarily lead a person to further investigation. I think a very careful person would have investigated further, and I am rather surprised that no further investigation was made as to why this transaction took place; but when the matter comes to be looked into with care, the purchaser discovers these facts:—that at the time when the appointment was made, this young lady was living and continued to live under the controul, that is, in the domestic circle, and, therefore, under the controul of her father; and, also, that when the appointment was made, her father was a person in a good station of life in point of birth and connexion, but in somewhat reduced and straitened circumstances, and was glad to accept an appointment in South Africa as a colonial chaplain, and that he was about to proceed to Port Natal with this very daughter and two other daughters, three out of his four children. They embarked on the 7th of January 1855, but they did not actually sail till three days afterwards. The ship, in fact, lay off Deal, but did not sail until the 10th or 11th. That is a fact which is discovered, and, moreover, it is said that the gentleman who was acting as the solicitor for Miss Lloyd in the matter was, as might be expected, the solicitor of her father, and was also the solicitor of Mr. Gay, the mortgagee. It is further discovered that the 165*l.* which was paid, or agreed to be paid as the passage-money of the family to South Africa was paid in this way:—The father, Mr. Lloyd, gave an order upon Mr. Dodd, his solicitor, for 150*l.*, and the remaining 15*l.* was to be paid subsequently. For the 400*l.* advanced by Mr. Gay, the mortgagee, a cheque was given for an odd sum of 336*l.* That cheque was paid at the private banker's partly by a bank-note for 300*l.*, and that note was exchanged at the Bank of England for so many 5*l.* notes, and of these 5*l.* notes twenty-seven are traced as paying not for the mere passage-money or outfit of Miss Lloyd, but for the passage-money of the whole family.

Now, these facts appear, and consistently with them it is possible that the whole thing was perfectly right and bona fide, and neither a fraud upon the power, nor a fraud nor an imposition upon Miss Lloyd herself. That is perfectly possible, but nobody can doubt for one moment that when these additional facts are ascertained, they do raise the gravest question whether the transaction was fair in many points of view; whether it was fair and right as regards the other children; whether it was not what this Court calls a fraud upon the power, not a moral fraud, but a fraud which might be set aside by the other children; and whether, having regard to the position of this young lady, under the control of her father, going abroad with him, and having recently attained twenty-one, she might not also complain of the transaction as a matter in which the father, exercising undue influence over her, had induced her to mortgage her property in order to raise money for his benefit. No one can question for a moment that these additional facts, as they appear, raise the very gravest doubts. Supposing the case rested simply on that state of circumstances, and that I were asked by the vendor to decree specific performance of this contract, is it possible I could do so? I should be obliged, if it stood there simply, to dismiss the vendor's bill, and I should certainly be under the necessity of dismissing it with costs. But I must now consider what is the effect of the condition upon which, very naturally, great reliance is placed by the counsel for the plaintiff. I must take this into consideration. At the time when Mr. Warde put this property up for sale, what did he know? He, of course, knew the circumstances under which he had bought, and it appears that they were these: that he bought immediately after—that is, somewhat less than a month after—an attempt by Mr. Gay, the mortgagee, to sell the property by auction, and Mr. Warde knew that his purchase was made upon the conditions of sale at that auction. I think he also knew of the prior attempt in May 1855, but that is not material, because the conditions on both sales are very much the same. I believe he knew that, when Mr. Gay put up the property for sale, it was put up with a condition referring to certain statutory declarations which had been made, and that the statements in those statutory declarations were to be assumed to be true, whether they were true or not. Whatever was stated in those statutory declarations, they were conclusive as to the facts therein stated. He knew also the circumstances which I have mentioned, except that the 150*l.* or any portion of the money was actually applied in paying the passage-money. He did not know that fact, but he knew that the daughter was under the dominion of her father, and that they were going to Port Natal, and sailing at the time that I have mentioned. He knew also this very remarkable circumstance—though it was not conclusive that the transaction with the father and the daughter was a fraud either on the power of the father or on the daughter—that the purpose for which this appointment was made to the daughter was to enable the money to be raised, in order that the father and the family might go out to Port Natal. It might be a very useful thing for the family, the very best thing that could happen to any one of them, and I dare say it was; but he knew this, because it appeared from some of the letters produced from the custody of Mr. Warde, that before the 1st of January, which was the date of the appointment by the father, negotiations were on foot for the sale of the reversionary sum, proposed to be appointed, to a reversionary interest society, called “The Law Reversionary Interest Society;” they were actually in negotiation for the sale to that society before the appointment had even been made. Now, all these circumstances were circumstances known to Mr. Warde; and Mr. Warde knew this, that those statutory declarations had been made with a view—I do not say what their effect is at this moment, but certainly with a view—to remove the suspicion, and not merely the suspicion, but a grave doubt, whether the matter was not such as this Court would have set aside as fraudulent, either in one view or the other. He knew what the statutory declarations contained. He knew that a statutory statement of Mr. Dodd represented this circumstance that, while the ship was at Deal, Mr. Lloyd went up to London, for the purpose of making a statutory declaration to the same effect as those made by Mr. Brady and Mr. Dodd, with a view to satisfy any person to whom these facts should become known, that this money was raised exclusively for the benefit of the daughter; and that the father had derived no benefit from it at all. The reason why the statutory declaration was not on that occasion made by the father was, that when they got to town it was late in the day; they went to some notary public, whose office was closed; they did not find him; they were afraid the ship would sail, and they were obliged to hurry back. They went back; the thing was never done, but Mr. Lloyd promised that, as soon as he got out to Port Natal he would send home a statutory declaration to the required effect. Mr. Warde swears that no such statutory declaration, as far as he had any reason to suppose, had ever been sent home.

Mr. Warde considers then, when he is putting up the property for sale by auction on the 7th of January, what is his best course. He says, “I know the natural suspicion—not only natural suspicion, but doubt—which must present itself to the mind of any one if these facts once become known. I am quite aware of that, and I am quite aware that, when the property was put up before, I only gave, by private contract, 510*l.*, being about 20*l.* more than the reserve bidding on that occasion. But I will get as much as I can.” I do not mean to find fault with him for trying to get as much as he could, but he considers how he should put it up for sale in such a manner as should realize the utmost without enabling the purchaser to say “your title is a bad one.” Therefore these conditions of sale are prepared: “All requisitions upon or objections to the title shall be made and sent to the vendor's solicitors within ten days after the delivery of the abstract, and in default thereof they shall be considered to have been waived.” Then comes another condition, entitling the vendor, in case he is either unable or unwilling to meet any objection that may be raised, to rescind the contract at his pleasure upon a mere return of the deposit, without interest or costs. And then comes this condition: “The vendor who purchased from a mortgagee with full power of sale shall not be bound to enter into any covenant for the production of the settlement under which the reversion is derived, nor shall the concurrence of any other party be required.” Then, with these conditions of sale he puts upon the abstract nothing but what I have already stated, namely, the fact that Miss Lloyd attained twenty-one in August 1854, the fact of the appointment to her by her father on the 1st of January 1855 of 2,000*l.* in reversion, and the fact that on the 3rd and 4th of January Miss Lloyd mortgaged that for 400*l.*; and then that Mr. Gay sold it to Mr. Warde, and that Mr. Warde is now the vendor. Only see the position. I am not at all supposing that Mr. Warde knew, or had any reason to suppose, that the fact actually was, that part of the very money which Mr. Gay paid to Miss Lloyd went to pay the passage-money of the whole family. I am not supposing that; but he knew facts enough to lead him to suppose that without this condition, and without making the abstract represent what it did, he would expose himself to great objection as to title. I do not like, as I am only dismissing the motion, and not deciding the case, to say a word more than is necessary in order to explain the view I now take, which induces me to dismiss the motion with costs. But I cannot help observing, that there is not absent from my mind the consideration, whether these are fit and proper conditions for a vendor, under such circumstances, and with such knowledge as he had, on which to put up property for sale in that manner, and with such an abstract of title. I do not think it right to express any opinion whether it was absolutely necessary that there should have been a statement of the statutory declaration on the face of the abstract; but I confess that the manner in which this property was put up for sale is not without its operation on my mind. Considering the nature of the property, and the facts known to him, he ought not to have put it up with such conditions, or to have delivered such an abstract as he has delivered, without communicating more than he did to the purchaser; because the purchaser is in this position: the abstract being delivered, he must deliver his objections and requisitions within ten days; but he knows nothing of the facts of the case, except what may appear on the face of the abstract; and, according to this condition, he is barred from all objection, unless made within ten days. Suppose he discovered this: that, in point of fact, not only were there facts raising a great doubt as to the title, but facts shewing there was no title at all; the same argument would be equally valid, to say the purchaser is precluded from raising the objection because he did not do so by his requisitions within ten days. I know there are very peculiar conditions which are becoming customary in these times which in former times we never heard of, and I do not mean to say that a vendor has not a right to fence himself with all sorts of conditions—but if there be these conditions, whether such conditions are proper or not, and facts are subsequently discovered either to shew that the vendor has no title, or what is called a bad title; or that the vendor has a title which is open to the greatest possible doubt; I, for one, will never say that the purchaser is subsequently bound and precluded from raising those objections if the facts were not known to him on which the objection is raised at the time he delivered his requisitions. Therefore, it appears to me I ought not to preclude the defendant now from raising the objection. It is not necessary that he should be able to say, “I prove your title is bad”; but that he should be able to say, “I prove facts which shew that your title is at least doubtful”; not merely raising a case of suspicion, as in M'Queen v. Farquhar, but one of grave doubt. I must say in this case, unless the matter be explained, the facts in evidence are presumptive proof that some of the money did go into the pocket of the father. But still, I admit, it is left open to shew that, though some of the money went for the benefit of the father, it was for the benefit of the daughter and of the other children, who were entitled to share. That is one of my reasons for not now dismissing the bill. The plaintiff has thought fit to bring forward this matter by way of motion for decree. He is bound to shew me that he is entitled to a decree; he does not do so, and therefore I dismiss his motion, but I will not preclude him from the opportunity, if he thinks he can avail himself of it, of shewing that there is a good title.

Now, what I have said very much disposes of the motion, but there are some minor considerations of this kind: there are suggestions as to what the defendant, by the letter of his solicitors on the 26th of March 1858 (which was, of course, after the delivery of the conditions and requisitions), and what he by his answer considered he was entitled to. It appears to me, as I have stated, that, at the time the letter of the 26th of March was written, the writer of that letter in fact had not present to his mind any objection as to the appointment being a fraud on the power; otherwise he would not have written that letter. That letter amounts to this only: “let Miss Lloyd join, and I am content, and will complete.” Well, Miss Lloyd's joining could not remove the objection, if it was an objection, as to the appointment being a fraud on the power. When the answer is put in, it appears to me that the learned counsel who drew it had not present to his mind so distinctly as now, the question as to the invalidity of the execution of the power in the way I have mentioned; but I cannot hold that the answer being put in precluded the defendant from raising that objection, as well as all the other objections, which depend very much on the same state of facts. The same state of facts raises the two chief objections: one, of its being a fraud on the power; and the other, of its being an imposition or undue influence exercised on Miss Lloyd. The same fact goes very much to the same point, and it appears to me that the defendant is not precluded from setting up that point by his answer.

The only other point to which I think it necessary to advert is this. It is suggested by the plaintiff's counsel, that the condition as to the right to rescind, is a condition of which he is entitled to avail himself; and that if the Court would make an order to the effect that there is to be first of all a decree for specific performance, and then a reference as to title in the usual way—having regard to the conditions of sale—he is content not to rescind. But if the Court will not give him that, then that he ought to be entitled to rescind the contract—nay, more, that if he so rescinds, the Court ought to give him the costs of the suit. I confess I am unable to understand how he can claim the latter, even if he could claim the former. I conceive the very purpose of the condition is, to save the vendor the obligation of going into litigation. The vendor says, "I reserve to myself the power of rescinding, because there may be a great deal of difficulty caused by the requisitions. I may find it very inconvenient, or very expensive, and, perhaps, almost impossible, to answer them, or to meet the objections; and, therefore, I reserve to myself the power. If I do not, the purchaser may file a bill against me; I may be dragged into equity, or I may have an action brought against me for non-performance of the contract; and therefore I reserve to myself the power of rescinding the contract, that I may not be exposed to such a result. The plaintiff, however, says, "I know I may rescind the contract if I like, but I will not rescind the contract; and so far from objecting to being dragged into equity at all, I will myself drag the purchaser in. I will file my bill, and bring the cause to a hearing." I think I may say this, that if the cause comes to a hearing, the vendor will find it very difficult to satisfy me that he is entitled to ask to rescind the contract. He cannot ask to rescind the contract, and put aside the other proposition as to his being entitled to the costs of the suit. The question is, what he may do in the present state of things? The cause does not come to a hearing except so far as under the new practice a motion for a decree may be said in one sense to bring the cause to a hearing. I think that, under such a condition as this, if a vendor files a bill and afterwards dismisses his bill, he may be—I do not say he is—then entitled to say, "I will still resort to my condition, and rescind the contract;" but if he is so entitled, he must first dismiss his bill; and how he is to dismiss his bill, except by dismissing it with costs, I really do not know. I think, therefore, he would have to dismiss his bill with costs before he could say he is entitled to rescind the contract. Well, in this state of things, I refuse this motion with costs: but I do not mean to express any opinion that when that is done it is not competent to the plaintiff to dismiss his bill with costs, and then rescind the contract. This will leave the cause exactly in the same position in which it was at the time when the notice of motion was given.

Nov. 24. { NOBLE v. HODGES.

Administration of Estate — Costs — Executor, Action against.

If an executor administers the estate of his testator and pays over the residue so that no part can be recovered to answer a subsequent debt of the testator, he will not as against appropriated legacies be entitled to the costs of an action brought against him by the creditor, or of a proceeding necessary to establish the debt, or of any suit by him to make the appropriated legacies available for the payment of the debt (1).

Samuel Hodges, by his will, dated the 3rd of May 1843, directed his executors to invest 4,000*l.* in their names and in the names of his two sons, Samuel and William, to remain until his two sons should severally attain twenty-five, at which time the sum of 2,000*l.* was to be paid to each. The residue of his estate he gave to Sarah Brett.

William Noble and Sarah Brett, the executor and executrix, paid the testator's debts, and invested the two sums of 2,000*l.* as directed by the will, in the purchase of two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* consols. The residue of the testator's estate, amounting to 308*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, was received by Sarah Brett, as residuary legatee.

(1) Morris v. Livie, 1 You. & C. C.C. 380; a. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 172.

On the 26th of October 1855, Samuel Hodges sold and assigned his interest in his legacy to Thomas Hayley, for 1,500*l.*

On the 6th of May 1856, W. Dyson, who was seised in fee of certain premises which had been let on lease to the testator Samuel Hodges, but which had been sold by him in his lifetime, brought an action against William Noble and Sarah Brett, for damages consequent on breaches of the covenants contained in the lease.

William Noble then filed a claim against Sarah Brett, for the administration of the testator's estate, and upon notice of this a Judge's order was obtained, staying the action, and giving W. Dyson leave to prove his demand in the suit of Noble v. Brett.

The suit of Noble v. Hodges was afterwards instituted by William Noble, in order that the two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* might be secured for the benefit of the parties entitled thereto; the only order made in this suit was, that the two sums of stock should be transferred to contingent accounts, the one of S. Hodges and T. Hayley, and the other of W. Hodges, but no order was made as to the costs.

An order was then made in Noble v. Brett, that Mrs. Brett should pay the amount of the testator's residuary estate into court; and after payment of costs, that W. Dyson's demand, which had been ascertained to amount to 188*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, should be satisfied. Mrs. Brett was, however, insolvent, and unable to pay anything; and, finally, she took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act.

The decree made in Noble v. Hodges was drawn up by T. Hayley, as W. Noble declined to proceed further with the suit.

By an order, dated the 13th of January 1858, and made in both causes upon the petition of W. Dyson, after directing the costs and subsequent interest upon the debt to be ascertained, it was declared that he was entitled to be paid his debt (which, with interest and costs thereon, amounted to 207*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*), and also the subsequent interest and costs, in equal moieties out of the two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* consols, and leave was given to W. Dyson to prosecute the order made in Noble v. Hodges; and after directing a sale and payment of the debt and costs out of the two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, when brought into court, it ordered that the costs of W. Noble and of T. Hayley should be costs in the cause; but such order was made without prejudice to any question between the executors and S. and W. Hodges and T. Hayley.

W. Dyson took no proceedings under the order of the 13th of January 1858 to obtain payment of his claim; and as the two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* had not been transferred into court in pursuance of the order made in Noble v. Hodges, T. Hayley presented this petition, praying that W. Noble and Sarah Brett alone might, upon his satisfying one moiety of the debt, interest and costs due to W. Dyson, be directed to transfer to him the sum of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* consols, standing in the names of W. Noble, S. Brett, J. Davies and S. Hodges, in the books of the Bank of England.

On the 31st of July 1858, the petition came on, but the Court only ordered that the stock should be transferred into court, as directed by the decree made in the suit of Noble v. Hodges, and the rest of the petition was directed to stand over.

On the 27th of August 1858, W. Noble and S. Brett transferred the two sums of 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* into court.

The petition was, therefore, again brought on to determine the right of the parties to costs.

Mr. Hardy, for T. Hayley.—The fund purchased by T. Hayley had been rendered liable to a debt through the negligence of the executor; he ought, therefore, to be responsible for the costs; no part ought to be paid out of the fund purchased by Mr. Hayley.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. G. L. Russell, for Mr. Noble.—There is no ground for dealing with Mr. Noble as an executor misconducting himself: he had not misapplied any of the testator's estate. W. Noble, after bringing back the fund into the general assets, was entitled to all the subsequent costs.

Knatchbull v. Fearnhead, 3 Myl. & Cr. 122.

Gillespie v. Alexander, 3 Russ. 130; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 52; 2 Sim. & S. 145.

Mr. Hardy, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—An executor, when distributing the estate of his testator, must run some risk, unless he acts under the direction of this Court. In this case the executor administered the estate; he set apart sufficient sums to answer two legacies of 2,000*l.*, and allowed his co-executrix, who was the residuary legatee, to appropriate the residue. After a lapse of some time a claim was made against the estate of the testator; it arose in consequence of a breach of covenant contained in a lease of premises, which had been granted to the testator, but which in his lifetime he had disposed of. The executor refused to pay the demand, and the lessor brought an action to recover the amount claimed; and one question now to be decided was, who was liable to pay the costs incurred? It was clear that the executor should not have resisted the action: he had no defence at law, and he had no pretence for asking to throw the costs upon the legatees. He then filed a claim for the administration of the estate of the testator; but it was not practically for that purpose, its real object was to make the sums set apart to pay the legacies answerable for the liabilities incurred by the testator upon the covenants in the lease, as well as to secure a fund for the payment of his own costs. The debts and liabilities of the testator must be discharged, and I thought that Mr. Dyson's demand ought to be satisfied out of the funds set apart to answer the legacies—Noble v. Brett (2). It was impossible to consider those funds as money which had not gone out of the hands of the executor, or as if they were funds in a course of administration: the residue which S. Brett had received and retained ought to have been applied towards the discharge of the debt of Mr. Dyson: it was, however, dissipated, and the amount of the demand could not be realized from her. If W. Noble had applied to the legatee or his assignee before he had filed his bill, and had asked them to pay the debt, I should, if they had refused, have held him entitled to his costs. In this case, however, a suit was instituted, asking that the legacies might make good a deficiency, which had been occasioned, by his allowing the residuary legatee to retain the fund liable to pay the testator's debts. It had been argued that the Court would not have permitted the executor to retain any assets in his hands to indemnify him against the breach of any covenant the testator might have entered into; but in those cases the fund was administered by the Court, and the executor was protected from any further liability; here, however, it could not be contended that the fund in court was to indemnify the executor from the costs incurred in consequence of the action brought by W. Dyson, or of the proceedings which had been rendered necessary to establish his debt: they could not be separated, and could not be considered as costs in the cause; they, therefore, must be treated the same, and the costs of the claim and the costs of the suit must also follow the costs of the action. As for T. Hayley's applications to obtain a transfer of the fund, he must, as he failed, pay the costs of them, but those costs were wholly distinct from the suit, the object of which was to determine whether the fund was liable to the demand of W. Dyson. It certainly could not be considered as an administration suit, or as a suit instituted by a trustee on behalf of T. Hayley. It was impossible, therefore, to give to W. Noble the costs asked for out of the funds, which had been brought into court.

Extract from the Order.

It was ordered, that the Taxing Master do tax W. Noble his costs, charges and expenses properly incurred in consequence of the claim of T. Hayley to a transfer of the fund before the institution of the suit of Noble v. Hodges; and his costs as between solicitor and client of and relating to this petition; and the defendant Sarah Brett her costs of and relating to this petition as between solicitor and client, and certify the amount thereof. And W. Dyson, by his counsel admitting that he has received the amount of his claim due and payable out of the fund, pursuant to the order, dated the 13th of January 1858, it was ordered, that so much of the 1,872*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* consols standing "To the contingent account of the defendant, Samuel Hodges and his assignee, T. Hayley," as will be sufficient to raise the costs, charges and expenses, and costs when so taxed, be sold, and the amount placed to the credit of the cause, the like account: and out of the money to arise by the said sale it is ordered, that the costs, charges and expenses and costs of the plaintiff be paid to ———, his solicitor, and the costs of Sarah Brett to ———, her solicitor. And it was ordered, that the residue of the said consols, after the payments aforesaid, and any interest to accrue on the said consols previous to the transfer, be paid to T. Hayley; and such order was declared to be without prejudice to the petitioner T. Hayley's rights under the order of the 13th of January 1858.

WOOD, V.C. { In the matter of THE ATHENÆUM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.
Jan. 11, 28. { SHEFFIELD'S CASE.

Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849—Contributory—Misrepresentation.

S. took shares in a joint-stock company, and signed the deed, upon the representation made by one of the officers of the company that such deed contained a clause limiting the liability of the shareholders to the amount of their shares. This clause had been fraudulently inserted in the deed after complete registration, and was not contained in the registered deed. S. attended meetings of the company and received dividends for three years, when the company was ordered to be wound up:—Held, that S. was liable as a contributory.

This was an application to review the chief clerk's decision in putting Mr. Sheffield's name on the list of contributories of the Athenæum Life Assurance Society.

Mr. Sheffield was appointed an agent of the company, in May 1851, and in October of the same year, upon the representation made by the managing clerk and cashier of the company, that the paid-up capital of 1*l.* per share was all that could possibly be demanded of the shareholders, he consented to take five shares in the society, which were paid for by the deduction of 5*l.* from his commission, and he signed the deed for five shares, but without reading it.

In February 1852 he was again applied to to take more shares, and he then agreed to take fifteen more shares, being again assured that the deed of the company fully protected him from all risk beyond the amount for which he signed the deed, and on the 28th of February he signed the deed for these fifteen shares, the money being deducted from commission as before.

On four several occasions Sheffield received dividends on the twenty shares, viz., the 30th of December 1852, the 1st of June 1854, the 30th of December 1854, and the 30th of June 1855. He also attended three general meetings of the shareholders, held respectively in August 1852, in August 1853 and August 1854, and two extraordinary general meetings in December 1855 and July 1856.

The deed of settlement was dated the 2nd of May 1851, and it appeared by the evidence that, between the 27th of July 1851 and the 5th of October 1852, it contained a clause by which it was expressly declared that the funds and property of the company remaining unapplied and inapplicable to prior claims should be alone liable to make good all liabilities of the company, and that no officer or shareholder of the company should be in any other way individually or personally liable to any such claims, or in any manner whatsoever, if his shares were fully paid up, nor beyond the amount due on his shares or interest if not fully paid up, nor for any longer period than he should retain the same. This clause was fraudulently inserted in the deed by the interpolation of a skin of parchment, after the complete registration of the company, and was removed some time in October 1852, without affecting the appearance of the deed.

Several persons executed the deed whilst it contained the interpolated clause, and in the case of three gentlemen who had executed the deed in this condition, it had been determined by the Vice Chancellor in chambers that they were not liable as contributories—see 4 Kay & J. 308.

The account of the transaction given by Mr. Sheffield was as follows:—

“I was appointed agent for the society in May 1851, or thereabouts. I was frequently applied to by Messrs. Whitehead and Sutton (the managing clerk and cashier of the society) to take shares. I agreed to take shares as soon as I had done some business for the society. In October 1851 I did some business for the society, by issuing a policy, and I then determined to take shares in the society, and I went to Mr. Whitehead and told him I was willing to take five shares. The board was sitting, and he went into the board-room and brought out with him the deed of settlement, which I then signed. No scrip or document was then given me, as I did not then pay any money. * * * On the 27th of December 1851, I think, I settled an account with the society, and from the commission due to me as agent to the society, the society deducted, with my assent, 5*l.* as the full amount of my subscription for the five shares. * * In February 1852 I was applied to by Mr. Whitehead and by Mr. Sutton to take some more shares in the company. I ultimately, on the 28th of February 1852, agreed to take fifteen more shares, on the assurance of Mr. Sutton and Mr. Whitehead that I should not run any risk beyond the paid-up capital. Mr. Sutton, I think, then fetched the deed of settlement, and I again executed it, for fifteen shares. My name appearing on the eighth page of the deed is in my handwriting. The 15*l.*, the full amount of my subscription for the last-mentioned shares, were allowed by me to be deducted by the society in my account with the society."

Being cross-examined on his own behalf, he said, in addition to what he had already stated—"On the 17th of October 1851, I was at the office and took five shares. Mr. Whitehead then shewed me several signatures of parties to the deed, and assured me that all the directors were shareholders. Before signing the deed I said, 'Is there any risk or liability beyond the paid-up capital of 1*l.* per share?'—and he assured me that there was not; and I remarked that if there were any other risk or liability it would be like signing my death-warrant, as I was not in a position to meet any further calls. He again assured me it was a good investment, and that I had no occasion to fear any further liability, the deed providing against the liability of any additional calls beyond the amount of 1*l.* per share. I did not read the deed; Mr. Whitehead told me it was very voluminous, and that I should never read it through, and that it was wanted in the board-room."

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Roxburgh, in support of the application, contended that Mr. Sheffield could not be held to have executed the deed of settlement of the company. He executed a deed containing a clause which limited the liability of shareholders, and when that clause was taken away it became a different deed from the one which he had executed. They cited

The misrepresentation of the servants of the society did not bind the society. At all events, it is too late to complain now, after attending meetings of the society and receiving dividends on his shares.

Mr. Daniel, in reply.

Jan. 28.—Wood, V.C.—This is one of those numerous cases which have arisen in consequence of the gross frauds committed by some of the directors of the Athenæum Society. Mr. Sheffield having signed the company's deed of settlement at a time when it contained a clause which formed no part of the original registered deed of the company, but was surreptitiously inserted in it by the directors, and having not only taken shares but having received dividends for three or four years after so taking them, the question now is, whether he is or is not a contributory within the meaning of the act of parliament. With regard to any fraud in misrepresenting what the deed itself was, I apprehend nothing can be made of that. Of course, the representations made by the secretary could have no effect at all, if the deed were different from what it was represented to be; for though companies have been held to be bound in some cases by the act of all the directors acting in the due execution of their powers, it has never yet been held, that an officer of a company misrepresenting the effect of a deed, it being no part of his functions to explain or expound that deed, could release a shareholder. In fact, if you look at it strictly, the evidence, when analyzed, would not amount to actual misrepresentation. The representation appears to have been to the effect that he would not be liable to any other calls. To a certain extent that is quite true, for although he might be liable in contribution with respect to the debts of the company, he is not liable to any calls which the directors may make. The directors are only authorized to make calls to the amount of the shares. Mr. Sheffield's case was therefore to be put thus:—that he cannot be fixed as a member of the company, the only company that he bound himself to being an association of persons met together for a different purpose and under a different deed, and the deed he put his name to not being the deed of the company now in course of winding up, but a different deed altogether. After considering the case for some time, it occurred to me that it would be singular if he could escape on this ground, having accepted dividends for three or four years. I do not say that taking those dividends is any ratification of the deed, no difference in the deed as executed having been pointed out to him, and no alteration having been called to his attention since the time he executed it. But the real state of things is this: the Courts have held, and the House of Lords has always held, that third persons dealing with companies must be supposed to know the contents of the deed. The deed is registered for every one's inspection, and those who deal with the directors of these companies must be taken to know what the powers of those directors are, and must be bound to know the contents of the deed. Now, if that is so, it would be singular if a shareholder should be allowed to go on for five years and then say he did not know what the contents of the deed were. Even assuming that he had been led to execute this deed upon having the clause shewn to him, as was the case in some other instances which I have had, it would be difficult to say that persons continuing to receive dividends and income from the society could be held to be excused from any contribution in respect of that society. The other case I have had to deal with was that of a person who executed the deed having had that clause pointed out to him; and he did not receive any dividends. In this case I have this fact, that a man signs a deed which happens to be not the deed of the company, but a deed of a very different description. I hold, on the evidence, that he does not sign on the faith of there being anything in the deed, except that he is told that it is a deed that would not subject him to calls (and he is truly so told, taking it one way,) beyond the amount of 1*l.* per share. He is content with this. But he must be taken to know that the deed is registered, yet he never looks to ascertain what the purport of it is; he has continued to receive the dividends of the company, which in this case, as in the case of some other companies, I am afraid have been paid out of the capital subscribed by the shareholders, and not out of the profits. He has been receiving, therefore, the monies of his contributories in the shape of dividends, and yet he now claims to be exempted from liability, with his co-contributories, when a loss has occurred, after he has remained four or five years without saying anything about the matter. I am afraid that in every case which arises out of this Athenæum Company, I shall have some special class of circumstances to deal with, every case differing from the others; but in this case, where I do not find the clause in question pointed out, or anything more than a mere exposition of the contents of the deed, and where I do not find this gentleman making any inquiry at the office where the deed is registered, to see what the true state of the matter was, but where I find him taking the profits for several years out of the concern, I think that under these circumstances he must be held to be a contributory.

Jan. 13, 14. } COURSE v. HUMPHREY.

Trustees—Suit against—Separate Defences—Costs.

If trustees, defendants to a bill filed against them for the execution of the trusts of a will, appear separately and sever in their defence, one set of costs alone will be allowed, and in the absence of evidence shewing misconduct, the Court will not order the costs to be paid to one trustee only.

John Course, by his will, dated the 6th of March 1854, appointed Martin Humphrey and Alfred Hayward his executors and trustees. The testator died on the 8th of May 1854, and in November 1856 this suit was instituted by his widow, Susannah Course, on behalf of herself and her only child, against the trustees. The bill charged that the defendants had sold part of the real estate of the testator, and had not invested or applied the proceeds according to the trusts of the will; that the plaintiffs were unable to obtain any accounts from the defendants, and that they believed that the defendants had considerable sums of money in their hands belonging to the testator's estate; that these were likely to be lost or misapplied, as A. Hayward was in insolvent circumstances; and that the plaintiffs had no other property, and had not for sometime received anything from the defendants. The bill then prayed for an administration of the estate, and also that the defendants might be charged with interest on any sums in their hands, and that they might be removed from the trust, and that new trustees might be appointed in their place. The trustees put in separate answers, and severed in their defence. On the 20th of January 1857 Mr. Humphrey put in his answer, stating that he had received the money arising from the sale of the personal effects of the testator, and that after paying several debts he had handed the balance to Mr. Hayward, his co-executor, that he might pay other debts of the testator. He admitted that he had in his hands a balance arising from the rents of the real estate, and stated that the proceeds of such part of the real estate as had been sold had been paid to Mr. Hayward, his co-trustee, and that he had thereout paid several incumbrances on the estate, but that he did not know what balance remained in his hands; that he had frequently requested him to make up the executorship accounts; that he had not done so, and that he had absconded in June 1856, and that all access to the trust papers had been refused to him, and that he believed his co-executor was in insolvent circumstances.

On the 12th of August 1857 Mr. Hayward, who was a solicitor, put in his answer. He stated that he had paid more than he had received on account of the trust estate, and denied that the plaintiffs had any reason to believe that the money received by him would be lost to the testator's estate.

A decree was made for the administration of the estate, and upon taking the accounts, the chief clerk found that on account of the receipts of the personal estate and the rents of the real estate there was due from Mr. Humphrey a balance of 73*l.* 11*s.*, and that there was due to A. Hayward a balance of 24*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*: but that there was due from A. Hayward 40*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, a balance of monies which arose from real estates sold; and that after deducting the 24*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* it left due 15*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*, and that this being further increased by 13*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, charged for interest on balances in his hands, made a sum of 29*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* due from A. Hayward.

The suit was then brought on for further consideration, and after disposing of the case on the merits, the Court considered that the defendants had no right to sever in their defence, and directed that they should receive one set of costs only. Mr. Humphrey claimed the whole, but this was objected to by A. Hayward.

Mr. Waller, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Smale, for Mr. Humphrey.—Mr. Humphrey had no course left open but to put in a separate answer: his co-trustee had become insolvent, and had absconded. Inquiries had been made for him, but without success; the plaintiffs, in the mean time, had pressed Mr. Humphrey for his answer, and he was ultimately compelled to answer separately to avoid an attachment. All charges of fraud and misconduct had been abandoned. Mr. Humphrey, therefore, was entitled to the full costs of the suit, and to his costs, charges and expenses, and as the necessity of putting in a separate answer had been caused by Mr. Hayward, if one set of costs only was to be allowed, Mr. Hayward was not entitled to receive any part of them.

Mr. Tripp, for Mr. Hayward, insisted that he had not, by any act, deprived himself of his right to a share of the costs awarded to the trustees.

Mr. Smale, in reply.

Jan. 14.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is no reason why the plaintiffs should be required to pay more than one set of costs. The defendants were not justified in severing in their defence; the accounts were to be rendered by both. There may have been some misconduct on the part of Mr. Hayward which compelled his co-trustee to put in a separate answer, and sever in his defence, and as between them there may be grounds to justify the payment of the whole of the costs to Mr. Humphrey, but I cannot enter into that question. As the evidence at present stands between the defendants it would be contrary to the practice of the Court, and further inquiry and further evidence could only lead to increased expense; it must, therefore, be left to the Taxing Master. I cannot order the whole costs to be paid to one trustee only (1).

Hayward*, and out of the 73*l.* 11*s.* and 29*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, when paid, it was ordered that what should be certified to be the amount of the costs of the defendants, when taxed, should be paid to their respective solicitors," &c.

*deceased tenant for life under a settlement, in the application to the liquidation of a charge on the settled estates, of the proceeds of part of such settled estates, while there was in his hands, as personal representative of the settlor, personal estate of such settlor primarily applicable to the liquidation of the charge. The answer of the personal representative of the deceased tenant for life asserted the trust to have been duly and regularly performed by such tenant for life, and as evidence thereof set forth references to the accounts rendered of the settlor's personal estate by his representative, the deceased tenant for life, to the Stamp Office. The plaintiffs did not amend their bill to meet the prima facie case thus set up by the defendant:—Held, the alleged breach of trust having taken place (if at all) at least thirty years back, that the plaintiffs were not, under the circumstances, entitled to an account of the settlor's personal estate.*

A tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, pulled down the family mansion-house, and built a better mansion in another part of the settled estate, using the old materials. It appeared that for years prior to 1819, the date of the settlement, the settlor had contemplated the abandonment of the mansion and the building of another, and that the settlement contained powers of sale and exchange, and also a power to grant building leases of the settled premises, including the site of the old mansion-house:—Held, that the tenant for life was not liable to an account and inquiry as to the application of the materials of the old mansion-house.—On appeal from the latter part of the decree, the Lords Justices affirmed the decision, as the tenant for life had neither sold nor applied to his own use any part of the old materials, but had merely enjoyed them in an altered form.

By indenture of settlement, dated the 8th of June 1819, certain freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates, including the mansion-house and property at Clasemont, in Glamorganshire, and barony or lordship of Sketley, in Glamorganshire, and all other the manors or lordships, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments in Glamorganshire, belonging to Sir J. Morris, since deceased, were conveyed and assured by the said Sir J. Morris to trustees, their heirs, and assigns, for ever, to the use of the said Sir J. Morris for life, and after his decease to the use of the trustees for the term of 1,000 years, upon the trusts thereafter expressed concerning the same, and upon the expiration or sooner determination of the said term, and in the mean time subject thereto, to the use of the trustees, their executors, administrators and assigns, for and during the life of Sir John Morris, the son of the said Sir J. Morris, the settlor, without impeachment of waste, provided the same be committed or suffered with the privity and assent of the said Sir J. Morris, the son, upon trust to preserve the contingent uses and estates thereafter limited from being defeated or destroyed, and upon further trust that the trustees should permit and suffer the said Sir J. Morris, the son, during the term of his life, to receive the rents, issues and profits of the said manors and other hereditaments for his own use and benefit, and from and after the decease of the said Sir J. Morris, the son, to the use of Sir J. A. Morris, his eldest son, during his life, without impeachment of waste, and after the determination of that estate, by forfeiture or otherwise, during the lifetime of the said Sir J. A. Morris, to the use of the trustees during his life, in trust to preserve the contingent uses thereafter limited, but nevertheless to permit and suffer the said Sir J. A. Morris and his assigns during his life to receive the rents, issues and profits of the said manor and other hereditaments to and for his and their own use and benefit, and immediately after his decease to the use of the first and every other son of him the said Sir J. A. Morris, successively in tail male, with divers remainders over, and with the ultimate remainder to the use of the said Sir J. Morris, the settlor, his heirs and assigns for ever. And in the said indenture was contained a proviso that it should be lawful for the trustees, by the desire and at the direction of the tenant for life for the time being, to demise or lease any of the lands and hereditaments contained in the said indenture of settlement upon building leases, and also to sell or exchange the same in manner therein mentioned.

The trusts declared by the said indenture of the term of 1,000 years therein limited were, by demise, sale or mortgage, or otherwise, to raise such sums of money in aid of the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, as should be sufficient to pay off a mortgage debt of 12,000*l.* charged upon the said hereditaments and premises comprised in the said indenture of settlement, and any other sums or sum of money which then were or was, or which should at the time of the death of the said Sir J. Morris, the settlor, be charged or chargeable upon or payable out of the said premises under or by virtue of any other mortgage or charge then already made by the said Sir J. Morris, the settlor.

Sir J. Morris, the settlor, died in 1819, having by his will directed that his debts should be paid, and bequeathed his personal estate to the said Sir J. Morris, his son, whom he appointed his executor.

Upon the death of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, Sir J. Morris, his son, entered into possession of the estates comprised in the said indenture of settlement, and shortly afterwards pulled down the mansion-house called Clasemont. Having subsequently caused to be felled a number of trees which had been planted for the ornament or shelter of the said mansion-house, he was, at the suit of his son, Sir J. A. Morris, restrained by injunction from cutting down any of the trees planted for shelter and ornament, and growing upon the lands conveyed by the said settlement (1). The defendant in that suit, Sir J. Morris, the son, afterwards moved, before the Lord Chancellor, that the order for an injunction might be discharged, but the motion was refused, with costs.

Sir J. Morris, the son, died in 1855, having by his will appointed Lady Morris his sole executrix.

The bill in this suit was then filed, by Sir J. A. Morris and his infant son, J. A. Morris, against Lady Morris, alleging that the trustees of the settlement had sold part of the settled estates, and applied the proceeds in payment of a part of the above-mentioned mortgage debt, in exoneration of the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, possessed by the late Sir J. Morris, the son, as his representative, and alleging that Sir J. Morris, the son, when he pulled down the said mansion-house at Clasemont, sold part of the materials, and applied the rest to his own use, and praying that it might be declared that the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, ought to have been applied by Sir J. Morris, the son, in payment of the said mortgage debt of 12,000*l.*; and that the amount which ought to have been so applied might be ascertained and ordered to be paid into court out of the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, received by Sir J. Morris, the son, and out of the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the son, received by the defendant. The bill also prayed a declaration that the pulling down of the mansion-house at Clasemont was an act of equitable waste, and that an account might be taken of the application of the materials of the said mansion-house, and of the profits received by the said Sir J. Morris, the son, from the same, and the amount of compensation to which the plaintiffs might be entitled in respect thereof, paid into court.

The answer of the defendant Sir J. A. Morris stated that the personal estate of Sir J. Morris, the settlor, received by Sir J. Morris, the son, had been found insufficient to meet the debts of the settlor, other than the said mortgage debt of 12,000*l.*; and as evidence of the truth of such statement, it set forth the amount of the personal estate of the settlor which had been rendered to the Stamp Office.

The plaintiffs brought their case to a hearing without amending their bill, in order to meet the case set up by the answer.

There was no evidence that any part of the materials of the old mansion were sold or used otherwise than in the construction of the new house.

STUART, V.C. said that, as to the alleged misapplication of the proceeds of the sale of part of the settled estates in payment of the mortgage debt in exoneration of the testator's personal estate, that had been met by a prima facie case set up in the answer of the defendant, to the effect that the sale had been properly conducted and regularly proceeded with in execution of the trust, it having been found necessary to resort to the land by reason of the personal estate of the settlor having been found insufficient to meet his debts other than the mortgage debt. And in support of that case the answer had referred to the account of the settlor's personal estate rendered to the Stamp Office. The case thus set up by the answer had been left uncontradicted by the plaintiffs. That being so, and the transaction sought to be impeached having occurred in the execution of a trust discharged and wound up more than thirty years ago, the right of the plaintiffs to relief on this part of their case must entirely fail. Then, as to the second part of the case, viz. the right of the plaintiffs to an account and inquiry as to the profit derived by the son from the materials of the mansion-house at Clasemont, there could be no doubt that the pulling down of the mansion-house and the sale of the materials was, prima facie, an act of equitable waste which a Court of equity would restrain, if applied to before its completion, and for the profits derived from which the assets of the tenant for life would be held liable in this Court. The settlement of 1819 included this mansion-house, but, though included, it had been then for some time condemned as a place of residence by the settlor. The settlor had in fact, years before, contemplated the abandonment of it as a place of residence, and had prepared the plans of another residence to be built at Sketley in a different part of the estate. This the son afterwards did with the materials of the old mansion-house and at his own expense. The case of The Duke of Leeds v. Lord Amherst had been referred to. There could be no doubt that, in that case, the Court went to a most extraordinary and unprecedented length. In the present case the settlement contained powers of sale and exchange of the estates comprised in it, including the mansion-house, as well as a power to grant building leases, with liberty to pull down and rebuild. Under either of these powers the mansion-house might have been pulled down and a new one erected on the same or another site upon the premises. These circumstances were amply sufficient to render The Duke of Leeds v. Lord Amherst inapplicable as an authority upon the present case. It had been argued, however, that an injunction had been obtained by the present plaintiff Sir J. A. Morris in 1847, restraining his father from felling the ornamental timber. As to that, it was to be observed that, although the owner thought that the smoke of the copper-smelting houses erected in the neighbourhood was a reason for removing the family mansion, there still remained a power to grant building leases, with reference to which alone the ornamental timber might well have been considered of sufficient value to justify the order for an injunction granted by Lord Cottenham. No doubt in the shorthand-writer's notes of the judgment in that case Lord Cottenham was represented as saying that Sir J. Morris, the tenant for life, had no more right to pull down the mansion-house than the house of any other person; but as that question was not then actually before him for decision, the observation could only be regarded as a dictum, and it would be going too far to treat it as res judicata. No doubt that expression had given some pretext for the present suit, and there had besides been some misapprehension as to the effect of the decision of The Duke of Leeds v. Lord Amherst. The proper order to make would, therefore, be simply to dismiss the bill, and to say nothing about costs unless costs were pressed for.

Dec. 16.—From the above decision the plaintiffs appealed, so far as it dismissed the bill with respect to compensation, to which the plaintiffs alleged themselves to be entitled as against the estate of the former tenant for life, who had pulled down the old mansion-house and erected the new one.

The same counsel appeared as upon the original hearing. In addition to the cases then cited, Wellesley v. Wellesley (2) was referred to.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This is not a question of injunction, for the act of which complaint is made was done more than thirty years ago. It is a mere question of equitable damage, and in considering that, we must look at the peculiar circumstances of the case. That it was a reasonable, a judicious and a beneficial thing to pull down the house at Clasemont, and to use the materials, so far as they could be used, for building at Sketley, is perfectly clear; but I agree with Mr. Malins that an act may be reasonable, may be judicious, may be beneficial to all persons interested in a settled property, and yet it may be an act prohibited to a tenant for life, if a person interested in the remainder chooses to interfere. I do not put the case, therefore, merely on the reasonableness, on the judiciousness and on the beneficial nature of what was done; but those considerations are ingredients in the case. The property has been benefited by what has been done, and the plaintiffs and others interested in the remainder are receiving the benefit of it. Still, if it had been shewn, or were in any degree probable, that any part of the materials of the old house had been sold, it is very possible, notwithstanding the much larger expenditure upon the construction of the new mansion-house, that the estate of the second baronet would be held liable to account.

(2) 6 Sim. 497; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 21; 10 Sim. 256.

Here, however, there is no evidence that any part of the materials was sold; the probability is that no part was sold. There is this evidence: that the bulk of the materials—probably all that was of any value—was applied in building the present mansion-house; actually and substantially applied in building the mansion-house in a proper position on the estate, and adapted in its condition and circumstances to the purpose. In my opinion, therefore, it would be unjust, and would be straining a rule far beyond its reason, to make the tenant for life account for the materials belonging to a mansion upon the estate wisely pulled down, when the materials had been so applied. I am of opinion, therefore, that in the peculiar circumstances of the present case there is no equitable waste, and the bill ought to remain dismissed, so far as it relates to the materials of the Clasmont house; with regard to the other matter, that is understood.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I do not rest my opinion in this case upon the estate having been improved by the building of the new mansion-house and the pulling down of the old one. I am not at all satisfied that the question of improvement is one that the Court ought to proceed upon. I apprehend that the principle that the Court does proceed upon is this: that the tenant for life of an estate is liable for profit that has been received by him from an improper user of his powers in committing equitable waste; and if, therefore, the material of this house had been sold, and the money derived from the sale had come into the pocket of the deceased tenant for life, in my opinion this would have been a case for an account. But all that can be said in the present case as to any benefit that has been derived by the deceased tenant for life is this, that he enjoyed the materials during his life in a different state from that in which they originally existed upon the estate. They remained upon the estate, but they remained as materials attached to a new house, and not to the original house to which they had been formerly attached; and I do not find any evidence in the case that there has been any sale of the materials, or any other profit derived by the tenant for life, than by an enjoyment of the materials in an altered state. I think there is another subject for consideration, when you come to calculate any profit derived from the enjoyment of the materials in an account of profit against the tenant for life. I think it is applicable to a case where the tenant for life has actually received monies arising from the sale of the materials, but not by the mere user of the materials in another and a different shape. My opinion, therefore, is, that this part of the bill has been properly dismissed.

Costs, Security for—Misdescription of Residence.

A plaintiff described himself of a particular place, and stated that his wife and family resided at this address; that he was a commission agent, and travelled about the country, but had been at his residence within the last few months. Upon an affidavit that he could not be found at his address, and that his place of abode could not be discovered, he was ordered to give security for costs.

This was a motion, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff might be ordered to give security for costs, on the ground that he could not be found at the address given as his place of residence. The plaintiff had brought an action of ejectment against the defendant, in which he had failed, and a writ of ca. sa. was issued for the costs, but the sheriff was unable to find the plaintiff, who was alleged to be keeping out of the way to avoid service of the writ. The plaintiff then instituted this suit, which was in the nature of a bill for an equitable ejectment, and the plaintiff was described as of No. 26, Egerton Street, Sheffield, silversmith. The defendant, in his affidavit, stated that he had been endeavouring to find the plaintiff for the last eight months; that he had applied at his address in Sheffield, and was told that his wife resided there, but that he was absent, and his address was not known. The plaintiff had filed an affidavit, in which he stated that he rented and occupied apartments at No. 26, Egerton Street, and his wife and family resided there ; that he had himself been at this residence within the last few months, but that he travelled about the country as a commission agent.

Mr. Rasch, in support of the motion, contended that the plaintiff was not rightly described, and that as he could not be met with at the address he thought fit to give, he must be ordered to find security for costs. He cited—

Bailey v. Gundry, 1 Keen, 53 ; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 199.

Manby v. Bewicke, 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 664.

Ainslie v. Sims, 17 Beav. 57 ; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 834.

Busk v. Beetham, 2 Beav. 537 ; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 54.

Mr. Ward appeared for the plaintiff, and submitted that there was no misdescription of residence, and that if due diligence had been used the plaintiff might have been found. Being a commission agent, he was necessarily away from home very frequently, but his place of residence when at home was rightly described.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It is a sound principle, and not a technicality, that a plaintiff, although he may not actually have absconded or misdescribed himself, ought to be forthcoming, and if the defendant has no means of getting at him, he must be ordered to give security for costs. The plaintiff, in this case, instituted proceedings in another court, and upon judgment being given against him, a writ was issued for payment of the costs. The sheriff had been unable to find him, and it is alleged that he is keeping out of the way to avoid service of the writ. When his wife was applied to, she seems to have refused to divulge his whereabouts. The plaintiff, in his affidavit, does not venture to state that he has himself resided at his place of address even for a single day since the institution of the suit ; he only states that he rents and occupies apartments at No. 26, Egerton Street, and that his wife and family reside there. This is, in fact, a negative pregnant, and an admission that he does not reside there himself. Under these circumstances my opinion is, that the plaintiff must give security for costs.

Baron and Feme—Matrimonial Causes Act — Protection Order — Payment of Legacy.

A married woman entitled to a legacy in reversion was deserted by her husband in the year 1845. The legacy fell into possession and was paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act. The married woman then obtained a protection order under the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, and upon her petition the Court ordered the money to be paid out to her.

This was a petition that a sum of 142*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, which had been paid into court under the Trustees' Relief Act, might be paid to the petitioner, Mary Crew, under the following circumstances. It appeared that in the year 1845 the petitioner, who was then the wife of Vincent Crew, was deserted by her husband. At this time she was entitled to a pecuniary legacy under the will of her uncle, payable on the death of a tenant for life. Vincent Crew not having been heard of for a period of seven years, the petitioner married John Bent. The legacy fell into possession, and the trustees paid the money into court under the Trustees' Relief Act, and a petition was presented in the names of John Bent and Mary Bent that the amount might be paid to them. The Court, upon that petition, being of opinion that the presumption as to the death of Vincent Crew was not established, refused to make an order for the payment of the money to the petitioners, but ordered that the dividends should be paid to Mary Crew. That order was never drawn up, in consequence of the expense attending so small a sum. John Bent afterwards died, and Mary Crew obtained a protection order from a magistrate, under the 21st section of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. and the 8th section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, and now presented this petition in her name of Mary Crew, and without a next friend.

Mr. James Hopwood, in support of the petition, submitted that the protection order under the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Acts applied as well to property to which a married woman was entitled in remainder as to the property in possession at the time of the desertion. Bathe v. the Bank of England (1) and In re Kingsley (2) were cited.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think that under all the circumstances, and considering the time which has now elapsed since any tidings of Vincent Crew have been obtained, I may make the order prayed under the two sections of the acts referred to.

Ex parte THE PRINCE OF WALES LIFE AND EDUCATIONAL ASSUR-ANCE COMPANY, in re
THE ATHENÆUM AS-SURANCE SOCIETY.

Joint-Stock Company — Winding-up — Liability—Contract—Policy of Assurance —Proviso.

The P. of W. Company effected a cross-insurance with the A. Society on the life of J, and the latter society was ordered to be wound up. The life dropped, and the P. of W. Company having paid the amount assured claimed to prove the amount as a debt against the A. Society, and moved that the official manager might be directed to make a call upon the contributories for payment of the same. The policy of the A. Society contained a proviso that the capital and other property of the company remaining at the time of any demand unapplied and inapplicable to any prior claim or demand should alone be liable to answer and make good the claims and demands against the company by virtue of the policy, and that no director or shareholder should be in anywise individually or personally liable or subject to any claim or demand beyond the amount unpaid of his shares in the capital stock of the company. One of the Vice Chancellors refused the motion, and the P. of W. Company appealed:—Held, affirming the decision, that the liability of the shareholders was expressly limited by the contract in the policy, to which the P. of W. Company were parties, to the amount unpaid on their shares, and that no call could be made for satisfying a claim on the policy on a shareholder who had already paid up the full nominal value of his shares, or upon any other shareholder to an amount exceeding the sum due from him upon the shares held by him.

This was an application, on the part of the Prince of Wales Assurance Company, in the matter of the Athenæum Assurance Company, now in course of winding up, that the Prince of Wales Company might be permitted to prove a debt of 11,695*l.* 5*s.*, for which judgment had been entered up in the Court of Queen's Bench against the Athenæum Company, and that the official manager might be directed to make a call upon the several persons settled on the list of contributories for payment thereof, or that he might be directed to include the Prince of Wales Company as one of the creditors of the company entitled to share in any dividend which might be declared.

The facts will be found stated in the report of Durham's case (1), in which His Honour refused an application for liberty to issue execution against a shareholder. The important clause, viz. the 28th, of the deed of settlement of the Prince of Wales Company, and the policy of assurance, with its proviso, and also the 4th clause of the deed of settlement, are fully set out in the judgment of Lord Justice Knight Bruce in the appeal from this case, the 28th clause and the proviso in the policy being also stated in 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 798.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Daniel and Mr. Graham Hastings, in support of the application.—It is conclusively established by the verdict in the action that at the time of Mr. Joddrell's death there were assets sufficient to pay this claim, and the contract was that if there were assets it should be paid ; therefore, the proviso in the policy is inapplicable.

Mr. Rolé and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the official manager of the Athenæum Company.—This is like the case of a mortgage, and the applicants have nothing more than a right to payment out of particular assets. If the assets have been misapplied there is an equity against those persons who have misapplied them, but there is no other right. The question is concluded by the decision in Durham's case, and the present application is an attempt to review the decision in that case.

The cases cited were :—

The Solicitor General replied.

WOOD, V.C.—This, in truth, is in some sense the argument used in Durham's case, and if the point now urged is successful, the decision in that case was wrong, and undoubtedly a scire facias ought to have issued, and the claimant ought to have been allowed to proceed. It is said that, although under a contract to pay out of the goods of the company, and only out of those goods, when you recover judgment in an action in which you have either not made any particular averment with reference to the goods of the company, or have averred,—for it does not very distinctly appear what the pleadings were in Halket v. the Merchant Traders' Association,—that the assets were insufficient, you are not allowed to proceed against any individual shareholder, for the reason assigned in that judgment, viz., that there is a clause in the contract itself by which you are prevented from proceeding against individual shareholders, and no special case has been made beyond the actual contract for payment out of the goods of the company, no case made or proved of there being sufficient assets for the purpose. Yet, it is said, it has been established and proved in this case by the verdict of the jury that at the time this demand was made, and down to the time of bringing the action (for that is the form of the pleading), there were assets of the company. That has now been established, and we must look to see what effect the establishing of that fact has upon the contract entered into on behalf of the company. It is said that the company have contracted in the first place that payment shall be made ; they have then contracted that it shall be made out of the assets of the company alone, it is true, but that it shall be made out of the assets of the company, and it is proved that there are such assets. Therefore, you have a distinct contract on the part of the company that they will pay out of a given fund ; you find they have that fund ; having that fund they ought to have observed their contract ; not having observed it, judgment has gone against them, and consequently every individual member of the company is now liable upon that judgment. That is an ingenious way of putting the case. The real difference between it and the case which I put in the argument, of a contract in an ordinary partnership to pay out of a given fund, on which you obtain judgment against the partnership, and on which, I apprehend, the partners would be liable, is this—This is a case of contract by the company in which you recover against the company, and there is no right of proceeding against individual members, except such right as may be given by the act of parliament 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. (2). The effect of that act, as stated by Lord Denman, is not to do away with the effect of any special contract entered into with companies, but only to enable parties who had recovered on a general contract with the company, not restricted in its terms as to the remedy upon it, to enforce a judgment against the company by execution against the individual members of it, after due diligence used to obtain satisfaction from the funds of the company. That single observation does away with a very large portion of the Solicitor General's argument, which was this: Having got judgment, I throw the contract aside; I have got judgment against the company; I do not want to look at the contract, we have got beyond that; we have established our right by judgment, and we do not take the contract into consideration. Now, as far as that portion of the argument is concerned, the case of Halket v. the Merchant Traders' Association is a positive answer. There was a judgment obtained against the company, and the nobleman who was proceeded against was a shareholder of the company, yet the contest did not succeed, and a scire facias was not allowed, because the Court looked at the contract solely. Therefore, I am bound to look at the contract. I find that contract to be, not merely that the capital stock of the company of 100,000*l.* and other stock and effects of the company remaining at the time of any claim or demand being made, and not subject to prior claims, shall be applicable to this payment, but it is to be alone applicable. And then follows this proviso: "That no director or shareholder of the society, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall, by reason of this policy, be in any way individually or personally liable or subject to any such claims or demands, or be in anywise charged by reason thereof beyond the amount unpaid on his shares in the capital stock, nor longer than he shall remain a shareholder." Therefore, that gets rid of another large portion, indeed the remaining portion of the Solicitor General's argument, which was this:—You, the company, have contracted that if you have assets you will pay; and I having established against you the fact that you have assets, you have become liable, and therefore I may sue individual shareholders. But that omits to consider this clause, which has said that, under this policy or contract, whatever it be, no individual shareholder shall be affected. That, really, is the whole case. It is exactly the case of Halket v. the Merchant Traders' Association. In Durham's case you wished to proceed by scire facias against an individual shareholder. Lord Denman said, you must look at the contract, and you find that individual members have taken themselves out of the contract for every purpose. It does not signify to them whether the company contracted one thing or another. The company may do what it pleases. You, the assured, have taken a contract by which you can have recourse to the company alone. You will have any right which may ensue from your being able to sue the company corporately. You will have recourse to all their property, but you shall not under this policy have any recourse to individual shareholders. If I look at the policy to see whether they have made themselves liable under it, I find that they have put themselves out of any such liability. Therefore, it is really brought back to that simple case which I decided on a former occasion. There were other authorities then mentioned, which, notwithstanding this additional view, presenting and embracing also that view of the case, compel me to say that there is no liability whatever on the part of any individual shareholders upon scire facias. The only contract here is that the individual will be liable to the extent of his shares, the full calls on his shares, but beyond that he is not liable to anybody. It is said that the consequences will be grievous, but it does not seem to me that that is really so. If it were so, the answer, of course, is, You took the contract with your eyes open, and you must take the consequences. Again, if I was right in my decision in the case of Law v. the London Indisputable Life Policy Company, a decision to which the Master of the Rolls has also come (3), that you have a right against these particular assets, it follows, of course, whenever you suspect any malfeasance is likely to take place, you may file your bill and obtain a receiver. Of course, if your rights are disputed you will have some difficulty. All will depend upon the circumstances. If you shew reasonable ground for expecting that the property will be destroyed in the interval, and that your case, though disputed, is one in which there is a serious question to try, the Court will or will not grant a receiver according to the exigencies of the case. That is your remedy in cases of malfeasance, such as those suggested by the Solicitor General, the possibility of the property being misapplied during the interval. The only point that occurred to me was, whether any person who had received a dividend with a knowledge of the contract would not be obliged to refund. That does not seem to arise here, because I am told none were paid. But it appears to me that persons having a knowledge of the policy would not be able to draw money out of the funds to prejudice the creditors. However, all that it is necessary now to do is to decline making any call upon any persons in respect of their debt beyond the extent of unpaid calls. Then comes the question of marshalling. As to that part of the case, it is not a question whether the claimant puts himself in possession or not, but it is this question: he has got a charge, and whatever assets can be got which he can avail himself of for payment of his security ought to be as between him and other creditors, who have another fund which they can have recourse to, first applied in payment of his debt,—or rather the converse way of putting it is the right one,—that other creditors ought to be first paid their debts out of funds, which this gentleman cannot apply to, and then they will come in pari passu with him in regard to any other amount. That will be a matter of account in chambers.

The Prince of Wales Company appealed from this decision, so far as it directed that “no call shall be made in respect of the sum claimed by them upon any of the contributories of the Athenæum Society who have paid up the full amount of their shares in the capital stock of the said society, nor upon any of the said contributories beyond the amount unpaid of their shares.” During the argument it was agreed, by the counsel on both sides, that the appeal should be considered as having been presented against the whole order of the Vice Chancellor.

The Solicitor General, for the appellants.
—The argument for the appellants is, that if the Athenæum Society had not been in course of winding up, the Prince of Wales Company could have had execution against any proprietor for the whole amount; and the question for decision on this appeal is, what is the true construction of the proviso in the policy coupled with the witnessing part of that instrument? The true construction of the policy, the appellants contend, is, first, that there is an undertaking by the company to pay if the funds shall be sufficient; and, secondly, if that is not the construction, then the appellants contend, that the proviso is repugnant and void. But this is only raised if the first should fail. Thirdly, there is a representation that the capital stock is 100,000*l.*; and, fourthly, inasmuch as both parts of the policy refer to the deed of settlement, the appellants have a right to incorporate the 28th section of that deed, by which, after requiring all contracts to be executed in a particular manner, it directs that a reference shall be made to that deed, and a proviso limiting the scope and effect of the contract, so that the same shall “take effect and be satisfied only out of such funds and property of the society as under the provisions after contained shall at the time at which the liability shall accrue, be at the disposal of the directors in that behalf,” and negating an unconditional liability. Then followed a proviso, that nothing therein or in such contract contained should limit the liability of any shareholder as to the performance of such contract, or prejudice the rights of any person or persons against any such shareholder, under or by virtue of the aforesaid statute: the aforesaid statute being the act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, the title to which is set forth in the recitals of the deed of settlement. On the first point, the cases of Andrews v. Ellison (4) and Dawson v. Wrench (5) are conclusive, for they establish this, that a contract is contained in the policy that the funds shall be sufficient, that if sufficient, each shareholder is liable, but that if insufficient, no shareholder shall be liable beyond the amount unpaid on his shares. The decision in Andrews v. Ellison was the case of a fire policy, by which it was agreed that the money assured should be paid out of the funds of the company; and it was stipulated that neither the directors who signed the policy, nor the plaintiff, nor the holder of the policy, should as members be liable, except under the articles establishing the society. There was an averment that the funds were not sufficient, and a verdict on that issue for the plaintiff. The Court refused to arrest the judgment. And in Dawson v. Wrench it was stipulated, in the deed of a company, that the capital stock, &c. alone should be liable, and that no proprietor should be subject or liable beyond the amount of his shares. Then there was an averment that the funds were insufficient; but it was held, that the defendants were permanently liable.

(4) 6 J. B. Moore, 199.

(5) 3 Exch. Rep. 359; s.c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 229.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The judgment obtained in this case seems to smooth the difficulties, if not to entirely remove them. On what ground does this differ from an ordinary judgment, for stationery or other goods sold and delivered?]

Secondly, the appellants say that the proviso is repugnant and void, and for that proposition they rely upon Furnival v. Coombes (6), which was the case of a covenant entered into by A, B. and C, churchwardens, to pay a certain sum by instalments, with a proviso, that nothing in the instrument of covenant should be construed to make it a personal covenant, or should in any way personally affect them in their goods, and the Court held the proviso to be repugnant, from which it is plain that such a proviso cannot be maintained. There is also, thirdly, a representation that the capital stock of 100,000*l.* shall be found, possibly not that it was actually paid up, but that it would be forthcoming. That the appellants are correct when, fourthly, they say they have a right to incorporate the deed of settlement with the policy, is made sufficiently plain by referring to the 25th section of the Joint-Stock Act of 1844, (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), which, in effect, enacts, that the parties conducting the business are to ascertain that there are funds, and if there be, then the contract is, that these funds shall be forthcoming. Neither of the cases relied upon in the Court below, against the appellants, namely, Halket v. the Merchant Traders' Ship Loan and Insurance Association (7) and Hallett v. Dowdall (8), are really detrimental to them. The effect of the former case is, that if the just construction of the contract be that there is no personal liability, there can be no scire facias on the judgment; and as to the latter case, the meaning of Mr. Justice Cresswell and Mr. Justice Williams is favourable to the appellants.

Mr. Daniel, on the same side, insisted on the first ground of argument, and contended that the limited liability clause would have had no effect unless the shareholders could shew that the funds were insufficient. He cited Greenwood's case (9), and remarked on Lord Talbot's case (10).

Mr. Graham Hastings, on the same side, argued that the words in the policy in the present case were equivalent to those used in Gurney v. Rawlins (11), where the contract was, that the capital stock of the company should stand charged and be liable, which was, therefore, a mere charge and no contract; and Mr. Baron Parke said, it was the case of a covenant which was a specialty; and he observed, that the defendants undertook by the instrument which was under seal, that the sum assured should be paid if the funds were adequate. This, said his Lordship, was equivalent to a covenant to pay, "if J. S. goes to Rome." In the present case, if the words of the policy did not amount to a covenant to pay, how could the action be maintainable? and if there was a personal liability, the proviso is repugnant. Besides this, the act of parliament declared that they (the shareholders) shall be liable; and, therefore, assuming that the proviso was not ultra vires, it was of no effect unless clearly expressed, which here it was not. Again, in Reid v. Allan (12), which was a case of a policy in the usual form, with a proviso similar to the one in this case, and an averment that the funds were sufficient, and that the defendant was a shareholder, it was held that there was a good cause of action. That case shews that there may be a personal liability notwithstanding a proviso of this character. To proceed then to the limiting clause in the policy, these companies have no right to exceed those powers which are given by the act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.) under which they are constituted, and those powers are given by clause 66, which enacts, that if companies have not limited liability by act or patent, execution may be enforced, not only against the property and effects of the company, but by execution against the person, property and effects of any individual shareholder of the same; and Greenwood's case decided that a proviso limiting liability has no effect in the deed, even if notice of such proviso be given to the creditor. What, then, is the difference between this and the case now before the Court? Under what authority were the policies of the Athenæum Society issued? No answer can be given, but that they were issued under the Joint-Stock Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.), and the 27th and 28th clauses of the deed of settlement, which say, that nothing shall prejudice the rights of the parties under that statute, namely, the Joint-Stock Act, section 66, which gives this very power. The result upon the whole case seems to be either that there is no difference between the proviso as contained in the deed, with notice, and as contained in the particular instrument which takes effect under the deed, or that there being a repugnance in the deed, it must be construed most favourably for the policy holder.

Mr. W. D. Lewis (with Mr. Rolfe), for the official manager of the Athenæum Society, in support of the order of the Vice Chancellor.—The present appeared, and indeed was the same as an application for leave to issue a scire facias. The contract runs through the judgment—Hassell v.

(12) 4 Exch. Rep. 326; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 39.

the Merchant Traders' Ship Loan and Insurance Association (13); and the judgment strikes out the first of the two provisos in the policy, as against the corporation. As to the liability of the corporate funds, it was worked out by the case of Law v. the Indisputable Life Assurance Society (14), and Robson v. M'Creight (15); and Greenwood's case proves that a man who has paid up the full amount of his shares may be called upon for more. Halket v. the Merchant Traders' Association and Ex parte Durham (16) were then cited by the learned counsel. In this case the policy is the contract of the company, and not that of the individual shareholders (Andrews v. Ellison and Dawson v. Wrench), and as regards the individual shareholders the proviso must both in law and on authority be good—Ernest v. Nicholls (17). The question of what is "capital" and "capital stock" was entered into in the case of The Northumberland Bank (18) and Evans v. Coventry (19). Referring then to the deed of settlement, it appears, by clause 4, that the business is to go on without the whole capital being paid up; and the affidavit of Mr. Hornby, the manager of the Prince of Wales Company, states that he examined the deed, and, according to the cases of Ernest v. Nicholls and The Athenæum Society, ex parte the Eagle Company (20), he was bound, if he relied upon it, to see that the 100,000*l.* was the capital as stated in the deed. The term "capital" means neither paid-up nor subscribed capital, but subscribable capital according to the terms of the deed. Then the appellants say, they are entitled to look at the deed of settlement of the company, and to incorporate it with the policy. The answer to that is, that the deed is not incorporated in the policy, and that if it is,

it does not bear the construction contended for.

Mr. Rolt, on the same side, argued, that the question was as to the true construction of the policy, and the case was the same as that of an equitable mortgage with a proviso that the mortgagor shall not be liable personally for the sum lent: there was no obligation by the shareholders that the sum assured should be forthcoming, though there was such obligation on the part of the company, and the creditors had no right except under the policy. There were three classes of cases applicable to the present: the first, where there was simply a clause in the deed that a shareholder shall not be liable beyond the amount of his shares, and Greenwood's case decided that such a clause cannot protect the shareholder; the second, such as the case of Ernest v. Nicholls, and the present case at law, where there is a provision in the deed that the company shall have such and such powers, with a certain limit on those powers. If that limit is one of substance, the contract goes beyond the powers, and the shareholders shall not be liable.

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—The state of the authorities, such as Ernest v. Nicholls, shews that you are bound to look at the deed and to see whether the provisions of it are complied with.]

Yes; and the case of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand (21) shews, that parties dealing with companies are bound to read the deed and the act. The third class of cases is, where the policy is identical with the clause in the deed of settlement. There the policy is at least as favourable to the respondents as the clause in the deed. The contract here expresses the terms of liability, and those cases do not shew that there had been an issue on the question of the funds being sufficient. It was unnecessary to distinguish Andrews v. Ellison and Dawson v. Wrench, for those who signed the contracts there were liable on them, and against them the action was brought. It is not objected, by the respondents, that the deed should be incorporated in the policy as to the 28th clause.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—You cannot understand the policy without the deed.]

The proviso is expended in the policy, and the construction of the appellants will not be adopted if any other can be arrived at. What is the true construction? What is the conditional liability? The liability to pay the call. The shareholder is only bound to that under the statute (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), and nothing in the contract is to prejudice that. The true construction of the proviso is, that the shareholders shall only be liable for their share of the assets of the company. There has been no averment and there is no pretence for saying that the policy amounts to a representation that the capital is 100,000*l*.

Mr. Daniel, in reply.—The action in this case was brought against the official manager, not against the company. The winding-up order was made in July 1856, which effected a dissolution of the company, and the act of 1848 clearly defines the powers and liabilities of official managers, and among the latter an action by creditors.

True. But the company after the order for winding up is a mere shadow; the contributories are the substantial defendants. Under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78. a creditors' representative thereby authorized to be elected is alone enabled to sue and do certain acts, and that restraint upon the creditors is given for the protection of the shareholders.

[LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—No, it is not for the protection of the shareholders. The official manager represents a substance and not a shadow,—the contributories, not the company. The company referred to in the 58th section of the Winding-up Amendment Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 45), is not the corporation constituted by the Joint-Stock Act of 1844, but the company as consisting of a number of persons. The corporation is gone by the 36th section of the act of 1848.]

The appellants submit that the rights of creditors are not taken away by the act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 78. It is a mere matter of mistake to suppose that the judgment obtained in this case is one against the company. The rights of the creditors against the shareholders are not identical with the liabilities of mere contributories. The question here is, as to the proper construction of the contract and the deed of settlement. The Joint-Stock Act of 1844 negatives the notion of limited liability; and if the assets do not exist, still they must be forthcoming, and for that the shareholders are liable. It is to be remarked, that Mr. Hornby could not have looked at anything but the deed of settlement, and therefore he could not have concluded that it was a fraud to represent that the subscribed capital was 100,000*l*.

Feb. 19. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—By the Athenæum Life Assurance Society, now under the process of winding up, were issued before its stoppage various life policies. To some of these, in which the appellants in the appeal petition now before us were the assured, in the name of their secretary, Mr. Hornby, the petition relates. One of these policies may be taken as a sample of all: what is true of it is true of each. It is in these terms: "Whereas John Hornby, as secretary of, for and on behalf of the Prince of Wales Life and Educational Assurance Company, No. 105, Regent Street, London (hereinafter called the assured), has proposed to effect an assurance with the Athenæum Life Assurance Society in the sum of 2,000*l*., upon and for the whole continuance of the life of Richard Paul Hase Joddrell, of Childwick Hall, St. Albans, Herts, Esq.; And whereas the said assured has paid to the said society the sum of 95*l*. as a premium or consideration for the said assurance for one year, until the 2nd of September 1855: Now this policy witnesseth, that if the said R. P. H. Joddrell shall die before or upon the said 2nd of September 1855, or shall live beyond that day, and the said assured or his assigns, or the holder of this policy, who shall be registered as such in the book hereinafter mentioned of the said society, shall on or before that day, and on or before the 2nd of September in each and every succeeding year, during the continuance of this assurance, pay to the said society the said premium of 95*l*., then the funds and other property of the said society shall, according to the provisions of the settlement of the said society, be subject and liable to pay to the said assured or his assigns, or to the holder of this policy, who shall be so registered as aforesaid, immediately after satisfactory proof of the death of the said R. P. H. Joddrell, the sum of 2,000*l*. of lawful money of Great Britain. Provided always, that the secretary of the said society shall, upon the request of the holder of this policy, and with the consent of the said assured, register such holder in a book to be called "The Register of the Holders of Policies." Provided also, that the payment as above mentioned of the said sum of 2,000*l*. to the holder of this policy who shall be registered as aforesaid, shall be a good and sufficient discharge to the said society from and against any claims or demands upon or in respect of this policy." And it then provides in case certain events shall happen that the assurance shall be void. Then it provides also: "That the capital stock of 100,000*l*. sterling and other the stocks, securities, funds and property of the said society remaining, at the time of any claim or demand made, unapplied and undisposed of, and inapplicable to prior claims and demands in pursuance of the provisions of the said deed of settlement, shall alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands upon the said society or otherwise, under or by virtue of this policy, and that no director, officer or shareholder of the said society, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall, by reason of this policy, be in anywise individually or personally liable or subject to any such claims or demands, or be in anywise charged by reason thereof beyond the amount unpaid of his shares in the said capital stock, nor longer than he shall retain the same shares. Given under the hands of three of the directors, and sealed with the common seal of this society, this 2nd of September in the year of Our Lord 1854." And then there are the three signatures and the common seal of the company. Mr. Joddrell died, I believe, before the stoppage, and the appellants became entitled to the benefit of their assurance. The present question is, in substance, if not in form also, whether those shareholders in the Athenæum Society, upon whose shares is the capital stock mentioned in the policy no amount remains unpaid, are liable personally to pay the amount secured by the policies. Of course what they have paid must be considered as irrevocably gone and lost in the ruin of the scheme that has failed—perhaps it may be said of course failed. The question is as to their personal liability to pay more. I have borrowed the language of the policies, the expressions used in them being “amount unpaid of their shares in the said capital stock.” The terms of the deed of settlement mentioned in the policies do not vary, nor are they inconsistent with the meaning which, without reading the deed, would be ascribed to their language. The fourth clause in particular seems worthy of attention. It runs thus: “That the capital stock of the said society shall in the first instance, and subject to the power of increasing the same hereinafter contained, consist of 100,000*l.* of 100,000 transferable shares of 1*l.* each, to be paid as herein provided. Provided nevertheless, that in case the whole of the said 100,000 shares shall not be subscribed for or disposed of, the shareholders of the society for the time being shall continue associated and bound under and by these presents, and the powers and provisions herein contained shall continue and be in force and be valid in respect of the shares for the time being subscribed for or taken, in like manner as if the number had been the whole number of shares agreed or intended to be issued.” Whether we look at the policies and deed together, or at the policies alone, I think it is very plain that the shareholders who have by actual payments contributed the full amount of their nominal shares of the capital—for instance, a shareholder holding 2,000 shares of 1*l.* each, who has paid his 2,000*l.* to the capital fund—are not subject to any liability, or any further liability, upon the policies. The express provisions of the contract appear to me to exclude such notion. The liability of the assets of the company is a measure beyond our present consideration, and it is not touched by the present dispute; and the same may, I conceive, be stated of the questions, whether those assets are sufficient or insufficient to answer the demands upon them, and whether the company's funds have been wasted, embezzled or misapplied. What I have said is on the assumption that the judgment at law obtained by the appellants against the official manager of the Athenæum Society does not make any difference. I think that it does not. It fixes the fourteen pleas in the action with the character of untruth; and, as between the appellants and the shareholders in the Athenæum Society, precludes the latter, I assume, from asserting any fact or alleged fact asserted by any one of the pleas. It must for every present purpose be taken, therefore, that there are or ought to be funds of the company sufficient to pay the amount due upon the policies, and available for that purpose. By this, however, whatever the waste, embezzlement and misapplication (if any) which have, to whatever extent, taken place,—is, I apprehend, left undisturbed, and left untouched the right of the shareholders who have paid and must lose the whole nominal amount of their shares, to say that not one of them is personally liable for the debt established by the judgment in the action, more than he would have been if the judgment had not been obtained. The order of Vice Chancellor Wood seems to me to have done justice, and to be right.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This is a motion to discharge so much of an order of Wood, V.C. as orders that no call be made, in respect of the sum claimed by the appellants on the judgment against the official manager, upon any of the contributories in the Athenæum Life Assurance Society, who have paid up the full amount of their shares in the capital stock of the said society, nor upon any of the contributories beyond the amount unpaid of their shares. Upon the motion being opened, it was agreed that the whole order should be considered as under appeal, but the substantial question arises upon the part of the order which I have stated. The appellants, the Prince of Wales Life Assurance Company, having insured the life of Richard Paul Hase Joddrell, re-insured his life in the Athenæum Life Assurance Society by policies, by the terms of which it is witnessed, that upon the assured paying the premiums in the usual form, the funds and other property of the society shall, according to the provision of the deed of settlement of this society, be subject and liable to pay to the assured or to the holder of the policy, immediately after satisfactory proof of the death of the assured, the sum which is mentioned in the policy, and there are these provisions in the policy which follow.—[His Lordship here read the proviso which is set forth in the judgment of Lord Justice Knight Bruce.]—The life of the assured Richard Paul Hase Joddrell having dropped, the appellants went in under the winding-up order against the Athenæum Society, and claimed the amount assured by the policy, but the debt was not admitted, and the appellants were left to their action; and they accordingly brought an action against the official manager of the Athenæum Society, in which they alleged that at the time of their claim accruing there were assets of the company sufficient for payment of the claim, and they recovered judgment in that action. It is to this judgment that the order under appeal refers. There being upon the face of these policies an express provision that no shareholder shall be liable beyond the amount unpaid of his shares in the capital stock of the company, the burden of proof that the shareholders are liable beyond that amount of course rests upon the appellants. In order to satisfy this burden, they first relied upon their judgment, contending that the judgment having established that there were assets of the company to answer the claim, and there being a contract that the funds of the company should be subject and liable to pay, the shareholders of the company must be answerable for the breach of that contract. But the contract contained in these policies is either a contract of the directors who signed the policies, or the contract of the company; it is the contract not of the individual shareholders, but of persons who are responsible to them and acting on their behalf; and by the terms of the policies the appellants have agreed that they, the individual shareholders, shall not be liable beyond the specified amount. This argument, therefore, seems to me to be untenable. It is met by the cases which have been decided at law upon that point, and which were cited in the course of the argument. Then it was argued on the part of the appellants, that there is a representation upon the face of these policies, that there was capital stock of the company to the amount of 100,000*l.*, and that there never was in fact any such capital stock, only 49,000*l.* having been subscribed; and it was insisted that the shareholders of the company were liable to make good the representation upon the face of the policies. But I do not see my way to hold that the shareholders can be made liable upon this misrepresentation, in the face of the express contract that they shall not be liable beyond the amount of their shares; unless, indeed, they can be reached on the ground of fraud. I do not think, upon the facts before us, any such case of fraud can be maintained. It was also attempted to support the appellants' case on the ground that the company's deed of settlement was incorporated in the contract, and that by the 28th section of the deed there was unlimited liability on the part of the shareholders. But, in my opinion, this construction of the 28th section of the deed cannot be supported. To put that construction upon the deed would be to construe it as first negating unconditional liability, and then immediately afterwards creating it. It was much argued in reply, that the official manager must be considered to have represented the shareholders in the action in which the judgment was obtained; but this argument, even if it is well founded, does not seem to me to advance the appellants' case; it is still met by special contract against the unlimited liability of the shareholders. In the course of the argument before us some doubts had crossed my mind as to whether the inquiries directed by this order would sufficiently work out the rights of the parties; but, upon further consideration, I am not satisfied that they are insufficient for the purpose; and, as the Vice Chancellor has the power to extend them, if they should be found to require extension, I think it better to leave them as they are. This motion must be refused, and refused with costs.

Insolvent—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 92.—
Title to Surplus Estate—Jurisdiction to determine.

The surplus of an insolvent's estate left in the Insolvent Debtors Court, after payment of all the debts under the insolvency, was claimed adversely by various persons, as assignees by deed from the insolvent, and also by the provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court, representing the creditors under a second insolvency of the same insolvent:—Held, by one of the Vice Chancellors, that this Court, and not the Insolvent Debtors Court, was the proper tribunal for adjudicating upon such conflicting claims; and the same was affirmed by the Lords Justices.

Whether there is a concurrent jurisdiction in the Insolvent Debtors Court, quære.

George William Dyson, having petitioned the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England, an order was made, on the 1st of December 1849, by that Court, vesting Dyson's estate and effects in two assignees. One of these assignees shortly afterwards died, and the Court subsequently removed the survivor, and appointed in his stead Samuel Sturgis, the provisional assignee of the Court, in whom the estate and effects of the insolvent became consequently vested in 1852.

The case was in the court of William John Law, Esq., the Chief Commissioner.

By an indenture, dated the 8th of July 1850, made between G. W. Dyson, the insolvent, of the first part, Robert Cook of the second part, and James Cook (a trustee to bar dower) of the third part, in consideration of 3,000*l.* expressed to be paid by R. Cook to Dyson, Dyson did bargain, sell, convey, release and assign to R. Cook, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, certain interests, limited and absolute, to which Dyson was entitled under the will of his father, in the real estates therein mentioned, but subject to the incumbrances affecting the same, and also all other his estate and effects, subject to the payment of his debts.

By an indenture, dated the 6th of March 1851, George William Dyson, the insolvent, conveyed and assigned all his real and personal estate unto John Renninson and George Henry Taylor, their heirs, executors and administrators, upon the trusts therein mentioned for the benefit of his creditors.

In June 1851 Renninson and Taylor instituted a suit in this court against Robert Cook and George William Dyson, the insolvent, to have the deed of the 8th of July 1850 set aside, on the alleged ground that the consideration for which it was expressed to be made had not in reality been paid, or, at all events, only in part.

That suit was afterwards compromised, upon terms mentioned in articles of agreement, signed by the parties, and dated in October 1851.

George William Dyson, the insolvent, afterwards assigned to one MacLeoman, for valuable consideration, all his resulting interest in the premises comprised in and conveyed by the indenture of the 6th of March 1851, under and by virtue of such indenture and the compromise mentioned in the articles of agreement of October 1851.

G. W. Dyson having incurred fresh debts, he on the 15th of March 1853 again petitioned the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, and, on the following day, a vesting order was made in the matter of the second insolvency, vesting all his estate and effects in Samuel Sturgis, the provisional assignee of the Court.

On the 6th of August 1855, the Chief Commissioner made the following order in the matter of the insolvency:—

“Pursuant to the acts,” &c. “Whereas, it is now ascertained that the fund in court exceeds the amount required to pay all debts and costs, and whereas it is not the ordinary case of an insolvent claiming a vesting order, but there are various claimants of the surplus, those known to the Court being Mr. Cook, Messrs. Taylor and Renninson and the assignee of a subsequent insolvency. Let those parties attend me on Monday, the 13th of August, at 12 o'clock, to exhibit the grounds of their claims. I do not purpose to go into any discussion on that day." "Mr. Cook will exhibit the original instruments and accounts on which he relies, and will produce a specific account in debtor and creditor form, with dates of all transactions between him and G. W. Dyson from the 14th of March 1850 to the 16th of March 1853, verified by affidavit."

There was a large surplus at this time in court, amounting to 4,000*l.* and upwards. Application had been made to Samuel Sturgis by Cook for a particular account thereof, which he had refused to give.

On the 12th of July 1856 the Chief Commissioner made the following order:—"Pursuant to the acts," &c. "After paying the debts under the former insolvency, a considerable sum remains in court. There are three claimants: first, the whole is claimed by Mr. Cook, under a deed made to him; secondly, by Mr. Taylor and Mr. Renninson, under a deed made to them; thirdly, by the assignee for the creditors under the latter insolvency of 1853. All parties interested are at liberty to attend the court in this matter and deliver their claims on Tuesday, the 22nd of July inst., at eleven o'clock."

Accordingly, on the 22nd of July, R. Cook attended the Court, and after shewing that the deed of assignment to him was long anterior to the second insolvency of Dyson, demanded an order vesting the surplus estate in the first insolvency in him, and directing payment of the money into court. This the Commissioner refused, and he also refused to act on the deed of the 8th of July 1850, and insisted upon inquiring into the validity of the said deed and the consideration paid for it, and as to the rights of other persons who made claims subsequent to the said deed. Mr. Cook protested against this being done, and afterwards obtained from the Court of Chancery a writ of prohibition, prohibiting the Insolvent Court from adjudicating on or dealing with the surplus fund in court, except so far as was necessary in order to give effect to the said deed of the 8th of July 1850. Notwithstanding the prohibition, the Commissioner refused to make an order to vest the said fund in Cook, or to make any order at all, at the same time saying that, but for the prohibition, he would have ordered the fund to be vested in the assignee under the subsequent insolvency, and intimating that he was still of opinion that the surplus fund ought to revert in S. Sturgis, as assignee under the second insolvency, for the benefit of the insolvent's creditors thereunder.

In November 1856 R. Cook obtained a rule nisi in the Court of Queen's Bench, calling upon W. J. Law, Esq., the Chief Commissioner of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England, to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to him, commanding him to make an order for payment of the surplus money in the said Insolvent Court standing to the credit of the estate of G. W. Dyson, an insolvent debtor, to R. Cook, his assignee, and also to vest all the property of any kind or description, estate and effects whatsoever of the said G. W. Dyson in the said R. Cook.

This rule was afterwards discharged with costs, on the ground that the Chief Commissioner had full power under the Insolvent Acts to determine the effect to be given to the deed of the 8th of July 1850, and that he was not precluded from so doing by the writ of prohibition—see The Queen v. Law (1).

On the 22nd of May 1857 R. Cook filed his bill in this suit, stating the facts above mentioned, and praying that Samuel Sturgis, as provisional assignee under the first of the above-mentioned insolvencies, might be declared to be a trustee of the surplus estate, standing in the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England to the credit of such first insolvency, for the plaintiff, or for the plaintiff and Renninson and Taylor, according to their shares and interests under the deeds of the 8th of July 1850, the 6th of March 1851 and the articles of compromise of October 1851; and that S. Sturgis might be restrained by injunction from proceeding to the distribution of such estate under the said second insolvency.

S. Sturgis, by his answer, claimed the surplus estate under the first insolvency for the benefit of the creditors under the second insolvency, so far as it had not been effectually disposed of prior to such second insolvency; and submitted that the chief Commissioner had ample jurisdiction given to him by the Insolvent Acts to refuse to act upon the deed of July 1850 in favour of Cook, until payment of the consideration for such deed had been proved; and that under the circumstances, Cook could only be entitled to hold such deed as security for the sum actually paid by him on the footing thereof, with interest.

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. H. C. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, contended that the question of title to the surplus of the insolvent's estate, when it arose between persons not claiming as creditors under the insolvency, and particularly where one of the claimants was the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors itself, claiming in respect of a second insolvency of the party insolvent, could not be properly dealt with by the Insolvent Debtors Court, but fell properly within the jurisdiction of this Court.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Osborne, for the defendant Samuel Sturgis, submitted that, upon the authorities and upon the statutes 1 & 2 Vict. c. 92. and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, the Chief Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court had full power to decide in whose favour a revesting order as to the surplus estate should be made, and in so doing to inquire into the circumstances under which any of the claims were made, and to disregard any deed or instrument which should appear to have been obtained from the insolvent without any adequate consideration—Wearing v. Ellis (2) and Tudway v. Jones (3). Such, they contended, had been also the effect of the decision in The Queen v. Law; and upon the application to the Lord Chancellor for the writ of prohibition; also of that of the Lords Justices of Appeal in a suit of Dyson v. Hornby (4) as to an application by Cook, the present plaintiff, to intercept the payment to Samuel Sturgis of the surplus of certain funds then in court in that suit, over and above what he alleged would be necessary to pay all the debts under the insolvency, and which funds had arisen from the sale of part of the estate and interest of G. W. Dyson under his late father's will.

STUART, V.C. said the plaintiff claimed under a deed which had assigned to him the surplus of the insolvent Dyson's estate under his first insolvency. It was the province of the Insolvent Debtors Court to ascertain a surplus, and it was the duty of the Insolvent Debtors Court to reveal that surplus in the insolvent, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns; and, notwithstanding the unfortunate question of jurisdiction which had arisen, he did not apprehend that it would be disputed in any court that, if an assignment had been executed by an insolvent of the surplus which might accrue to him under his insolvency, the person claiming under the assignment, if the assignment were undisputed and its validity unquestioned, would, under an order of the Insolvent Debtors Court, have the surplus vested in him, as having acquired a right to it under the insolvency. The great question argued in this Court was whether, upon the construction of the act of parliament, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 92, there had been conferred upon the Insolvent Debtors Court as a separate jurisdiction, either the right or the duty of adjudication upon questions arising between adverse claimants, where more than one person claimed a surplus. It was obvious that property of such a kind as a surplus likely to accrue to an insolvent, when all his creditors had been paid under the administration of the Insolvent Court, might be the subject of assignment and disposition by him to various persons, and under varying circumstances, which might raise questions of the utmost difficulty and importance, as to the validity of deeds and transactions in which or by which the insolvent affected to deal with the surplus. It had been contended that the 92nd section of the act of parliament (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.) had conferred upon the Insolvent Debtors Court the right and duty exclusively of deciding upon all such questions. He could not help thinking that if the legislature had had any intention of excluding the proper jurisdiction of the old established Courts for the decision of questions upon property, and had intended to confer upon the Commissioners for administering the law for the relief of insolvent debtors the exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction of deciding difficult and important questions of that kind, the language of the act of parliament would have been much more ample and explicit than it appeared to be. The words of the act of parliament directed, as to a surplus under an insolvency, that the Court should make an order that such property so remaining should be vested in the person whose debts should have been discharged and satisfied, or his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns; and that such order should have the effect of vesting the same accordingly; and that any deed of release to be recorded in the said court, by which any such debt should be released, should not be liable to the stamp duty. Suppose that, before the Insolvent Debtors Court had ascertained that there was a surplus, but after the insolvency, questions such as had occurred in this case had arisen upon deeds executed and transactions which had taken place, by which an insolvent affected to confer rights and interests in the surplus, and that a litigation had taken place in this court or in any court of law with reference to the validity of any such deed, and that this Court had declared that some of such deeds were void, and one alone was good, he had heard nothing to induce him to think that, notwithstanding the length to which the Insolvent Debtors Court seemed inclined to go as to its jurisdiction, the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors would have taken upon itself to try anew the questions decided by a Court of competent jurisdiction; and if, either by way of appeal, or by a claim made before the Insolvent Debtors Court, one of those persons against whom the other Court had adjudicated still preferred his claim before the Insolvent Debtors Court, he (the Vice Chancellor) had no reason to suppose that the Commissioner would not recognize a decree or decision of a Court of proper jurisdiction for the deciding of such cases, as a decree or decision binding upon him. If that were so, what difference could it make with reference to the litigation in questions of that kind, whether the litigation in the other court took place before or after the surplus had been ascertained? There was nothing in this section to exclude the jurisdiction of any other Court, and there was nothing that he could find in the act which contemplated that the Insolvent Debtors Court should exercise any contentious jurisdiction whatever as to the circumstances of such a case; and, therefore, he should infer from the plain construction of the language of the act of parliament, that the legislature never intended that the Insolvent Debtors Court should entertain a contentious jurisdiction upon questions of this kind at all. That really was the only question in this case. There might, however, remain this consideration, if the same property had been claimed before the Chief Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court, by various individuals, and he had entertained claims, and either adjudicated upon them, or endeavoured to adjudicate upon them before a litigation in any other court took place, whether the order of the Insolvent Debtors Court should not have the effect of interfering with that litigation. But that seemed to his Honour the same question with the others, for he could find nothing to shew that the Insolvent Debtors Court had authority, with reference to the right to this surplus, to exercise any contentious jurisdiction whatever. It was said, and with some show of reason, that the Court of Queen's Bench had held otherwise, and the case of The Queen v. Law was cited as one in which that Court had refused a mandamus to compel the Insolvent Debtors Court to make an order for payment of the surplus to Cook; but the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench treated the question, as the question was argued before them, as being a question whether the Commissioners of the Insolvent Debtors Court were persons acting ministerially or had judicial functions. Now, that really seemed to him not to be the question now to be adjudicated upon, because there could be no doubt that the Commissioners of the Insolvent Debtors Court were Judges who had judicial functions to perform. All questions relating to the proof of debts, all questions referring to rights of creditors of the insolvent, as between them and the insolvent, were questions upon which that Court was bound to exercise judicial functions. But he found nothing in the language of any of the learned Judges, the Lord Chief Justice or the others of the Court of Queen's Bench, which sanctioned the notion, that the act of parliament for the regulation of the Insolvent Debtors Court, and which created its jurisdiction, abrogated or took anything away from the jurisdiction of any of the other constituted tribunals, or conferred upon the Judges of the Insolvent Debtors Court any power or authority to adjudicate upon any question of adverse claims to property, except for the purpose of paying the creditors of the insolvent. Looking attentively at the facts, it seemed surprising that the great inconvenience and unseemly nature of the jurisdiction contended for by the defendant Sturgis, as one conferred upon the Insolvent Debtors Court, did not strike more strongly than it seemed to have done those who maintained that argument. In this case, the Judge of the Insolvent Debtors Court, after stating that there was a surplus under the first insolvency, said there were three claimants: first, the plaintiff, Robert Cook; secondly, the defendants Renninson and Taylor; and, thirdly, the Insolvent Debtors Court itself. Why, what a strange thing it would be, that one of the claimants should have a judicial power conferred upon him by parliament, of deciding in his own favour, against the other claimants. It might be said, that it was merely in trust for creditors, that the claim was made, but the Insolvent Debtors Court confessedly had no jurisdiction to authorize its officer, upon any decision of its own, to take possession of any property as against an adverse claim. Suppose the assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court claimed a certain number of acres of land as the insolvent's property, and that that was in the possession of another man who resisted the claim of the assignee, nobody would say that the Insolvent Debtors Court or the Commissioners of that court, could affect to decide upon an adverse title of that kind. It could not do so. But in principle, what the Insolvent Debtors Court was in this case said to have the exclusive power of determining, was exactly the same sort of question; because the assignee under the second insolvency claimed adversely to a person who held a deed, which he said had vested in him a legal right, or an equitable right to that property, which was claimed under the second insolvency. Therefore he could imagine really no sort of claim to a jurisdiction by any tribunal more extraordinary than that which was claimed by the Insolvent Debtors Court in this case. Those were his views of the law, and his views as to the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Debtors Court. He certainly had a very clear impression upon it; but it was impossible for any Judge to have entire confidence in his own opinion upon a question of this kind, especially when the question might be submitted, and ought to be submitted, and he hoped would be submitted to the revision of the Judge of a court of higher authority. But he could not help observing that the plaintiff had conducted his litigation in a very unfortunate and imperfect way. He could not help thinking that if his case had been put forward upon his first application to this Court, when he applied to have the surplus paid to him, and if it had been made to appear to the Court that the question was between his claim and that of the assignee under the second insolvency, if the matter had been brought before the Court in a proper shape (perhaps a petition was not the proper shape), this Court, before it parted with the fund, which, under the order of the Lords Justices, was paid over to the Insolvent Debtors Court, would probably have adjudicated upon that claim, and thereby have prevented an application to the Insolvent Debtors Court, an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, and an application for the writ of prohibition, which had been issued by the Lord Chancellor. However, it was enough for him to find that there was now an order of the Lord Chancellor which had prohibited the Court of Insolvent Debtors from exercising that judicial function, which the counsel for the defendant Sturgis had argued before him it possessed. The Lord Chancellor had prohibited that Court from giving the surplus, or disposing of it in any way, except according to the deed under which the plaintiff claimed. The question of jurisdiction, however, being one upon which he entertained an opinion entirely adverse to the argument maintained by the defendant Sturgis, it remained to be considered how the litigation in this case was to be ended, and what would be the proper decree now to make. The plaintiff, even in this court, had brought forward his case in a most imperfect and crippled state as to evidence. He found from the answer of the defendant Sturgis, which had been very carefully and accurately prepared, that in the Insolvent Debtors Court under that litigation which the Lord Chancellor had stopped, the Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court ascertained that it had not been proved that the whole of the purchase-money which was agreed to be paid, and which ought to have been paid, had been paid by the plaintiff as the price of his purchase of the surplus; it was proved that a considerable sum might still remain unpaid in respect of that purchase. That seemed the result of the proceedings so far as they had gone in the Insolvent Debtors Court. He must, therefore, take it that the case was one in which a purchaser, the plaintiff, had not proved that he had paid the whole price. The view of the Chief Commissioner of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors was, that, in respect of so much of his purchase-money as the plaintiff had paid, he was to be allowed to go in to prove as a creditor under the second insolvency. That really seemed to him a view of the case which was wholly unsustainable, because before it came to that, the purchase must be annulled; and, though the Chief Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court had gone very far in exercising a jurisdiction, yet he, the Vice Chancellor, did not find that he had made any order, or conceived that he could make any order upon the plaintiff to deliver up this deed to be cancelled. If the Chief Commissioner could not make an order for the delivery up of this deed to be cancelled, and if the deed remained uncanceled, it was a deed of assignment in consideration of money, a part of which had been paid. No argument had been addressed to him, nor could he find any grounds in the case which would justify him in saying, that this purchase ought to be set aside. He found that the Lord Chancellor had made an order which might have been reversed. It was said to have been made ex parte. An application might have been made to the Lord Chancellor to discharge that order for a writ of prohibition to prevent payment to anybody but to the present plaintiff, but that order remaining undischarged; he did not see how he could have jurisdiction in the face of the Lord Chancellor's order undischarged, to declare that the plaintiff's deed was one that ought to be set aside, or to be cancelled, or that he ought to convert it into a deed of conveyance, intended to operate as a purchase, but which, under the circumstances, could only have the effect of giving the purchaser or intended purchaser a mere lien upon the property intended to be assigned for the repayment to him of so much as he had paid. Therefore, the case was one in which he was bound to say that the plaintiff, though imperfectly, had proved his right as assignee to this fund; and, upon the whole, it seemed to him that the proper decree to make would be according to the minutes, which he would now read.

Declare, that the right to the surplus of the estate and effects of G. W. Dyson, vested in the defendant S. Sturgis, as the assignee of the effects of the said G. W. Dyson, under an order of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England, dated the 1st of December 1849, which surplus is mentioned or referred to in the order made or notice given by the Chief Commissioner of the said court, dated the 12th of July 1856, was assigned by the said G. W. Dyson to the plaintiff R. Cook, as purchaser thereof, by the indenture of the 8th of July 1850; and that, under such assignment, the plaintiff is entitled to such surplus, subject to the right of the defendant S. Sturgis, in whom the estate and effects of the said G. W. Dyson are vested, as provisional assignee of the said court, under an order of the said court, dated the 16th of March 1853, to have paid to him what, if anything, remains due in respect of 3,000*l.*, the consideration money for the said assignment, and interest thereon. Direct an inquiry to be made whether any, and what part, of the sum of 3,000*l.*, the consideration money mentioned in the said indenture of assignment of the 8th of July 1850, remains unpaid, and the amount, if any, which remains due for principal money in respect of the said sum of 3,000*l.*, together with interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent., from the 8th of July 1850; and it is ordered that the plaintiff Robert Cook do pay to the defendant S. Sturgis, as such provisional assignee of the estate and effects of G. W. Dyson, what, if anything, shall be certified to be due in respect of such consideration money and interest. The plaintiff Robert Cook to be at liberty to make such application as he may be advised to the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, to give effect to the aforesaid declaration, and the amount which shall be received by the plaintiff under any order of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, is to be paid into the Bank of England to the credit of this cause; this decree to be without prejudice to any question as to the claims of the defendants J. Renninson, G. H. Taylor, and J. MacLeoman, under the deed of the 6th of March 1851, and articles of agreement of the 27th of October 1851, and the deed of the 5th of December 1851, with liberty to any of the parties to apply.

No order as to costs.

Jan. 11th, 1859.—From this decree the defendant S. Sturgis appealed.

Mr. Malins, Mr. Rogers and Mr. W. H. G. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, cited The Queen v. Law.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Osborne, for Mr. Sturgis, relied upon the authorities cited in the court below, and the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The subject of contention here is not a matter that is at all brought into collision with the first insolvency. As I understand the facts, all claims and all rights under the first insolvency have been fully satisfied, except the payment of the surplus—for surplus there was—to the insolvent. The dispute before us merely relates to that clear and admitted surplus. His equitable title to that clear and admitted surplus he has dealt with, and the plaintiff claims under that dealing. It seems that, after the transaction between the plaintiff and the insolvent in respect of this surplus had been completed as far as contract went, the insolvent became insolvent again. That, of course, did not take away the right of the plaintiff to have his title adjudicated exactly as if there had been no second insolvency; the assignee under the second insolvency being only substituted for the assignor. Accordingly, he is plainly entitled, in this suit, to have his right declared; and that whether there is or is not a concurrent jurisdiction in the Insolvent Court, as to which I desire to be understood as not saying anything. What the decree meant to do was to declare that right. It is said that the right under the instruments under which this gentleman, the plaintiff, claims, is questionable; but not one party to the cause has on any former occasion, or has now, intimated any intention or wish to institute a suit for the purpose of relief against those instruments, or either of them. It must be taken, therefore, that the plaintiff's title is in equity unexceptionable. That title being proved, it is our duty to declare and act upon it, so far as the nature of the title and the nature of this record allow us to do. That is what the decree intended to declare. There are two or three alterations that may be made consistently with the intention with which that decree was made, to which, I understand, the plaintiff accedes.

With regard to the declaration that the decree should be without prejudice to certain matters (which is at the end of it), I doubt also whether that exactly expresses what the learned Judge meant. I think he could not mean to say that the decree was to be without prejudice to any question between the plaintiff and any of the defendants; because the time had arrived for adjudicating upon that. The meaning of the learned Judge was, to declare that it should be without prejudice to any question of title to the 3,000*l.*, the price contracted to be paid by the plaintiff, if that price should appear not fully to have been paid. It seems to me, therefore—and I believe it is the opinion of the Lord Justice also—that that declaration as to the decree being without prejudice should be altered accordingly, and to that, I understand, the plaintiff has no objection.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—In this case, the question being as to the rights of the parties to the surplus under the first insolvency, this Court must originally have had power to adjudicate on the rights of parties who have dealt with insolvent debtors for the surplus of their estates. I cannot think that the Insolvent Debtors Act has taken away the right to adjudicate upon that. It may have given the Insolvent Debtors Court a concurrent right to adjudicate, and looking at it in the point of view of there being two Courts with concurrent jurisdiction, the question seems to me one of convenience as to which of the two Courts can best administer the property. Looking to the language of this act of parliament, I think there would be very considerable difficulty in working out the equitable rights of these parties under the provisions of the act; and I think, therefore, that it is rather a case for this Court. I think the decree has gone a little too far in declaring the plaintiff to be entitled under the assignment of the 8th of July 1856, in the face of the agreement which the plaintiff has himself stated in the bill, by which he has agreed to take the purchase-money which was to be given under that agreement with 500*l.* more, and a moiety of the surplus, and therefore that part of the decree must be qualified accordingly. I think, also, the reservation on the subject of claim “without prejudice to the claim,” is a question which we cannot properly decide in this suit. We can decide this—that, as between the plaintiff and all the defendants, the plaintiff is entitled to his 3,000*l.* and interest, and his 500*l.*, and a moiety of the ultimate surplus; but as to the other moiety of the ultimate surplus, that may be affected by the trust-deed by which that moiety was assigned for the benefit of the creditors, or it may belong to Mr. MacLeoman under the assignment to him. The right to that is a question arising between co-defendants, and therefore I think that also must be reserved by the decree, and probably it will be found convenient to the parties to make some inquiries about it, if it is desired. I think there cannot be much doubt about it, because, if the agreement between the trustees under the deed of the 6th of March 1851 be established, and those trustees were competent to make that agreement, they would be assignees of the fund, and if they were assignees of the fund one does not see how Mr. MacLeoman would have any claim against them.

WOOD, V.C. }
 Dec. 18; } CATTLEY v. ARNOLD.
 Jan. 15, 28. }

Apportionment — Rent — Parol Demise from Year to Year.

Where a tenancy from year to year has been originally created by the owner of the fee, it is not determined by the death of a tenant for life claiming under the original lessor, and the statute 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 15. does not therefore apply to such a case.

Nor does the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 22. apply to rents reserved by parol.

Therefore, where the owner of the fee demised by parol to tenants from year to year and died, having devised the estates to a tenant for life, with remainder over, upon the death of the tenant for life it was held, that the remainderman was entitled to the whole of the rents accruing for the half-year in which he died, without apportionment.

So, also, where the parol demise originated with the tenant for life.

George Henry Arnold, by his will, dated the 1st of November 1839, devised all his real estates whatsoever and wheresoever, subject to the mortgage incumbrances charged thereon, to his wife Susannah during her widowhood, with remainder to his son Henry Arnold for his life, with remainder to the first and other sons of Henry in tail.

The testator died on the 27th of October 1844 and Susannah Arnold on the 28th of April 1851, whereupon Henry Arnold entered into the possession and receipt of the rents and profits of the devised estates as the next tenant for life under the will.

The suit of Cattley v. Arnold was inst—

tated by incumbrancers on the life estate of Henry Arnold, for the purpose of obtaining the application of the rents and profits of his life estate in discharge of their incumbrances, and by an order made in the suit on the 5th of December 1854 a receiver was appointed.

Henry Arnold died on the 28th of September 1858, leaving a son, who thereupon became tenant in tail in possession under the will of the testator.

A considerable portion of the estates was held by tenants from year to year under common tenancies from year to year, created by the testator in his lifetime by parol. Other portions were held upon tenancies from year to year granted by the testator by agreements in writing; and none of such tenancies had since been determined. The other portions of the estates were let by Susannah Arnold and Henry Arnold successively to various tenants upon common tenancies from year to year by parol, and these tenancies were also still in force.

The receiver had received the half-year's rents accruing due up to the 29th of September 1858, and the question that now arose was, whether these rents belonged wholly to the tenant in tail, or whether an apportionment was to be made in respect of the life estate of Henry Arnold up to his decease. The infant tenant in tail accordingly presented this petition, praying that proper directions might be given according to his rights as the same should be considered by the Court with regard to the application of the half-year's rents.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Rogers, for the petitioner, claimed the entire half-year's rents on the ground that the interest of a tenant from year to year was not determined by the death of the tenant for life. The act 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 15, therefore, did not apply, nor did the Apportionment Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 22, apply to rents payable by tenants from year to year which had not been reserved by an instrument in writing.—

Mr. Daniel, in reply.

Jan. 28.—WOOD, V.C.—The question in this case is new; for after an anxious examination of all the authorities, I have found no case exactly in point, although there is one which comes very near the present. I had a very strong impression that the tenancy being renewed by payment of rent from year to year, a new contract arose year by year, and consequently, that the tenancy was determined by the death of the tenant for life, in which case there would of course be an apportionment. However, it appears from the judgment of Buller, J., in Right v. Darby, that as early as Henry the Eighth's time, it was determined that a tenant from year to year was entitled to half a year's notice to quit, to expire at the end of the year. In Doe d. Rigge v. Bell (1), which was a case of a parol demise for seven years, with an agreement that the tenant should enter at Lady-day and quit at Candlemas, though the lease was void by the Statute of Frauds as to the duration of the term, yet Lord Kenyon held, that the tenant held under the terms of the lease in other respects, as to the rent, the time of the year when the tenant was to quit, &c., and that a person who entered on that demise and paid rent, would be a tenant from year to year, and that view has been adopted since. There is a very early case of Legg v. Strudwick (2), which was a case of a demise to A. habendum de anno in annum, et sic ultra quamdiu ambabus partibus placeret, to commence from Lady-day 1703, rendering an annual rent, payable quarterly. The lessee entered, and died on the 17th of December 1706, and the lord distrained for rent for a year and a half, ending at Christmas; and it was held, first, that after the two years the lessor or lessee might determine; but if the lessee held on, he was not then tenant at will, but for a year certain; for his holding on must be taken to be an agreement to the original contract, and in execution of it; and the first contract was from year to year. Secondly, the third year is not in the nature of a distinct interest, because it arises from the same executory contract, and therefore the lessor may distrain the third year for the rent of the second; and such an executory contract as this is not void by the Statute of Frauds, though it be for more than three years, because there is hereby no term for above two years ever subsisting at the same time, and there can be no grant to a purchaser, for the utmost interest that can be to bind him can be only one year. That case is referred to by Buller, J., in Birch v. Wright, as authorizing the position, that where a tenant from year to year holds on for several years, the demise may be laid as a demise originally for that number of years; it might be laid as a demise for each succeeding year, but it might also be laid as a demise from the original date of the contract. In many cases it has been held, that a person taking a new interest may lay the demise as a new contract—Tomkins v. Lawrance. The effect of the two classes of cases is, that you may either lay the demise as commencing from the time of the original contract, or as commencing with any particular year of the tenancy. The next question is, what is the effect of being able to lay the demise from the date of the original tenancy, in the case of a devise by the original owner to one for life, with remainder in fee to another? Abundant authority has shewn, that all persons claiming under the original lessor are bound by the terms of the original contract, which is not determinable, except by notice expiring at the proper quarter-day, and the tenant for life could not determine the tenancy, except on the same terms as the original lessor through whom he claims must have observed. In Botheroyd v. Woolley (3) the facts were these:—A tenant in fee of premises let to tenants from year to year, died in the middle of a quarter, having devised the premises to his widow for life. She died within the year of tenancy following the death of the testator, and it was held, that the deviser not having given notice to determine the tenancy, it continued after his death, and a new tenancy was not created by the tenant for life; and she having died in the middle of a quarter, her administratrix was not entitled to an apportionment of the rent. The exact point, however, which occurs here did not arise in that case, for the tenancy was continued not by the tenant for life, but by the testator's omission to give notice. The case of Kevill v. Davies was as follows:—A, on his father's death, became tenant in tail in possession, with remainder to his younger brother in tail, and a suit was instituted on behalf of A. and his brother, who was entitled to a portion out of the estate, and a receiver was appointed. Upon the death of A. without issue, his administratrix was held entitled to a proportionate part of the rents. That case does not touch the point here; for the letting was by the receiver on behalf of the tenant in tail alone. On the other hand, in Brown v. Candler (4), which is referred to in the argument of Botheroyd v. Woolley, although a receiver had been appointed, the Lord Chancellor, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, directed the whole rent to be paid to the remainderman. Therefore, the whole case comes back to the view taken by the Courts of law. In Pike v. Eyre (5) a tenant from year to year subdemised from year to year, and in pleading the latter it was described as a tenancy from year to year, and so from year to year, as long as the parties should respectively please, during the continuance of the demise to the party who subdemised, and this was held to be a proper description of the legal effect of the subdemise. Oxley v. James (6) was a more singular case. A tenant from year to year had demised for thirty-four years, and the under-lessees again demised for eighteen years; and it was held, that as the lessees of the term actually continued in possession during the thirty-four years, their interest and that of their under-tenant might be described in pleading either as an estate from year to year, or as an estate for the term of years, and therefore they had a reversion upon the subdemise. The observations of Parke, B. made during the argument are important. He says, "If he has a defeasible reversion, until it be defeated, has he not a good reversion upon the sublease? Legg v. Stradwick and Bac. Abr. 'Leases' (L, 3) shew what is the nature of an estate from year to year; namely, a lease for a year certain, with a growing interest during every year thereafter, springing out of the original contract, and parcel of it. A demise, therefore, by such a person for a term of years is no assignment: he never means to part with the whole benefit of that interest. It is a term for so many years, subject to determination by the cessation of the original interest." The effect of that case is, that you take a new interest every year, and refer it to the original contract. That original contract can only be determined by notice. The tenant for life has an opportunity of breaking off the contract at the end of any year of the tenancy; but until that is done I apprehend it is not competent for the reversioner to determine it. I think the true view of the authorities is taken by Parke, B. in Oxley v. James. I cannot enter into the question of inconvenience. It is probably by an oversight that the statute of Will. 4. does not apply to leases created by parol, but I cannot remedy that. It will therefore be declared, that the petitioner is entitled to the entire half-year's rent due at Michaelmas 1858, from the tenants who held from year to year without written instruments.

Donatio Mortis Causa—Symbolical Delivery—Agent—Infants.

A lady had a dressing-case and a box, both containing jewellery; the dressing case was in her possession at the place where she died, the box was at her residence. On her death - bed she delivered the keys to her servant, with directions to deliver both to the plaintiffs in the event of her dying:—Held, that this did not amount to a donatio mortis causa (1).

Elizabeth Fuidge was possessed of a watch, some trinkets and other jewellery; a part of these were kept in her dressing-case and a part in a box. The dressing-case she had with her at Weston-super-Mare, where she had been staying for her health, and the box was at her residence in Clifton. She always kept both locked, and retained the keys in her possession. She was very ill, and under the idea that she was dying, she, on the 13th of July 1858, a week previous to her death, requested Mary Fisher, her servant, to take the keys of the dressing-case and box, and keep them until after her (Elizabeth Fuidge's) death, when she was immediately to deliver the watch and trinkets in the dressing-case and box to the plaintiffs, Catherine Elizabeth Powell, Mary Ann Powell and Charles Turner Powell, who were infants. The servant accordingly complied with this request; she delivered the keys and also the dressing-case and box, with the watch, trinkets and jewellery to the plaintiff C. E. Powell, and she had since retained the same in her possession. It was, however, questioned whether this gift could take effect as a donatio mortis causa.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Freeling.—The gift is good: the servant was made the common agent both for the donor and the donee.—

Dec. 17. } BURGESS v. HILL.

Injunction—Trade-marks—Costs.

If one trader, by using the trade-marks or labels of another trader, provokes a suit for the interference of the Court, the defendant, though he withdraws the marks or labels, and consents to a perpetual injunction, will still be liable to the costs of the suit, and if he does not pay them, or refuses to pay them, the plaintiff will be justified in setting down the cause and bringing it on for hearing.

The plaintiff instituted this suit to restrain the defendant from using his trade-marks or labels.

The defendant undertook to withdraw the trade-marks or labels, and to submit to a decree for a perpetual injunction, but he refused to pay the costs of the suit. The plaintiff was, therefore, compelled to set the cause down, and it now came on for hearing. The only question, however, was as to the costs.

Sirell v. Abraham, 8 Beav. 598.

Chappell v. Davidson, 2 K. & Jo. 123.

Mr. Cottrell, for the defendant.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This case arises from mistaken advice and erroneous views. The parties might have easily settled this litigation. The plaintiff had a right to a trade-mark or label; it was interfered with by the defendant, to what extent it was impossible for him to tell; he therefore applied to this Court for an injunction to restrain the interference with his rights. I give the defendant credit for his statement when he says that he did not know he was doing wrong. There is, however, a maxim without which no Court could proceed, that ignorantia legis neminem excusat; were it not so, it would be impossible to say that a person was liable to make redress to another with whose rights he had interfered, simply because he was ignorant that he was interfering with another's rights. The Court is bound to instruct parties that they must not interfere with the rights of others. It has been said that it would be useful if, on all occasions, a plaintiff, before he filed his bill, were to apply to the defendant and ask him whether he would accede to his demand. In that I concur, but it is not the rule of the Court, and it could not be acted on, as in many cases before an injunction could be obtained the injury would have been completed. In this case, however, the plaintiff had an undoubted right to ask for an injunction to restrain the use of his trade-mark or label. The defendant properly said, "I have no wish to interfere with your trade-mark or label; I was not aware I was doing a wrong, and I will undertake not to do so in future, and I will take the labels off the bottles, that no more may be sold under them"; there would have been nothing more to do had he gone on to say what the defendant did in Millington v. Fox, "I will make you compensation for any injury you may have sustained"; or if he had said, "I will pay the costs of the suit," for I should not have required him to make an offer so extensive as that made in Millington v. Fox. The language there was, "any injury you may have sustained"; these words would have included not merely the costs of the suit but they would have extended to an injury the plaintiff might have experienced in his trade by the use of the trade-marks. I should have considered the costs sufficient—all that could have been required of him. The defendant, however, sought an interview with the plaintiff's solicitor, who told him that the costs would be 50*l.*, and he afterwards wrote to him, saying, "You must pay the costs of the suit; they will be 50*l.*" The defendant, probably thinking it a large sum (and it seems a large sum) for costs up to that time, wrote, saying, "I will accede to the injunction being made perpetual, but the parties must pay their own costs." The answer to that was, "No; you must pay the costs of the suit"; and the solicitor adds, "you promised to pay them." The letter can only mean, you must pay the costs, they will be about 50*l.* If the defendant had said in answer, "I will pay you what is reasonable for the costs of the suit, but they must be taxed, so that I may not be called upon to pay more than I ought," I should have viewed the matter in a very different light. There was some further correspondence, but as it was written without prejudice I take no notice of it, as it ought not to be read. Considering, then, the course of the Court, how, under such circumstances, could the defendant come here and say, "the plaintiff must pay his costs"? If the plaintiff had given notice of motion, and the defendant had resisted, the simple effect would have been that the Court would have refused the motion, with costs. He had no means of getting the costs, except by proceeding to the hearing of the cause. It is certainly to be regretted, that it should be made necessary for the plaintiff to incur the further expense of hearing the cause, for the purpose of getting the costs to which he was entitled. In Millington v. Fox, where the offer had been to do everything, which, of course, would have included the costs up to the time when he received notice, it was held, that the plaintiff should not have his costs, only on the ground that he went on to do something which he afterwards abandoned. In this case the litigation seems to have proceeded upon some mistake of the rights of the parties, and possibly some little temper. I, however, have power only to administer the law and protect the rights of the parties. If the defendant had offered the plaintiff what he was entitled to, and the plaintiff had proceeded with the suit, I would not have given him a penny more costs after that period; indeed, I should have striven to make him pay the subsequent costs. As, however, the defendant has made no offer, I must make a decree for a perpetual injunction, and the defendant must pay the costs.

Costs, Security for—Limited Companies
—20 & 21 Vict. c. 14. s. 24.

The Court will not require from a limited company security to be given for costs at the instance of a defendant who alleges that the plaintiffs are insolvent, since the solvency or insolvency of the plaintiffs can only be ascertained on the accounts being taken.

This suit was instituted, by the company, against the defendant, their late manager, who now moved under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 14. s. 24. (1) that all further proceedings might be stayed until the plaintiffs gave security for costs. The defendant by his affidavit stated, that the company was incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857, with limited liability; that all the shares, with the exception of one, had been fully paid up by the shareholders; that the one shareholder who had not paid up was a bankrupt; that the company had ceased all business, and had not carried on any mercantile operations for several months; that the whole stock and plant had been sold, and that proceedings had been taken to wind up the company; that the company was insolvent and unable to pay its debts, and that the defendant, if he succeeded in the suit, would, in the absence of security, be unable to obtain any costs, as the assets of the company were insufficient to pay them.

(1) The section is as follows:—"Where a limited company is plaintiff or pursuer in any action, suit or other legal proceeding, any Judge having jurisdiction in the matter may, if it be proved to his satisfaction that there is reason to believe that, if the defendant be successful in his defence, the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs, require sufficient security to be given for such costs, and may stay all proceedings until such security be given."

Mr. Hughes, in support of the motion.

Mr. Cracknall, for the company.—There is nothing in the defendant's affidavit to shew that the company is insolvent, and the Court will not assume it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The act cannot mean to dispense with the judgment of the Court; it requires proof to the satisfaction of the Court that the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay the costs. Before any such conclusion can be arrived at, the cause must be heard and the accounts must be taken. I am compelled, therefore, to refuse the motion; but as the point is new, the costs must be costs in the cause.

Legacy—Annuity, Duration of.

*A testator gave a sum of 4,300*l.* consols to his executors, upon trust as to the annual dividends thereof, amounting to 129*l.*, to pay his brother and two sisters an annuity of 20*l.* each during their lives; the remainder of the said dividends he directed to be paid to his nephew during his life; and as and when the brother and two sisters should die, then the three annuities of 20*l.* were to be paid to A, B. and C, the eldest taking the first of the said annuities that should fall in, and the others in like manner by seniority. And after the decease of the survivor of A, B. and C, then the principal sum of 4,300*l.* was given to Ann Beale:—Held, that the bequests to A, B. and C. were gifts of certain portions of the dividends of the capital sum of money, and not annuities; and that the personal representative of one of the three who had died was entitled to receive his annual sum of 20*l.* until the death of the survivor of the three.*

This case came before the Court, on the 7th of December last, when the Vice Chancellor decided the principal question arising in the suit, but directed the case to stand over for argument upon the construction of the will of the testator in the cause, and directed that certain other parties should be brought before the Court (1).

The testator, Joachim Hibberd, by his will, dated the 8th of December 1819, appointed his brother J. Hibberd and Charles Beale his executors; and he directed, as regarded a particular sum of 4,300*l.* in the 3*l.* per cents., that the said sum should remain there and be transferred into the names of his executors, or the survivor of them, their or his executors or administrators for the uses and purposes following, that is to say, as to the annual dividends or interest then payable thereon amounting to 129*l.* per annum, in trust to pay to his brother James Hibberd, and to his two sisters, Patience Lane and Susannah Bowring, one clear yearly annuity or sum of 20*l.* each during their lives, and the remainder of the said dividends or interest of 129*l.* he directed to be paid to his nephew Robert Samuel Hibberd during his life; and as and when the testator's said brother James and sisters Patience and Susannah should depart this life, then he directed that the three several annuities of 20*l.* each should devolve and be paid to Louisa Hibberd (afterwards the wife of Stephen Webb), the said Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth Hibberd (afterwards the wife of John Riley, and since deceased), the eldest taking the first of the said annuities that should fall, and the others in like manner by seniority; and after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Louisa Hibberd, R. S. Hibberd and Elizabeth, then the testator gave and bequeathed the principal sum of 4,300*l.* in the 3*l.* per cents., and all interest due thereon, if any, to the said Ann Beale, her heirs and assigns, and to be disposed of by will or otherwise as she might think fit. The testator died in 1820, and none of the annuitants mentioned in his will were now living except Louisa Hibberd. The annuitant R. S. Hibberd on his death left Robert Hibberd his personal representative; and the question now raised was, whether the annuity which was given to R. S. Hibberd during his life terminated upon his death, and then fell into the share given to Ann Beale, or whether the said annuity was to continue until the death of Louisa Hibberd, the last surviving annuitant, and to be paid during such time to the personal representative of R. S. Hibberd.

Mr. Goldsmid and Mr. Martindale appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. W. Cooper, for the executors.

Mr. Murray, for the personal representative of Robert Samuel Hibberd.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—It is impossible to avoid saying that the present question is open to a certain degree of doubt. If I am to resort to first principles, irrespective of the authorities, I should say this:—An annuity is a right in some person or persons to receive for life, or some other time, a certain sum of money yearly; that is, an annuity may be given for life, for years, or for any other period; and it may be given to a man and his children. If given to a man and directed to be paid to him out of personal assets, but at the same time given to him "and his heirs," it will go, like real estate, on the death of the person who first takes it, to his heir. So again, an annuity may be given to a man and "the heirs of his body;" though that gift will not create an estate tail in the annuity, it will impart such a character of realty to it as to create an interest in the nature of a base fee in it. It does not create an estate tail in the annuity, because an annuity is not within the Statute de Donis. Although an annuity is a hereditament, it is not a tenement, and so not within that statute. An annuity may be given by almost any form of words to any one, for any period of time, as I have said. It may be given to a man, without mentioning any period of time—it may be simply given to "A." We know that if lands be so given to a man, he has only an estate in them for life; but when an annuity is so given, what, in the absence of any direct authority, is the effect of such a gift? If the annuity is to be considered as of the nature of realty, the want of words of inheritance would, so far as preventing it from descending, restrict the enjoyment to the life of the annuitant. If you regard it as personalty, the simple gift to "A," without more, may confer an absolute interest in it. But then, if we look at the intention of testators, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they mean to confer on the annuitant an estate for his or her life only. And I think, now at least, the decisions are to the effect, that the gift of an annuity "to A," without anything further—without any provision for the payment of the annuity, without any specific fund being appropriated, and without any limit being fixed for the enjoyment of the annuity—such a gift of it would be held a gift for the life only of the annuitant. If you add to that gift a direction that the payment of the annuity shall be provided for by the investment of a sum of money in the 3½ per cent. consols—the very provision which this Court, in the absence of any other, would direct to be made to meet the annuity—I should have thought that the addition of such a direction would not have altered the nature of the annuity—would not have affected the limit of its duration. And why? Because you require an investment of some sort to meet a life annuity, as well as an absolute or perpetual annuity. The only real distinction between the two is this—that in the latter case the annuitant is entitled to the corpus of the invested fund. I think, then, it appears clear, that in the absence of authority upon the point, a mere appropriation of a fund to meet an annuity ought not to alter the nature of the annuity. But if the gift of the annuity is such, on a fair construction of the donor's intention, as to shew that he meant, in truth, to give a certain portion of the dividends of a sum of stock; is such a gift on precisely the same footing as the gift of an annuity,—of an annuity, I mean, simpliciter, as such? Now, I must own that I think that distinction has been the ground of the decisions pronounced by this court; and what I have to consider here is, whether the gift in this instance is the gift of an annuity simpliciter, or of a portion of the dividends of a certain sum of stock, either actually invested or directed to be invested? It does appear to me—looking at the words of this will—that the gift is a gift of the dividends upon a sum of stock. There is a gift of the sum of 4,300*l.*, already invested, to trustees, for the uses and purposes mentioned in the will, that is to say, as to the annual dividends or interest thereon, amounting to 129*l.* per annum, in trust to pay three persons an annuity of 20*l.* each during their lives, and the remainder of the dividends the testator directed to be paid to Robert Samuel Hibberd for life; and as and when the three first-named annuitants should die, then the three several 20*l.* annuities should be paid to three persons, Louisa Hibberd, Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth Hibberd, the eldest taking the first of the annuities that should fall in, and the others in like manner by seniority; and after the survivor of these three persons, the testator gave the principal sum of 4,300*l.* to Ann Beale. This seems to me to be a totally different gift from that of an annuity quæ annuity, simpliciter; and by so regarding it, the language of the will directing the devolution of the respective sums is rendered quite accurate. There is a gift of a portion of the dividends of this fund, on the dropping in of certain lives, to three other persons, in sums of 20*l.* each; but a gift of those sums for how long? that is the question. What are the restrictive words? Are there any? We find that there are; for there is a gift over of the principal fund to Ann Beale. When? Why, after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Louisa Hibberd, Robert Samuel Hibberd and Elizabeth Hibberd. Without the gift over, Ann Beale could not, under this part of the will, take any interest in the 4,300*l.* stock; and she only takes an interest in it—in so much of it as is appropriated to these three annuities, so to say—on the decease of the survivor of the annuitants I have just now mentioned. I may ask, with reference to observations made as to the general principles of the construction of wills by which the Court arrives at the intention of a testator—where a man in one part of his will, in giving an annuity, clearly and distinctly expresses his meaning by particular words, and then in another part of the will he gives another annuity, but omits the one particular word before used—why should you infer that he means the same thing in both instances? Here the testator has elsewhere in his will clearly and distinctly given a life annuity—in plain terms he has so given one, and in terms differing from the gift of the annuities in this instance. I call them annuities, but in strictness, upon principle, and on the authorities, the gift of these sums of 20*l.* is a gift of part of the dividends of a sum of stock, and is not within that series of cases which deals with gifts of annuities to a class of persons, or one of a class. I am of opinion that the gift of the annuity to Robert Samuel Hibberd was a gift of it to him until the death of the survivor of Louisa Webb, himself and Elizabeth Riley. The consequence of my opinion is, that the death of one of this set of annuitants would not prevent his representative from taking it under this bequest. That, possibly, is a contingency which the testator did not foresee, but which, had he been told it, he might have anticipated. That, of course, I cannot say; but, at all events, the representative of Robert Samuel Hibberd is entitled; and Ann Beale, or her representative, takes nothing of the fund appropriated to meet these three annuities until the death of Louisa Webb.

Feb. 14. } LORD v. COLVIN.

Domicil.

A. B., a Scotchman by birth, and having property in Scotland, went to India, and remained there for many years. On his return, he resided for five years on his property in Scotland, expending money upon such property, and considerably improving it. He then left Scotland, in consequence of certain unpleasant domestic events, and went to Paris, where he resided for five years, purchasing expensive furniture and keeping up an establishment there. During this time he still retained domestics at his house in Scotland, and constantly gave directions by letter as to the superintendence of his property, and particularly as to the management of his horses and other animals there. His furniture was left in Scotland, but ready packed up for immediate removal. He died in France :—Held, that his domicil was Scotch, and not French ; the Court acting upon the principle that slighter evidence is required to warrant the conclusion that a man intends to abandon an acquired domicil and to resume his domicil of origin, than that he means to abandon his domicil of origin and to acquire a foreign domicil.

This was one of several suits, instituted respecting the property of the testator in the cause, Dr. Peter Cochrane. The present plaintiff represented the widow of the eldest son of the testator, and the defendants were the representatives of the executors under the will. There were two important questions for decision : one was, as to the validity of the marriage of Dr. Cochrane to a native Indian lady, and the other, a question of domicil ; and upon these questions would depend the distribution of the testator's estate. Dr. Peter Cochrane, the testator, was born in 1754, at Kilbarchan, in Scotland, where his family had an estate, called "Clippens," and which estate subsequently came into the possession of Dr. Cochrane by purchase. Dr. Cochrane entered the medical department of the East India Company's service, in the year 1780, and from that time he was resident in India. It was alleged, that in 1790, he was married to a native Indian lady, called Raheim Beebee, at Ferucka-bad, according to the rites of the Moham-medan faith, by a priest of that religion. On the 17th of December 1807, a daughter was born at Cawnpore, of that alleged marriage, namely, Susan. In November 1808, Dr. Cochrane was married at Cawnpore, to Margaret Douglas Fearon, an English lady, his first alleged wife being still alive, and continuing to live with him as his housekeeper. On the 18th of December 1811, there was a son born of the last marriage with Miss Fearon, called "Peter," and another son, named "John," was born in 1813 of the same marriage.

In December 1818, Dr. Cochrane made a will in India, in the English form, and in January 1819 he left India and came back to Europe. On his return he stayed some time in London and in Edinburgh, and went in the autumn of 1820 to reside at Clippens, where he had had a new house built for him according to instructions sent home from India. He continued to live at Clippens, where he greatly improved the property by building, &c., until the month of May 1825, when he left Scotland, and after visiting Berne, in Switzerland, for a short period, he took up his residence in Paris. It was said, that his departure from Clippens was caused by certain rumours being spread respecting an undue intimacy between Mrs. Cochrane and a groom named Daniel Pearson, and also on account of some quarrel about the rates and taxes of the parish. On the 25th of August 1821, while resident at Clippens, the testator made a second will, which was nearly in the same terms as the will he had executed in India. When he left Clippens, he placed two or three servants in charge of his house and property. In August 1825, the testator's daughter Susan, by Raheim Beebee, who had been brought over to England for education, was sent out to India, where in 1826 she married Capt. Henry Moorhouse, and her father settled 2,000*l.* per annum upon her. When Dr. Cochrane first went to Paris, he resided for six months at a house No. 11, Boulevard des Capucines, where he had furnished apartments. He afterwards purchased the furniture of the tenant, and bought additional costly furniture. In January 1830, he removed from the Boulevard des Capucines, to No. 6, Place Vendôme, where he took the first floor, unfurnished, upon a lease, determinable at any time by giving three months' notice. His two sons during this time were placed with different tutors in France. Dr. Cochrane, while residing in Paris, had been in the habit repeatedly of writing to his gardener, John Crow, and to his other servants at Clippens, giving the most minute directions as to the way in which he desired everything to be carried on at that place. He had brought once from India several fine Arab horses, and these were all left at Clippens, in the charge of his men. He had also dogs, pigeons and other animals, in which he took considerable interest, and frequently made the most minute inquiries concerning them. In 1829, Dr. Cochrane came over to England, and went to stay in Scotland, at a place near his house "Clippens," which place he repeatedly visited, but he did not sleep in the house. While in Scotland, in 1829, Dr. Cochrane made a deed of settlement or trust disposition, in the Scotch form, which was executed by him in London, on the 13th of October.

By this instrument he conveyed, transferred, devised, &c., to his wife Margaret Douglas Fearon, or Cochrane, David Colvin, James Colvin, and to the senior partner for the time being of the firm of Colvin & Co., of Calcutta, as trustees, his whole means and effects, heritable and movable, of whatever kind or description, and wherever situate, upon trust, after paying debts and funeral expenses, &c., to make an inventory of his furniture and household effects, and deliver the same for a life-rent for his wife for her life, and after her decease to divide the same equally between Peter Cochrane and John Cochrane, his two lawful sons. There was then a gift of all his real property to his wife for life, and afterwards to his son Peter, absolutely, charged with certain annuities, with a gift to Raheim Beebee of 100 sicca rupees monthly and the use of the house in Calcutta. There was an ultimate gift of the remainder of his whole personal property to his sons and their children, the same to be payable to his sons at the age of twenty-five, and in case of their dying without issue, then to the children of Mrs. Susan Cochrane, in manner therein mentioned.

In the year 1831, Peter Cochrane, the son of the testator, married Eleanor Fuller, then a lady's maid in the service of his aunt, Mrs. Baker, clandestinely, which it was alleged had greatly displeased his father. The trust disposition executed by the testator was established as a will in a suit of Cochrane v. Cochrane, by a decree of the Master of the Rolls, dated the 6th of June 1834. Under that decree the accounts were directed to be taken on the assumption that the domicile of the testator was English, but doubts had since been raised, and the present suit was instituted, for the purpose of having that and other questions determined. The testator died on the 8th of June 1831. The testator's widow died intestate, on the 19th of September 1834, and administration to her estate was granted to Peter Cochrane, the son. On the 25th of April 1835, John Cochrane died intestate and unmarried; and on the 24th of July in the same year Peter Cochrane also died intestate and without issue, and administration was granted to his widow, Eleanor Cochrane, who then became administratrix to the widow of Dr. Cochrane and his two sons, Peter and John Cochrane.

On the 11th of June 1836, Eleanor Cochrane married her second husband, Charles Barton, who died on the 23rd of February 1840, and on the 14th of June 1842, she married the plaintiff, James Lord. It appeared that the Indian lady Raheim Beebee died in the year 1849.

Upon the two questions as to the validity of the first alleged marriage of Dr. Cochrane with the Indian lady, and as to the domicile of Dr. Cochrane, a considerable amount of evidence had been collected. Upon the first question, however, this being one purely of fact, a full report will not be necessary. The evidence in support of the question of domicile is more particularly set forth in the judgment of the Court. Upon the decision of the two questions, various other matters would have to be argued, which would affect the ultimate disposition of the property left by Dr. Cochrane, which amounted upwards of 217,000*l.*

Whicker v. Hume, 31 Law Times, 319.

The arguments in the case took place on several different occasions, and his Honour finally gave judgment on the 14th of February.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This suit has been instituted for the purpose of determining the rights of the parties claiming to be entitled to, or interested in the personal estate of Peter Cochrane, commonly called Doctor Peter Cochrane. The personal estate, it seems, amounted to about 217,000*l.*, notwithstanding the drain which has been made upon it for costs. Several peculiar and difficult questions have arisen, but two of those questions lie on the threshold, and upon the determination of them will depend what the subsequent questions for discussion and decision may be, and it has therefore been arranged that those two questions alone are now to be decided.

The first question is one of fact, that is, whether the testator was or was not legally married to a native Indian woman called Raheim Beebee ; and the other question is one of mixed law and fact, that is, what was the domicile of the testator at the time of his death, whether it was Scotch or French ?

His Honour then stated at great length the evidence, which was very voluminous, as to the first question, and came to the decision that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the marriage of Dr. Cochrane with Raheim Beebee, and that consequently Mrs. Moorhouse, the only daughter of the testator by that lady, must be considered as illegitimate. His Honour considered that it was quite improbable that any further evidence could be collected in support of the marriage, and it was therefore useless to direct any further inquiry into the circumstances regarding that marriage.

The Vice Chancellor, in giving his decision upon the second point, as to domicile, said :—In the spring of the year 1819, Dr. Cochrane, with his family, arrived in England on his return from India, having amassed a large fortune in that country. His family consisted of himself, his wife and two sons : Peter, the eldest, born the 18th of December 1811, and John, the youngest, born the 12th of September 1813. His domicile of origin was Scotch. He was the proprietor of a small estate in Renfrewshire, in Scotland, called Clippens, consisting of about sixty Scotch acres, namely, twenty acres of ploughable land, and forty of wood and undrained moss, with an old house, of small size. This estate had been the property of his ancestors for about 200 years, and was his own birthplace. He had bought it about the year 1789, when in India, from the trustees for his father's creditors, and had, before his return from India, caused a new house to be built upon it, larger than the old one, but still of moderate dimensions. The old house was left standing. At the time of his return from India, Clippens was occupied by his sister, Mrs. M'Farlane, then a widow, who died in 1820. In June 1820 Dr. Cochrane took up his abode at Clippens, where he continued to reside until May 1825, with occasional absences at Edinburgh. From very nearly the commencement of this period until the end of it, the boys Peter and John had a tutor residing in the family, the Rev. John Birkmyr, afterwards Doctor of Divinity and Minister of the Dean Church, Edinburgh. In each of the five years of the period above mentioned the family made a visit to Edinburgh, and on one or two of those occasions remained there some months. But those occasional absences did not prevent Clippens from being their home; and there can be no doubt that, from the time Dr. Cochrane arrived in Scotland from India, up to May 1825, the domicile of Dr. Cochrane was Scotch, which was his domicile of origin, and which, assuming it to have been previously changed to an Anglo-Indian domicile, by reason of his long residence in India in the Company's service, reverted upon his taking up his abode at Clippens in June 1820. In May 1825 Dr. Cochrane with his family left Clippens, and proceeded to the Continent. From that time neither he nor any of his family ever, during the remainder of his life, returned to reside at Clippens, nor even to sleep there for a single night, nor did they during that period ever return to Scotland, except for a short visit in the year 1829. The question is, whether in or subsequently to the month of May 1825 Dr. Cochrane abandoned his Scotch domicile, and acquired a domicile in France, in which country he resided for the five years preceding his death. He left Clippens on the 18th of May 1825, on his way to Switzerland, and arrived at Berne, in Switzerland, on the 30th of September following, having in the interval stayed about three months in London, and about three weeks in Paris. His object in going to Berne, was to place his two boys at the school of the celebrated M. Fellenberg, at Hofwyl, in the vicinity of Berne. Accordingly, immediately after their arrival at Berne, the boys were placed at M. Fellenberg's, the Doctor and Mrs. Cochrane remaining at Berne, except perhaps for some short excursions. Scarcely six months, however, had elapsed ere Dr. Cochrane, having found, as he says in a letter to Crow of the 4th of July 1826, very substantial reasons for disapproving both of the personal conduct and the system of education of M. Fellenberg, resolved to remove the boys altogether from his institution, which he accordingly did on the 2nd of April 1826, and on the 6th of May following, Dr. Cochrane with his family quitted Berne for Paris, where they arrived on the 17th of May 1826, and from that day until the day of Dr. Cochrane's death, which happened on the 8th of June 1831, a period rather exceeding five years, they continued to reside at Paris, with only such occasional absences as I shall mention. In each of the five years of the residence at Paris, Dr. Cochrane and his family made an excursion to some bathing-place on the French coast, Dieppe or Boulogne, returning on each occasion to their abode at Paris. Early in July 1829 Dr. Cochrane and his wife and two sons left Paris for Scotland, by way of Boulogne. They arrived in London on the 21st of July, and remained in London a month. On the 21st of August they left for Glasgow. At that time it must have taken them some days, probably a week at least, to get to Glasgow, as they travelled by posting; so that I think they could not have arrived at Glasgow till towards the end of August. They stayed at Glasgow at an hotel three or four weeks, during which time Dr. Cochrane, and no doubt Mrs. Cochrane and the boys, or some of them, went over two or three times a week to Clippens, but none of them stayed a single night there. About the 20th of September Dr. Cochrane and the family left Glasgow, on their way back to Paris; they stayed some weeks at Edinburgh, and arrived in Paris on the 6th of November.

In April 1830 Mr. and Mrs. Moorhouse came to Paris, on a visit to Dr. and Mrs. Cochrane, and stayed with them until near the end of July, a period of about three months, when they returned to England. On the 2nd of November 1830 Peter, the eldest son, being then under the age of nineteen, married clandestinely Eleanor Fuller, who was lady's maid to his aunt, Mrs. Baker. On the 8th of June 1831 Dr. Cochrane and his wife and two sons left Paris for Boulogne, being in a declining state of health; he was accompanied by a medical man named Young. On the first evening they arrived at Beauvais, and that same night Dr. Cochrane died. I have said that on that occasion he was on his way to Boulogne. Whether he intended to stop there, or to cross over to England, is a subject of some difference in the evidence; but it appears to me not very important with respect to the question of domicil. There is not the smallest doubt whatever that Dr. Cochrane was intending to return to Paris on that occasion. His establishment remained just as it was; except as to what he took with him, everything remained, which seemed to shew that he was going away intending to come back. No doubt, there is contradictory evidence on that subject; but that is the conclusion I unhesitatingly arrive at. An impression prevailed with some that he was coming over for the purpose of altering his will to the prejudice of his eldest son Peter, with whom he was, of course, much displeased on account of his marriage; and that was certainly Peter's own belief, but I do not think it very important. These are the events, so far as they may be considered material, which occurred between the 18th of May 1825, when Dr. Cochrane and his family left Clippens, and the 8th of June 1831, the day of his death. The question then is, whether Dr. Cochrane had lost his Scotch and acquired a French domicil. It is not my intention to enter upon an elaborate discussion of the various definitions which have been given, or attempted to be given, of the term "domicil"; at the same time it is impossible to avoid some reference to them. I concur in the observation of Lord Cranworth, in Whicker v. Hume, that many of them are rather illustrations than definitions. Some of them also appear to me objectionable, because they are expressed in language more or less figurative, which ought never to be the case with what professes to be a definition. Some of the Roman definitions are utterly inapplicable to the present condition and habits of mankind. The Roman definition most frequently cited (that is, the definition from the Roman law), is this, Cod. Lib. 10, tit. 39, b. 7:—"In eodem loco singulos habere domicilium non ambigitur, ubi quis larem rerumque ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit, unde rursus non sit discessurus si nihil avocet; unde cum profectus est peregrinari videtur; quod si rediit, peregrinari jam destitit." I confess it has always appeared to me that this sentence is more to be admired for the neatness of its latinity than for its merits as a legal definition. It seems to me to be open to the objection of being (at least in the first branch of the sentence) expressed in figurative language. Moreover, it depends upon the manner in which it is translated whether it accords with the decisions of our Courts; and I know no Latin sentence more difficult to translate. Almost every important word in the sentence presents some difficulty. The word "larem," which even to a Roman was to a certain extent a figurative expression, may perhaps be properly translated "household," meaning by that term the united body, consisting of a man and his wife, and children and domestics, dwelling together in one abode. "Larem," as I understand it, does not signify the place of abode. The words of the definition are, "In eodem loco," in that place "ubi quis larem constituit," that is, a man has his domicil in that place where he has established his "larem"; and whether the word be "larem" or "lares," it must mean, as I understand it, not the place of residence, but the body which resides there; or perhaps, more correctly, the act of co-residence as members of the same family. That is my understanding of the word "larem;" but I should suggest the meaning of the word "household" to be where a man has established his residence. It is not easy to suggest a translation of the words which follow, "rerum ac fortunarum summam," which shall be faithful to the original and at the same time convey to the mind a precise and definite idea. The word "res" probably here signifies "business"; "fortunæ," no doubt, means "possessions" or "property"; but what does "summam" mean? The proper meaning of the word is "the sum or aggregate," but it is perhaps here used to signify "the chief or principal part," in which sense I think it is sometimes used. Chief Justice Story evidently felt the difficulty of rendering this branch of the sentence into English, and in order to give something intelligible, he has sacrificed accuracy of translation — he has rendered it thus: "There is no doubt that every person has his domicile in that place which he makes his family residence and principal place of his business." This is obviously rather a paraphrase than a translation. I am not meaning to say an inaccurate paraphrase, but not a strict translation. Again, the term "peregrinari," in the last branch of the sentence, requires a particular translation to make the definition agree with the decisions of our Courts. The word properly means, "to be in a foreign country;" but if it be so translated, it would not agree with the proposition, now well established, that a man may establish a domicile in a foreign country, and in which he still continues to be a foreigner. The word "peregrinari" must, therefore, be translated "to be a wanderer," viz. from home, and so Chief Justice Story translates it. Therefore, if this celebrated passage from the Roman law is to be used as a definition by which our Courts of justice are to be guided, I think it must be translated in some such form as this: "There is no doubt that every person has his domicile in that place where he has established his household, or," if you please, "his family residence, and the chief part or bulk of his business and of his property; from which he is not intending to depart, if nothing calls him away; from which when he goes away he seems to be wandering from home; and from which when he has returned to it he has ceased to be wandering." Thus translated, or in some such way as that, the sentence may not, perhaps, be objected to on the score of inaccuracy, though it is still open to the observation that a man may have his family residence, his "larem," whatever it means, in one country, and the chief part or bulk of his property—"rerum"—and even the chief part or bulk of his business, "fortunarum suarum" in another. Voet's definition seems to me as little open to objection on the score of inaccuracy as any (1):—"Proprie dictum domicilium est quod quis sibi constituit animo, inde non discedendi si non aliud advocet aliud insuper." Vattel, b. 1. c. 19. s. 22, defines "domicil" to be a fixed residence in any place, with an intention of always staying there. Upon which Chief Justice Story justly remarks, "This is not an accurate statement; it would be more correct to say that that place is properly the domicile of a person in which his habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom." I would observe, however, that this emendation of Chief Justice Story, though a decided improvement upon Vattel, would not, perhaps, quite agree with the decisions of the English Courts, with respect to Scotchmen going to India in the service of the East India Company. They have always been held by a well-established rule to acquire an Anglo-Indian domicile, and if they die while they have that domicile, their effects will be administered according to the Anglo-Indian law, that is, English law; and yet ninety-nine out of every hundred servants of the Company, when they go out to India, and while they remain there, entertain, and are continually declaring a settled and abiding purpose and intention to return home as soon as they can accumulate a sufficient fortune. I would venture to suggest that the definition of an acquired domicile might stand thus: "That place is properly the domicile of a person, in which he has voluntarily fixed the habitation of himself and his family, not for a mere special and temporary purpose, but with a present intention of making it his permanent home, unless and until something (which is unexpected, or uncertain) shall occur to induce him to adopt some other permanent home." I am disposed to think that the definition thus modified will be found to be in accordance with most, if not all, of the leading decisions on the subject of acquired domicile. But whatever may be the most correct and proper terms in which to frame a definition of domicile, this, at least, is clear and beyond controversy, that to constitute an acquired domicile, two things are required—act and intention—"factum et animus." To use the language of the eminent American jurist, to whose admirable writings I have before referred, "Two things must concur to constitute domicile" (of course he is speaking of acquired domicile): "first, residence; and, secondly, the intention of making it the home of the party." There must be the fact and the intent; for, as Pothier has truly observed, a person cannot establish a domicile in a place except it be animo et facto. Now, in the case of Dr. Cochrane, with respect to the factum there is no doubt whatever. It is certain that for full five years next preceding his death he resided in France. During the whole of that time he dwelt with his wife and family at Paris, never quitting it, except occasionally for special temporary purposes, on each of which occasions he quitted it with the intention of speedily returning to it, which intention was always fulfilled except on the last occasion, when death overtook him at the end of the first day's journey from his dwelling. So far as relates to the factum of residence, there was, undoubtedly, such a residence in France as would be amply sufficient for the constitution of a French domicile. It remains then to consider what was the animus, the intent, of Dr. Cochrane, with respect to this residence in France? And this must be ascertained by a minute examination of the circumstances, the condition and the conduct of Dr. Cochrane, and the expressions used by him, both in writing and verbally. Now it strikes me in the outset that there are some particulars to be noticed in the circumstances and condition of Dr. Cochrane, the tendency of which is strong towards the opinion that he was not likely to intend to establish a permanent abode in a foreign country. He and all his ancestors were Scotch; for some 200 years, the family had been settled at Clippens, which, though but a small estate, made the owner a landed proprietor or laird. He was himself born at Clippens, in the old house, which he did not cause to be pulled down when he built a new one, and which, with reference to old associations, he constantly refused to pull down when urged by his friends to do so, as it was a "desight" to the premises. He had not, indeed, actually inherited the property, for while in India he had bought it from the trustees for his father's creditors, and indeed his letters written at the time seem to me to indicate that he made the purchase with some reluctance; but I think that the evidence tends decidedly to shew that at least after he came to reside at Clippens he felt a great interest in the place, and even a strong attachment to it. He had returned from India with a large fortune, and had laid out money in improving the premises. As he was by no means without family pride, so also he (as well as his wife) was not altogether free from love of ostentation and display, although he was not so much influenced by these tendencies as to prevent his being a man of strong good sense. His great passion was a love for horses. He had brought over some Arab horses from India, from which he bred, and it seems to me from his letters, and, indeed, from other parts of the evidence, that nothing occupied so much of his time and attention as the increase and improvement of his stud. In connexion with this pursuit he had, in or about 1821, built at considerable expense a spacious riding-school at Clippens, as well as new stables. His love of animals was not confined to horses; his poultry-yard seems to have been an object of his attention, and was numerous stocked with native and foreign breeds. He had a great regard for the pigeons in his dovecote, waging a fierce war with their destroyers, the owls; and even the rooks that frequented the premises found in him a protector against the fowling-pieces of the neighbours. All these tastes and tendencies might obviously be more easily and freely indulged and enjoyed by continuing to reside at Clippens, than by going to reside at any place on the Continent. In short, from these considerations it appears to me that, prima facie at least, it would be justly considered very improbable that Dr. Cochrane should at any time entertain an intention of establishing his permanent abode in France, or, indeed, at any other place than Clippens. If he at any time formed such an intention, it must have been under the operation and influence of some motive or motives of no trifling cogency. Let me now inquire, what were the motives which induced Dr. Cochrane to go away from Clippens in May 1825? Three motives have been assigned for Dr. Cochrane's leaving Clippens: first, a desire to educate his two sons at Hofwyl, in Switzerland; secondly, his displeasure with his neighbours at being, as he thought, unjustly assessed for parochial charges; and, thirdly, the finding that his neighbours avoided the society of his family by reasons of rumours as to Mrs. Cochrane's conduct.

The Vice Chancellor then went through the evidence in support of each of these alleged motives ; concluding with observations to the following effect :—that, although the first motive might have operated most strongly to induce Dr. Cochrane to leave Clippens, though only for a temporary purpose, the third, no doubt, influenced him, not only in leaving Clippens, but also in staying away when the temporary purpose was satisfied. It might be that Dr. Cochrane contemplated an absence from Clippens for some time, but the evidence also tended to the conclusion that he meant ultimately to return to it. He left Clippens for Berne in May 1825. Being dissatisfied with the system of education at Berne, he left that place and with his family arrived at Paris on the 17th of May 1826 ; the desire still to educate his sons abroad appearing to have influenced him in residing in that capital. His Honour then continued as follows.—

The first fact deserving notice is, that from a very early period after the arrival at Paris Dr. Cochrane adopted, and continued until his death, a plan, mode and style, with respect to his abode and his establishment, altogether unusual with persons intending only a temporary sojourn at Paris, and usual only with those who design a permanent or at least a prolonged residence there. Instead of occupying apartments in an hotel or taking furnished lodgings, we find that within two months after his arrival at Paris he rented an unfurnished apartment (suite of rooms) at No. 11, Boulevard des Capucines, which he furnished ; and these he continued to occupy until the beginning of 1830, when he removed to a more spacious and commodious apartment (suite of rooms) at 6, Place Vendôme, which he took unfurnished, and which he furnished, and which continued to be the residence of himself and his family until his death—so that he occupied the first apartment for about three and a half years, and the second for about one and a half. It does not appear for what precise term he agreed to take the first apartment, but the tenancy was determinable at three months' notice, and the rent was

2,400 francs or 2,500 francs a year—about 100*l.* a year, payable quarterly. The apartment in the Place Vendôme was taken by Dr. Cochrane under a lease from a lady named the Comtesse le Clerc (who herself held as lessee from the owner), for one, two or three years, determinable at their respective choice, at three months' notice, the apartment in question being described as the first floor of No. 6, Place Vendôme, with the stables and appurtenances, at the yearly rent of 7,000 francs, that is, about 280*l.*, from January 1830. In both cases the tenant paid the direct taxes. Having regard to the habits prevailing in France, the mode of taking and furnishing these two sets of apartments was equivalent to taking a lease of an unfurnished house in London and furnishing it. According to the description given by M. Proudhomme, the owner of the house No. 6, Place Vendôme, the apartment rented by Dr. Cochrane in that house consisted of ten rooms, besides the servants' room, kitchen and offices. On taking this apartment, Dr. Cochrane, at his own expense, constructed a chimney in the back dining-room in the place of a stove which before existed there, and also a small oven in the kitchen. The furniture which Dr. Cochrane purchased for these two residences is variously described by the witnesses by the terms "commodious," "handsome," "splendid," "magnificent," and one of the witnesses, in the fervour of her admiration, declares that it was equal to that in the King's palace. I think I may justly assume it to have been at least commodious and handsome, and considering Dr. Cochrane's wealth, and the proved tendency to ostentation, at least of Mrs. Cochrane, it is not probable that it was otherwise than handsome and expensive. Mr. Francis Langan, who is the brother of the Abbé Langan, a tutor who lived in the family of Dr. Cochrane, says, the furniture in the Place Vendôme was excellent furniture, and that Dr. Cochrane had great pride in it. Dr. O'Grady says the rooms were magnificently furnished. George Vacher, the son of the upholsterer who supplied a portion at least of the furniture at both Dr. Cochrane's residences in Paris (he, the son, having himself accompanied the furniture on its delivery on the premises), says that it was splendid furniture. One item of ornamental furniture is mentioned by M. Sourain, the watchmaker, who says, that among several clocks purchased by Dr. Cochrane was one for his saloon, the price of which was 1,400 francs (56*l.*), rather an expensive article of furniture. The establishment of servants, horses, carriages and other matters, both of convenience and of luxury, were in keeping with the position of a family thus located. The number of servants may have occasionally varied in some slight degree, but in general it seems by the evidence to have consisted of four or five men and three or four women. Latterly all the servants (or at least all but one) were French. The number of horses seems to have been never less than five or six (including four carriage horses), and sometimes the total number amounted to seven or eight, one witness says nine. Three carriages were kept; several of the tradespeople who supplied the family with the usual articles of consumption have been examined, and from their evidence it appears that, with respect to all such matters, the course of dealing was entirely on the footing usual in the case of a family having a fixed and permanent abode at Paris, credit being given in a manner and to an extent altogether unusual with respect to an English family intending only a temporary residence. But it may be observed that these tradespeople form their judgment as to whether a person is a permanent or merely temporary resident only, from the fact of his living in a furnished apartment, or hiring an unfurnished one, and putting in his own furniture. Their expression is "living in his own furniture." In connexion with the mention of the stable establishment, I may observe that in August 1828 Dr. Cochrane caused to be sent over to him from Clippens two horses which he had bred there; and moreover, in 1831 he had given directions for two more horses of his stud to be sent over from Clippens, but the execution of that design was prevented by his death. This is proved by Crow and Lockhead. Now, all that I have mentioned respecting the plan and mode of residence, and establishment adopted and maintained by Dr. Cochrane at Paris, in my opinion tends strongly to the inference that he intended a prolonged, if not a permanent, residence in Paris; and this strikes me very forcibly, that whatever weight is due to the argument derived from the circumstances attending Dr. Cochrane's residence in the Boulevard des Capucines, as indicating an intention of prolonged residence in France, an argument of far greater force in favour of such intention is to be derived from the circumstances attending his change of residence to the Place Vendôme, when we find that, after no less than three and a half years' residence at the former place, being dissatisfied with the accommodation, or the locality, or the style of the apartment he was living in, he thought fit to remove to a more spacious and fashionable and expensive dwelling, and to fit it up and furnish it at considerable expense. There are, however, three circumstances relating to the dwelling and establishment of Dr. Cochrane at Paris, which may be thought to have a contrary tendency, and which therefore deserve notice. The first is, a stipulation introduced into the leases or agreements under which Dr. Cochrane rented each of his two dwellings, making the tenancy determinable on three months' notice. This, no doubt, at first sight, would seem to indicate that a speedy departure was in contemplation; but having regard to the political events which had taken place at Paris during the half-century next preceding the time of which we are speaking, it would be most natural, and I think not inconsistent with an intention of prolonged or even permanent residence, that an Englishman should by such a stipulation provide for the chance of some political disturbance occurring which might render it expedient to quit the country suddenly. And accordingly Mr. Beavan (one of the boys' tutors), who had resided in France thirty-four or thirty-five years, says, in his affidavit, that it is the general and almost universal practice of Englishmen and other foreigners taking up their abode in France, and who take leases of their residences, to provide in such leases for the contingency of any cause for a hasty removal, by having inserted in such leases provisions for determining tenancies on three months' notice — a very singular thing; but, under the circumstances, it does not appear to me that the making such a stipulation is necessarily inconsistent with an intention to reside permanently at Paris. The second circumstance deserving of notice is, that, although the furniture at Clippens had been packed up and made ready for removal at the shortest possible notice, Dr. Cochrane did not send for it, but allowed it to remain at Clippens, and incurred the expense of purchasing new furniture for the apartments he rented in Paris; from which it has been argued that Dr. Cochrane abstained from removing the furniture from Clippens, in order that it might be ready for use there upon his return. To a certain extent there may be some ground for this argument. It must, however, be recollected, first, that the furniture at Clippens was of inferior style and quality, and unworthy the style of dwelling which Dr. Cochrane had adopted at Paris, as well as unsuited to Parisian ideas and tastes; and, secondly, that the expense of the transport of it to Paris, together with the import duty, would probably have amounted to nearly as much as the cost of new furniture. And, on the first head, we have the evidence of John Grieve, the upholsterer, who, after Dr. Cochrane's death, was employed to take the furniture from Clippens, to unpack it, and repack it, in order to send it to Mrs. Cochrane, and put it up in her house, in Harley Street, London, who says that the furniture was not very valuable; the dining-room curtains were silk and worsted damask, and the whole of the drawing-room furniture was imitation rosewood. And, upon the second head, we have also the evidence of Mr. Beavan (who had very long resided at or near Paris), who says, in his affidavit, that the purchase of fashionable furniture at Paris would cost but very little more than the expenses (including the import-duty) would amount to of bringing furniture from such a distance as Clippens, besides the consideration that English furniture would not be at all suitable to the style of Parisian apartments. It does not appear to me that the circumstance of Dr. Cochrane having abstained from transporting the Clippens furniture to Paris is necessarily inconsistent with an intention to make the latter place his permanent residence. The third circumstance worthy of notice is somewhat, perhaps, of the same character as the last; I mean the fact that Dr. Cochrane did not think fit to have his plate brought to Paris from the custody of the Paisley bankers. It appears from the evidence of Joseph Calomé, who was butler and valet to Dr. Cochrane, at the Place Vendôme, for about a year previous to Dr. Cochrane's death, that Dr. Cochrane used English plated goods, which he had brought over from England, and not silver. Mr. Francis Langan, whom I have before mentioned as the brother of the boys' tutor, speaking of the residence of Dr. Cochrane at the Boulevard des Capucines, says, he frequently dined with Dr. Cochrane, that he gave very fine dinners, and his table was groaning with plate. These two statements may perhaps be reconciled by supposing that Dr. Cochrane hired plate for the occasions of dinner parties, and used the plated goods for ordinary occasions. Certain it is, that during the period that Mr. Langan speaks of, during the residence in the Boulevard des Capucines, they were in the habit of giving great dinners, and that during the residence in the Place Vendôme they were not in the habit of giving dinners, or scarcely ever. But, however that may be, it appears to me that the fact is established that Dr. Cochrane abstained from bringing over his own plate from Scotland, and preferred purchasing plated goods in England for the use of his family in Paris. I do not think that his doing so can be altogether accounted for by the considerations of expense of transport, or the import duty which would be payable upon it in France. There is evidence to shew what Mrs. Cochrane said to that effect; but I think the fact in question tends, so far as it goes (though I do not think it of great weight), to negative the supposition that Dr. Cochrane intended to reside permanently in France; it may have its effect in shewing that he intended ultimately to return to Clippens; but I do not think the fact of any very great weight. No account which can be given of Dr. Cochrane's proceedings at Paris would be complete which omitted to notice the circumstance of the continued intercourse of Daniel Pearson (the groom) with the family; though I confess I do not think that this circumstance affords much argument to either party on the question of domicil. There is, however, another circumstance of some weight as to Dr. Cochrane's intention with respect to domicil, which is this, namely, that he seems to have entertained an idea of purchasing a country-house or landed property in France, for he made inquiries upon the subject of a foreigner acquiring and holding landed property in France, and was anxious to know whether the law of France placed any obstacles in the way of a foreigner acquiring landed property in that country. The tendency of this fact is strongly in favour of an intention to reside permanently in France. As a set-off, however, against this, we have another fact the tendency of which is in an opposite direction, namely, that during Dr. Cochrane's residence in Paris he was anxiously endeavouring to increase his estate at Clippens by the purchase of certain landed properties adjacent thereto. It appears from Crow's evidence, taken in 1844, that before leaving Clippens Dr. Cochrane had entertained such a desire; and it is shewn by Dr. Cochrane's letters to Campbell and to Crow, as well as by other evidence, that during the whole period of his residence at Paris he was in treaty for the purchase of two small properties adjoining to Clippens, the one consisting of two farms called the Green and Mill of Cart, and the other a farm called Ryewraes. His letters evince the greatest anxiety to accomplish these purchases, particularly the latter; and at length, in the year 1831, shortly before his death, he succeeded with respect to Ryewraes, a contract having been then entered into by him for the purchase of that property for 6,000*l.*, which was not completed until after his death. And the eagerness with which he pursued the object of adding to his Clippens estate is manifested by the fact, that the price which he agreed to pay for Ryewraes amounted to no less than forty-three years' purchase. It is true that Dr. Cochrane's desire to increase his property at Clippens may have had reference in some degree to the consideration that it would be the future residence of his descendants, and it may have been a regard to their future interest which induced him to add to the family property. And, indeed, there is distinct evidence that he did anticipate that his descendants would take up their residence at Clippens. But although Dr. Cochrane's expectation that Clippens would be the future place of residence of his sons may have constituted some part of the motive which made him desirous of increasing his property there, it is impossible, I think, to conclude that it was the whole or the only motive; and the eagerness with which he prosecuted that design appears to me to afford an argument of no slight weight in favour of the proposition that it was not his intention to abandon his Scotch domicil, and adopt a French one. But, besides being anxious to buy property near Clippens, it appears that he desired also to purchase some estate nearer to Edinburgh, and he actually instructed his agents Messrs. Hotchkiss & Meiklejohn (Writers to the Signet, at Edinburgh), to look out for such a purchase for him. Dr. Cochrane, however, abandoned this idea, and did not make any such purchase. He, nevertheless, told Mr. and Mrs. Moorhouse, during their visit to him at Paris in 1830, that he then entertained such an intention; that is, to buy property near Edinburgh. This circumstance, as far as it goes, tends strongly to shew an intention to retain the Scotch domicil. Another fact, which seems to me to tend towards the same direction as that which I have last mentioned is this, that he refused to allow his house at Clippens to be let. This fact also (though not a very strong one) tends to the supposition that he meant to keep Clippens in a state fit for his own occupation whenever he should desire it, and also supplies an argument for the contention that Dr. Cochrane intended to resume his residence at Clippens. I must not omit to mention the will or trust-deed of disposition executed by Dr. Cochrane in 1829, during his short visit to this country, which I have already mentioned. By this instrument, as I have said, he disposes of all his property, real and personal. It is in the Scotch form, and at the same time so framed as to be valid and effectual according to English law; but it does not seem to have crossed the mind of Dr. Cochrane, or of his legal advisers, that it was necessary that it should be framed in conformity with French law, by reason of his having adopted a French domicil. In this instrument Dr. Cochrane describes himself as of "Clippens," and it is always considered by jurists, that the manner in which a man describes himself in solemn acts and legal documents is an ingredient of an important kind with reference to the question of where his domicil is. Another matter deserving of consideration on the question of Dr. Cochrane's intention is this, that during the whole period of his residence at Paris he not only continued to feel and to manifest a deep interest in Clippens, and everything connected with it, but actually directed in detail the management of the property, and regulated everything that was required to be done with respect to the houses and lands, and the horses and other animals that had been left there, which furnishes as far as it goes an argument—and, as I think, a strong one—to those who contend that Dr. Cochrane's intention was to return to reside at Clippens, and not to fix his permanent abode in France.—[His Honour then read various letters written by Dr. Cochrane on the subject of his property at Clippens, and referred at considerable length to the evidence as to the statements made by him upon the subject at different times, tending to shew that at some future period his intention was to return to Scotland.—He then continued.]

We have here a number of verbal declarations, some strongly tending one way, and some equally strong tending the other way, and I may observe with regard to oral declarations, that jurists seem to be of opinion (and I think the cases proceed on that) that verbal declarations are not of so much weight as written declarations, and that neither verbal declarations nor written declarations would be so effective as the acts of the parties in determining the question of domicil. The result of the evidence which bears upon the question of Dr. Cochrane's domicil appears to me to be this: when I consider the motives which may be supposed to have operated on the mind of Dr. Cochrane, I find that some of them are such as would incline him to a residence in Scotland, others to a residence in France. Three motives are assigned as tending to induce Dr. Cochrane to reside at Paris: first, a taste for Parisian life and society, as well as for the climate of France as most suitable to his constitution; secondly, the effect produced at Clippens by Mrs. Cochrane's conduct, and the displeasure felt towards the neighbours on that and other grounds; and, thirdly, the desire to educate the sons abroad: the last special and temporary, the other two of a more permanent character. On the other hand, strong motives for intending to return to reside at Clippens may be found in his attachment to his native country, and to Clippens in particular, as being the seat of his ancestors, his own birthplace, his property which he delighted to improve and increase, and the spot where he was surrounded with those objects which best suited his natural tastes and propensities. Among these conflicting motives it is not easy to say which would preponderate in his mind. But a perusal of all the evidence bearing upon the motives rather inclines me to the opinion that these latter motives (that is, those inclining Dr. Cochrane to return and reside at Clippens) would, with Dr. Cochrane himself, outweigh the others. If I examine the acts and conduct of Dr. Cochrane, there is much which, if taken by itself, would lead to the conclusion that he had abandoned his Scotch and acquired a French domicil: the mere fact of his residing in France for full five years is of no slight force, and residence is often considered of great importance on the question of intention. His taking an unfurnished dwelling and furnishing it at his own expense—but especially his doing this a second time, and at still greater expense, after he had already resided three years and a half at Paris, and the expensive establishments of servants, horses and carriages which he kept—are facts which afford a strong argument in favour of a French domicil; and so also is the fact of his having meditated the purchase of landed property in France. On the other hand, there are other portions of his acts and conduct which seem to me to have a strong contrary tendency. The intense interest which he manifested in everything at Clippens, and the minuteness and particularity and constancy with which he continued during his whole absence to direct, regulate and prescribe all the details of the management of the property, and the treatment of the horses and other animals there, as if his object was to have the place always ready for re-occupation, his refusing to let it, the eagerness with which he prosecuted and effected his purpose of adding to his property there, his endeavours to purchase other property in Scotland, nearer to Edinburgh, his describing himself in his last will or trust-deed of disposition as of Clippens,—all these are circumstances which tend, and tend strongly, in favour of his retention of his Scotch domicile. As to his acts and conduct, then, we have some acts tending one way, and some the other; and it appears to me that the inferences which may be drawn from the acts and conduct of Dr. Cochrane are pretty evenly balanced. Again, when I look at Dr. Cochrane's declarations of intention, whether written or verbal, I find the same sort of inconsistency, some of them tending in favour of a Scotch, and others of them in favour of a French domicile. In such a state of things, what is the principle which ought to govern the decision of the Court on the question of Dr. Cochrane's domicile? There is one principle very well established, namely, that slighter evidence is required to warrant the conclusion that a man intends to abandon an acquired domicile, and to resume his domicile of origin, than is necessary to justify the conclusion that he means to abandon his domicile of origin, and to acquire a new one. And another principle is that which is referred to by Lord Cranworth, in Whicker v. Hume, in the House of Lords, namely, that it requires stronger and more conclusive evidence to justify the Court in deciding that a man has acquired a new domicile in a foreign country than would suffice to warrant the conclusion that he has acquired a new domicile in a country where he is not a foreigner; for instance, the Court would more readily decide that a Scotchman had acquired a domicile in England than that he had acquired a domicile in France where he would be a foreigner. In truth, to hold that a man has acquired a domicile in a foreign country, is a most serious matter, involving, as it does, the consequence that the validity or invalidity of his testamentary acts, and the disposition of his personal property, are to be governed by the laws of that foreign country.

No doubt, the evidence may be so strong and conclusive as to render such a conclusion unavoidable, but the consequences of such a decision may be, and generally are, so serious and so injurious to the welfare of families, that it can only be justified by the clearest and most conclusive evidence. In the present case, the question is, whether Dr. Cochrane, whose domicile of origin was Scotch, and whose domicile when he quitted Clippens was decidedly the same domicile of origin, abandoned that domicile and acquired a domicile in France, where he was in every sense a foreigner; for it does not appear that he ever made application for what are called civil rights, which a foreigner might do, as appears by some of the evidence; and it seems to me that the evidence in the case is not of that clear and conclusive character which would justify me in deciding that he had abandoned the Scotch domicile and adopted a new one in France, which was a foreign country. Furthermore, if I try the question by the criterion of the often-cited definition from the Roman law, to which I have had occasion before to refer, it does not appear to me that the circumstances of Dr. Cochrane's residence in France satisfy the requirements of any of these definitions; and I will take in preference the most celebrated definitions to which I have before largely referred. It does not appear to me, as I have said, that the requirements of the definition of the Roman law are satisfied by the circumstances of Dr. Cochrane's residence in France; for admitting that he had established his household "larem," whatever "larem" means, in Paris, how can it be said that he had there established the chief part or bulk of his business, and of his property, that is, "rerum ac fortunarum summam"? How can it be said, that the requirements of that definition were satisfied? So far as he had any business, "res," the business in which he was incessantly engaged was the management and improvement and augmentation of his estate at Clippens, and the directing and regulating of everything connected with it. Business he had none at Paris; and as to his property, "fortunæ," he had nothing at Paris but his furniture and equipage; the chief part or bulk of his property, whatever is meant by

"fortunarum summam," so far as his property had any locality, was certainly at Clippens. Of Scotland only, and not of France, could it be truly said "in eodem loco rerum ac fortunarum suarum summam constituit." It may admit of more doubt whether the subsequent part of the definition would apply to his residence at Paris "unde rursus, non sit discessurus si nihil avocet; unde cum profectus est, peregrinari videtur; quod si rediit peregrinari jam destitit"; but I strongly incline to the opinion that his intention throughout was at some future time to quit France without being called away by the happening of any special event, and to reside permanently in Scotland; and as to his feeling himself at any time a wanderer from home, I think it was when he left Clippens for the Continent in 1825, and not when he made the short visit to Scotland in 1829. I think his feeling on the occasion of that visit was, that he was revisiting his home (as he expressed himself), though it was but for a short time, and that his feeling was not that he was wandering from it. Now, in the view that I have taken of the evidence, and in the view which I take of the principle which ought to govern the Court where the Court has, as to motives and as to conduct, expressions or declarations, written or verbal, of this inconsistent character, some tending one way and some tending another, I think I am bound to come to the conclusion that Dr. Cochrane did not abandon his Scotch domicil and adopt a French domicil.

Dec. 23. JAMES v. NORTH.

Writ of Ne Exeat—Insolvency.

A writ of ne exeat regno was obtained against a defendant upon an undertaking by the plaintiff to be answerable for damages. The defendant became insolvent, and obtained his protection under the act:—Held, that the writ must be discharged upon payment of costs by the defendant and the plaintiff being released from his undertaking.

This was a motion for the discharge of a writ of ne exeat regno which had been issued against Sir W. Magnay, on the ground that since the issuing of the writ he had taken the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and had obtained his protection.

Mr. Hardy, in support of the motion, submitted that since, by the insolvency, the debt, as affecting the person of the insolvent, was gone, the writ must cease to operate. There was no reference to such a case in the act of parliament, and no precedent for such an application; but upon principle it was clear that the protection would be of no use if the writ could be put in force. Every shilling which the insolvent possessed had been taken in execution by the plaintiffs. The writ ought, therefore, to be discharged.

Mr. Leach, for the plaintiffs, who were infants, stated that the defendant, Sir W. Magnay, had been trustee for them, and the trust monies, amounting to 20,000*l.*, had got into his hands. He had committed a breach of trust, and had applied this money in speculations, and then threatened to go abroad. The writ of ne exeat was thereupon obtained at the Rolls upon an undertaking by the plaintiffs to be answerable for damages. The defendant had then taken the benefit of the act, and though he had obtained protection, it was of the greatest importance to the plaintiffs that he should not go abroad, since they would then be unable to obtain that information from him which would enable the plaintiffs to save any of the property.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—Although the plaintiffs in this case are infants, and can give no consent to any arrangement, still the Court cannot be governed by that consideration, and cannot be guided by the hardship arising from the breach of trust however fraudulent it might be. The only question for the Court is, whether on principle a writ of ne exeat can be continued against a person after he has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and obtained his protection. Although there is no precedent for such a case, I think on principle, that the writ ought to be charged on certain terms. The purpose of a writ of ne exeat is to prevent the d from going out of the jurisdiction of this Court until the debt is satisfied, and it will operate on his person, not on his property, in order that his person may be kept within such jurisdiction, on the ground that he is a debtor, and that he may not escape from payment of the debt. A decree has been made for payment of the sum for which the writ is indorsed, and for the costs of the suit; therefore, that sum is a debt due from the defendant, and until it is discharged he is not to be allowed to go out of the kingdom. He took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act; that did not discharge the debt, but left after-acquired property subject to that and any other debts there may be, under certain regulations prescribed by the act. Proceedings might be taken to make subsequently-acquired property liable, but not to make him personally liable; on the contrary, the act prescribes that on certain things being done, the Commissioner is to pronounce a formal order for personal protection, which is conclusive and perpetual. In that state of things, the debtor has personally ceased to be liable to the debt. No doubt the debt is not discharged, but he cannot be made personally answerable; and inasmuch as the reason for keeping him within the jurisdiction has ceased, the writ is no longer of any service to the plaintiffs, and ought not to continue. It has been said that the plaintiffs might require some information in the way of evidence from the defendant as a witness to prove something, as between the plaintiffs and some other persons, but that would be converting the ne exeat from a writ to operate on a debtor to a writ operating on a witness, which ought not to be. Therefore, that is not a ground on which there is any right in the plaintiffs to keep the defendant in the kingdom. When the writ was granted the plaintiffs gave, as is now required, an undertaking to be answerable for damages in case they should be in the wrong; and one of the terms of discharging this writ must be that the plaintiffs are released from all liability with respect to that undertaking, and from any action or other proceeding on behalf of the defendant with respect to the ne exeat, and the defendant must pay the costs of this application. The next friend of the infants is not wrong in coming to the Court, inasmuch as he, though an adult himself, is not obliged to consent to discharge the writ, except on terms which were not of course provided for by the order of the Rolls.

WOOD, V.C. { MATTHEWS v. THE GREAT
Jan. 28, 29. { NORTHERN RAILWAY COM-PANY.

Company—Guaranteed Shares—Dividends—Construction of Statute—Acquiescence.

By an act of parliament it was enacted, that it should be lawful for any shareholder who should have paid up one half the amount of any share or shares of the G. N. R. Company, to require each share to be converted into two half-shares, whereof the one half which should be so fully paid up should be denominated deferred half-share, and the other half of such share should be denominated guaranteed half-share; and thenceforth in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued should be applied in or towards payment, in the first place, of interest or dividend after the rate of 6l. per cent. per annum on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated "guaranteed," and the remainder, if any, should alone be payable to the half-share so denominated "deferred," provided that the company should not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than was for the time being paid on each undivided share:—Held, upon the construction of this section, that the holders of guaranteed half-shares were entitled to be paid their 6l. per cent. in each year not only out of the dividends accruing in that year, but out of all subsequent dividends; and, therefore, if in any year the dividends were more than sufficient to pay 6l. per cent. on the guaranteed half-shares, the surplus must be applied in payment, in the first place of all arrears due on those half-shares in respect of past deficiencies before any dividend could be declared on the deferred half-shares.

The holders of the guaranteed half-shares having in a former year acquiesced in the declaration of a dividend on the deferred half-shares, whilst there was an arrear of dividend due on the guaranteed half-shares, —Held, that although they had precluded themselves from making any claim in respect of those particular arrears, they had not thereby renounced their rights in respect of subsequent arrears.

The bill in this case was filed, by the plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and all other holders of guaranteed or B. stock in the Great Northern Railway Company, against the company, the directors and secretary, for the purpose of having it declared that the holders of the B. stock were entitled to be paid, or to have provision made that they should be paid such interest or dividend on the amount from time to time paid up upon the B. stock held by them respectively, as would, with the interest or dividends already paid to the holders of such B. stock, make up the full amount of 6*l.* per cent. per annum from the 30th of June 1850 to the day of the payment, or of providing for payment of such full amount, before any payment in respect of dividends or otherwise to any of the holders of the deferred or A. stock in the same company should be made or provided for, and for consequential relief.

The circumstances of the case will appear from the following paragraphs in the bill:—Par. 20. Shortly previous to the Half-yearly Ordinary General Meeting of the Great Northern Railway Company, held on the 12th of August 1848, the directors issued and circulated among the shareholders their report. Such report contained the following passage:—"The bill for the Doncaster and other deviations, &c., for which application to parliament was sanctioned by the special meeting in February last, was unexpectedly thrown out on the second reading in the Commons. A clause therein was subsequently inserted in the 'Isle of Axholme Act,' authorizing the division of the present 25*l.* shares into two shares of 12*l.* 10*s.* each, in the mode and for the purpose explained at the February special meeting. This division of the shares was suggested with the object of relieving those shareholders to whom it may have become inconvenient to pay up the remainder of the calls, and in the opinion of the directors it will have that effect, and, whilst it cannot injure, it may operate beneficially to the interests of the company generally, by tending to increase the number of the shareholders, and to obtain payment of the arrears of calls. The directors, therefore, under the clause in the act, have resolved to give any shareholder who has paid up 17*l.* per share the option of dividing his shares, and arrangements will be made for carrying out the division, which will be communicated to the shareholders by the 1st of October, to come into operation by the 1st of November next. The plan is as follows: that each shareholder shall have the option of dividing his 25*l.* share into two 12*l.* 10*s.* shares, distinguished as A. or deferred, and B. or guaranteed shares, the B. (unpaid up) to be guaranteed by the holder of the A. (paid up) 6*l.* per cent. per annum, and the A. to take the chance of all further dividend or privilege. The B. guaranteed 12*l.* 10*s.* shall be entitled to 6*l.* per cent. per annum on the amount paid up out of the interest allowed during the construction of the line, and a preference dividend afterwards up to 6*l.* per cent. per annum before the A. shares shall receive any dividend, and shall have the option of paying up the calls in full and receiving 6*l.* per cent. from the 1st of the month after payment. Another obvious and important advantage that will result from this division of the shares is, that the A. or paid-up portion can be converted into stock, which course the directors recommend, and the notice required for this purpose will be given prior to the next general meeting in February, that it may be then carried out."

21. The said meeting of the Great Northern Railway Company was duly held on the 12th of August 1848, and a resolution for the adoption of the report was put and carried.

24. The Great Northern Railway Act Amendment and Isle of Axholme Extension Act, 1848, contained the following section:—And be it enacted, that within such period as shall be fixed from time to time by the directors, it shall be lawful for any shareholder who shall have paid up one-half the amount of any share or shares of the said Great Northern Railway Company, to require each share to be converted into two half-shares, whereof the one half which shall be so fully paid up shall be denominated "Deferred half-share," and the other half of such share shall be denominated "Guaranteed half-share," and the same half-shares shall thereupon be registered and certificates issued accordingly, and thenceforth in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued shall be applied in or towards payment in the first place of interest or dividend, after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated "Guaranteed," and the remainder (if any) shall alone be payable to the half-share so denominated "Deferred;" provided that the company shall not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than is for the time being paid on each undivided share; provided also, that no such guaranteed half-share shall be transferable until at least 2*l.* 10*s.* shall be paid thereon; and that if in pursuance of any powers now vested, or hereafter to be vested in them, the company shall hereafter guarantee the payment of interest or dividends upon any shares in preference to the payment thereof on the ordinary shares of the company, such half-shares, whether guaranteed or deferred, shall be equally liable with the ordinary shares of the company to such preference.

31. A considerable number of the original shareholders applied to have their shares divided, and the company issued to the applicants scrip for as many deferred or A. half-shares of 12*l.* 10*s.* each as corresponded with the number of original shares for which application was made, and also scrip for an equal number of guaranteed or B. half-shares of the same amount.

39. On the 1st of May 1851, the share capital being all paid up was changed into a stock capital, consisting of 2,477,475*l.* original stock, 1,159,275*l.* deferred or A. stock, and 1,159,275*l.* guaranteed or B. stock. Half-yearly dividends upon the original and upon the B. stock were from time to time declared up to the 20th of August 1853, but on no occasion did they amount to 6*l.* per cent. on the B. stock,

Shortly previous to the half-yearly ordinary general meeting of the company, held on the 25th of February 1854, the directors issued their report, which contained the following passage referring to the original, the deferred (A.) and the guaranteed (B.) stocks:—"The directors recommend that the dividend on these several stocks shall be for the half-year at the rate of 2½*ths* percent. on the original, 3½*l.* percent. on the B, and 1½*l.* per cent. on the A. stock, which, together, will absorb 114,200*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*, and a balance of 3,940*l.* 18*s.* will remain to be carried to the next account. With respect to the B. and A. stocks it may be useful to observe, that the holders of B. stock being guaranteed a preference dividend of 6*l.* per cent. by the holders of A. stock, if earned by traffic within the year, and the B. stock having received for the first half of the year 1853 a dividend equal to 2½*l.* per cent, the B. stock is now entitled to receive a dividend of 3½*l.* per cent., that rate being necessary to make up 6*l.* per cent. for the whole year of 1853."

The half-yearly ordinary general meeting was held on the 25th of February 1854, and dividends were declared corresponding to the rates recommended in the report, and both in 1854 and in 1855 dividends were declared at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. upon the B. stock, and at the rate of 2½*l.* and 2½*l.* respectively on the A. stock. In 1856 it was discovered that stock to the amount of about 220,000*l.* had been fraudulently created and issued by one Leopold Redpath. In consequence of this, no dividend was declared at the next half-yearly meeting, which was held on the 12th of March 1857, but the net revenue was applied in buying up and cancelling an amount of stock and shares equal to the amount fraudulently created. At the half-yearly meeting held in August 1857, a dividend of 12*s.* per cent. only was declared upon the B. stock.

By their report issued previous to the half-yearly meeting held in February 1858, the directors recommended a dividend for the half-year at the rate of 5*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* per cent. per annum on the ordinary stock, of 5*l.* 8*s.* per cent. for the half-year on the

B. stock, and of 2s. 6d. on the A. stock. At the half-yearly meeting, held on the 19th of February 1858, an amendment was proposed to the resolution for the adoption of this report to the effect, that 5l. 10s. 6d. per cent. should be paid to the holders of B. stock, towards payment of the amount necessary to make up the deficiencies of the previous years. The amendment, however, was negatived and the resolution carried, and the plaintiffs thereupon filed the present bill.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Denison and Mr. T. Stevens, for the defendants, contended that, according to the true construction of the act of parliament of 1848, the guaranteed dividends for each year were to be made good only out of the dividends declared for that year, and if in any year there was not sufficient to pay 6l. per cent. the holders of B. stock were not entitled to have the arrears paid up out of dividends declared in subsequent years. This construction was acquiesced in in 1854, and could not now be dissented from—Cholmondeley v. Clinton (1).

WOOD, V.C. (without hearing a reply).
—I have looked carefully through the decision in Henry v. the Great Northern Railway Company, and it seems to me that the effect of the judgment of the Court of Appeal was this, that although the term "dividend" or "interest," or any other term, is used in respect of guaranteed shares, where a person holding such shares acquires a right to a fixed payment out of profits, at a certain rate per cent., such payment is in effect in its nature interest chargeable upon profits. The words of Lord Cranworth are important with reference to the general construction of securities of this description. In page 637 he says, "I have come to the conclusion, that what these statutes in fact guarantee to the favoured shareholders is a charge on all accruing profits at the stipulated rate before anything is divided among the ordinary shareholders. This is substantially interest chargeable exclusively on profits. There is nothing in such a use of the word 'dividend' which is at all at variance with ordinary usage. We speak of the dividends payable upon the 3l. per cents, when in truth we mean no more than an annuity of 3l. chargeable upon and payable out of the public revenue." Lord Justice Turner, in the same way, after referring to some observations which he had made in the case of Sturge v. the Eastern Union Railway Company, in page 648 says, "It was argued for the appellants that the expression 'interest or preference dividend' in that report meant interest until the shares were fully paid up, and preference dividend afterwards. I am by no means satisfied of this, but even supposing it to be so, there would still remain the question, what was meant by 'preference dividend' after the shares were paid up. The whole tenour of the report shews, I think, that what was so meant was interest." This case is very different in its circumstances from Henry v. the Great Northern Railway Company. It is not a contract between the company at large and a certain number of persons whom they wish to tempt to join them by holding out to them a larger rate either of dividend or interest. It is an arrangement which is shewn fully by the history of the case previous to the passing of the Isle of Axholme Act, if that were necessary to be entered into. But I think it quite unnecessary, and it is more legitimately shewn upon the section of the act to which reference has been made. It is a case in which the benefit is intended to be conferred upon certain shareholders who may wish to avail themselves of the privilege of splitting their shares into two. The object of that splitting is evinced by the preliminary proceedings. The effect of it is exactly coincident with the object of the section of the act, namely, that whereas there were a certain number of persons who held 25*l.* shares, who were not in a condition to pay their 25*l.* a share, the company said to these shareholders, "You may, in order to avoid the forfeiture of your shares, split them into halves if you have paid up a certain amount of call, and you will have the half-share clearly and fully satisfied and paid up and another half-share to dispose of. It is for you to say, before obtaining this act of parliament, what are the terms upon which you would wish to be at liberty to dispose of that half-share, and we, the directors, will embody them for you in our act of parliament, from which time of course you will be put in the position of holding your two half-shares. You will be in a condition to go into the market with one-half share, having certain dividends which will tempt persons who may be disposed to relieve you of your shares to become holders of the half-shares." It is obvious, I think, that the scheme assumed that the holder would be disposed to part with what would be called "the guaranteed share." He might part with both, but in trading with the guaranteed share, he would have an opportunity of tempting the purchaser to relieve him of that half-share by offering the terms which are embodied in this act of parliament. It may well be said, that the object of the act is by no means very definitely expressed with regard to all the purposes which may be supposed to have been in view. However, the words, I think, are sufficiently expressed to indicate the intention which I have already stated, in truth, seems to have been contemplated by the holders of the shares themselves when they were originally issued. It is enacted, "that within such period as shall be fixed from time to time by the directors, it shall be lawful for any shareholder who shall have paid one half the amount of any share or shares of the Great Northern Railway Company, to require each share to be converted into two half-shares." Then the shareholder will have of course the one half-share fully paid up, and the other half not paid up; and he may dispose of whichever half he pleases. The shareholder then is entitled to require his share to be converted into two half-shares, "whereof the one half which shall be so fully paid up shall be denominated 'deferred half-share,' and the other half of such share shall be denominated 'guaranteed half-share;'" so far the section simply gives two names which are calculated to have a certain degree of effect, no doubt: "and the same half-shares shall thereupon be registered and certificates issued accordingly, and thenceforth" in respect of each whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends which would in each year have accrued shall be applied in or towards payment in the first place of interest or dividend, after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, on the amount paid upon the half-share so denominated "guaranteed," and the remainder, if any, shall alone be payable to the half-share so denominated "deferred." The clause, of course, means a warranty of something, and the whole question is, to what extent is the warranty given, and what is the security which is to be the means of enforcing the warranty? The defendants contend, that the right of the preference shareholders attaches only de anno in annum, and that the profits for each year are only liable to the claim of the preference shareholders to have their dividends made up to 6*l.* per cent. for that year. The question is, whether the guarantie goes beyond that? It cannot be contended, —and this point I put as striking my mind in favour of the defendants' argument,—that the guarantie is an absolute guarantie; it must be a limited guarantie, at least limited to the whole of the profits made by the railway. It is neither a personal guarantie from an individual shareholder, nor is it a guarantie from the general funds of the company. It must, therefore, be a limited guarantie of some sort, and the only question is, what is its limit? The defendants say the limit is de anno in annum, the annual profit as it accrues. The plaintiffs say it is the whole amount of the dividend accruing to the entire share which is to guarantee the payment at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. Now, as the thing stands, before I come to the proviso in the act, it seems that what is done is this—"Thenceforth," that is to say, after this division has taken place, "in respect of each whole share, the whole of the interest and dividend which in each year would have accrued" except for this "shall be applied towards payment in the first place of interest or dividend after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum." Unless one attaches to "dividend" the very narrow construction that was attempted in Sturge v. the Eastern Union Railway Company, and which was attempted also in Henry v. the Great Northern Railway Company, namely, that dividend meant ex vi termini, that the holder of the B. share is only entitled to the annual division of profits, and is entitled to nothing else by force of the word "dividend," it appears to me to be impossible to sustain the contention which is here raised by the defendants, because the clause does not say that de anno in annum you shall pay over to the holder of B. shares 6*l.* per cent. for that given year, but the clause says that it is to be out of the whole interest and dividend which accrues in each year. It is, as it appears to me, a devotion of all the interest and all the dividends which for every year would otherwise have accrued upon those given shares. The expression is, that it shall no longer be paid upon the shares at all, in consequence of the shares having been divided in two, but it shall form a fund to be applied in the first place in or towards the payment of interest or dividend at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, and the balance only shall be payable on the half-shares denominated deferred. I do not think in that respect the word "towards" is immaterial. Mr. Denison endeavoured to obviate its force in this way:—he said the act had regard to the ordinary custom of paying these things half-yearly, and that in one half-year there would only be perhaps 3*l.* per cent. payable in respect of the half-yearly payments, and that would be a payment "towards" the 6*l.* per cent. which, on taking the whole dividend, would have to be paid. I do not think that gives sufficient force to the word "towards," because the words are "the whole of the interest and dividends which in each year have accrued." The section contemplates a year's dividend in hand on the contention of both parties. The section contemplates a year's dividend at least, and says that shall go "in" or "towards" the payment of interest. It appears to me, therefore, that, in saying "in or towards," the section contemplates the event of the year's dividend not being enough to satisfy that which the act directs to be paid: it says it shall be in payment of that 6*l.* per cent., if you can get it, and towards the payment of it if you cannot get it, and that nothing is to be paid over at any time to the holders of the deferred shares until the complete payment is made. That seems to me, I confess, to be the true sense of the thing. Now when I come to "guaranteed" it is coupled with the direction for the payment of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, and it seems to me that unless I find something expressly limiting the calculation of the 6*l.* per cent. per annum to the current year, the natural meaning of the expression 6*l.* per cent. per annum is 6*l.* per cent. per annum from the time of the advance. That is the natural force of the expression, unless I find something strictly and directly limiting it to the year.

Now the circumstance that the shareholders have seen, in making this arrangement, that the fund which is to form the guarantee is a fund which, in ordinary years, will be divisible yearly (although that is by no means the case at all times), and have said that out of that fund, divisible yearly, 6*l.* per cent. per annum shall be paid to the holders of the B. shares, does not in itself shew that the 6*l.* per cent. per annum is to be limited to the particular year in which that fund is accruing. All that it does is to point out that there is a fund accruing de anno in annum. Take the whole of that fund accruing de anno in annum; out of that fund so accruing pay whatever payments can properly be made at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum upon the B. share, and when you have done that, and not until you have done that, hand over the balance to the other party. Now the introduction of "each and every year" seems to me to be the only point, in truth, that could have been used properly in argument in this case for distinguishing it from the previous case of Henry v. the Great Northern Railway Company. If it had been simply a payment out of the dividend, without reference to each year, it appears to me the case would have been brought to the same point as before, namely, that there is a clear charge of interest on profits generally. The circumstance of the introduction of these words does not seem to me necessarily, upon due consideration, to be entitled to the force which has been contended for, because, in reality, it is merely an introduction into this clause of that which all parties assumed to be the ordinary course of dealing, namely, the division which annually takes place. In reality, that is not the course which has been pursued: it is not the course which can be pursued when there is no profit in a given year. There is nothing to compel the company to declare annual dividends. That, however, being the most probable state of circumstances, the act points out the fund, and says, here is an annually accruing fund, and that annually accruing fund shall be applied, in the first place, towards the payment of 6*l.* per cent. per annum; and that points out the limitation of the guarantie.

So far I have proceeded upon the wording of the clause itself before the proviso; but I confess it has appeared throughout to my mind that the proviso strengthened that construction. It is said, that according to the construction I have given to the clause the proviso is immaterial and unnecessary. Upon a strict analysis of the whole clause, it is possible it might have been construed as well without it, but it by no means follows that because a clause which is not very well expressed may ultimately be construed to have that meaning which would render the proviso unnecessary, the proviso is therefore inoperative in regard to the possible danger to the general shareholders, who may have no mind to divide their shares, many of them having paid in full. The proviso is put in to protect the mass of the company from any possible consequence of the wording of the previous portion of the clause. It seemed probable to those who drew the clause that there was a power to compel the directors to issue two kinds of certificates: one for the share called the "deferred share," and the other for the "guaranteed share," and they are directed to pay in future 6*l.* per cent. upon the guaranteed share. In the first place, the very term "guaranteed" may raise questions which it is inconvenient the company should be fixed with; and therefore the clause provides that the company shall not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend upon the two half-shares than is for the time being paid on each undivided share. Standing alone, until the ingenious gloss was put upon it in argument, I think nothing could be clearer than that. It says, we must take care not to compromise the other classes of shareholders; and although we call this a guarantie, it is a guarantie entirely between the two classes of shareholders themselves, and not in the slightest degree affecting the general body of shareholders; and consequently the two shareholders might go to the company with their two half-shares, and having got their dividend, divide it according to the terms of the previous section; but they acquire no right as regards the general body of shareholders. That would have been the simple and intelligible meaning to put on that clause.

But, further than that, it seems to me, in some degree, to help the previous construction which I put upon the clause in this respect. The general shareholders, no doubt, were apprehensive unless they put some clause into the act that, under the general operation of the word "guaranteed," some question might be raised which would affect them, and with that question they intended to have nothing to do. That seems to me to be the sensible meaning of the proviso.

I am asked to construe the section as meaning, not that there shall never be payable on the two shares together more than is payable on one undivided share, which I have held to be the plain meaning of it, but that there shall never be paid upon any one half-share in respect of any past year a sum of money which, taken with the other payments that the holder of that half-share shall have received, shall be 6*l.* per cent. upon a given half-share for the year in which the general body of shareholders did not receive 3*l.* per cent. Can that be the meaning of the clause? It would not have been paid at all on the two half-shares. It would be a payment made on the one half-share only out of the fund appropriated to two half-shares. The payment to the holder of the B. shares in respect of any year, say 1850, out of the sum allotted upon the whole share in 1856 does not in the slightest degree amount to a payment made in the words of this section upon the two half-shares exceeding the payment made on the one undivided share. What is done is only this, that there is paid on the two half-shares exactly what might be paid on every undivided share. That is put by, and from that moment the holder of the undivided share has nothing to complain of.

I cannot conceive a clause more clumsily drawn if the proviso was intended to say that the holders of the guaranteed shares shall not be entitled in any one year to require the arrears to be paid to them for any past year in respect of the 6*l.* per cent.; instead of saying that, the clause says the dividend on the two half-shares, not the dividend on the one half-share, shall not exceed the dividend to be paid on each undivided share. It has appeared to me throughout that the words are utterly inconsistent with the defendants' contention. The company are not paying a dividend at all larger to the one share than to the other. They are paying exactly the same amount of dividend to two halves of the split share as to the whole undivided share, and that dividend so paid is to be appropriated on the principle enunciated in the previous part of the clause, and although it may be said fairly that, according to the construction I have given the clause, this operation would have taken place without any such proviso, because there is nothing which says that the holder of the split share shall have a larger dividend than the holder of the entire share, yet there was enough in the expression "guaranteed," and in the direction to pay 6*l.* per cent. upon the whole amount advanced, to render it at least desirable to have an explicit declaration which would free the matter from all doubt.

That this was the opinion of the shareholders when the general shares were first issued there can be no doubt, and it is satisfactory to find what the notion was of those who framed the thing. The indorsement on the certificate is this:—"B. ($\frac{1}{2}$ share) during the payment of interest will receive 6 p. c. p. a. on the amount paid up, and when interest ceases will be entitled to all the dividends made in respect of the original 25*l.* share until it receives such 6*l.* p. c., but it will in no case be entitled to receive more than that rate per annum." It says to a B. shareholder, You shall never get more than 6*l.* per cent. per annum, but you will have the dividends made in respect of the original share until it makes 6*l.* per cent. per annum. That is the exact interpretation I have given to it. The whole body of dividend is to be set apart, out of which the 6*l.* per cent. is to be derived. I cannot hold that that is merely an unauthorized scribbling by the directors on the back of the share. The shareholder takes out an A. certificate and a B. certificate, and going into the market with the B. certificate so indorsed tenders it to his customer. It is a representation made by him, and not by the directors, for when he tenders that document nothing is said about in each year, or from year to year, but he says, You shall have all my dividend until you are paid 6*l.* per cent. per annum. Certainly, it is no surprise upon those who first took the shares, for I think it is sufficiently expressed in the section as the thing intended to be done. Unless I could give the interpretation to the proviso which has been contended for on the part of the defendants, it seems to me to be clear that it helps materially to show that the company and the shareholders were afraid that by the operation of the previous section the whole company might become liable to this guarantie.

Then comes the question of laches. It does not appear that I can hold parties to be precluded, because they stand by acquiescing in a certain sense, that is to say, not asserting their rights upon a construction adverse to their view taken by the directors as it was taken in the report of 1854. When I say adverse, I do not quite coincide with what Mr. Denison urged, that it does not appear that there was any assertion of right. The directors announced their view, and nobody said anything. They were content to take their dividend. Upon that I hold that they cannot call back the dividends which have been paid down to that time, but I do not think that that precludes them for all time from saying that they have not renounced their rights, or that the persons who may have bought A. shares with the notion that their rights were different from what the Court has now held them to be, can say to the B. shareholders, You who, rather than go into litigation, acquiesced in having the money, which might have been paid in a particular way, appropriated in a different way during a certain period of time, are therefore bound in all time to give up that right. There is nothing in the shape of misrepresentation or fraudulent holding out to make me say, there is an equity to be fastened on all the B. shareholders for all time by reason of their acquiescing in the view which might have been then taken. The only remaining point is as to appropriating the future dividends of the present A. shareholders, in repayment of the 2s. 6d. declared in February 1858. Upon this I must hear Mr. Daniel in reply.

Mr. Daniel, however, consented to waive the claim.

Declare that the plaintiffs and all other holders of the guaranteed stock commonly called B. stock in the Great Northern Railway Company are entitled to be paid, or to have provision made that they shall be paid such interest or dividend on the amount from time to time paid up upon the said guaranteed or B. stock held by them respectively, as will, with the interest or dividends already paid to the holders of such guaranteed or B. stock, and also the dividend of 2s. 6d. per cent. paid to the holders of the deferred stock, commonly called A. stock, in the Great Northern Railway Company, in pursuance of the resolution at the said meeting of the said company on the 19th of February 1858, make up the full amount of interest or dividends, at the rate of 6l. per cent. per annum from the 31st of December 1855 to the day of payment, or of providing for payment of such full amount of interest or dividends, before any payment, in respect of dividends or otherwise, to any of the holders of the deferred stock, commonly called A. stock, is made or provided for; and order accordingly. Order that the defendants be restrained by injunction from declaring any dividend on the A. stock, without regard to the right of the plaintiffs and all other holders of the B. stock, to be paid in priority such an amount as will, together with the dividends already paid to the holders of the B. stock and the said dividend of 2s. 6d. per cent. so paid to the holders of the A. stock as aforesaid, make up the full amount of interest or dividend at 6l. per cent. per annum on the amount from time to time paid up upon the B. stock held by them respectively, such interest to be calculated from the 31st of December 1855 to the day of payment, and from making any payment for dividends in respect of the A. stock, without first paying or making provision for payment of such amount to the holders of the B. stock. Costs of the plaintiffs to be paid out of any profits of the company applicable to the payment of dividends on the A. stock, except so far as they have been increased by any claim for arrears prior to the 31st of December 1855.

WOOD, V.C. } In the matter of ACOTT'S
Jan. 29. } SETTLEMENT.

Settlement—"Vested Interest"—"Survivors."

On the marriage of J. A. and S. A. a sum of stock was settled by deed, upon trust after the death of J. A. and S. A., and failure of issue of the marriage, to transfer the same unto, amongst and between J. F, R. F, W. F. and E. F. equally; provided that if either of them, the said J. F, R. F, W. F. and E. F, should depart this life without having acquired a vested interest, leaving issue, the share of such person so dying should go to such issue; but in case either of them should die without having lawful issue, then the share of him, her or them so dying should belong to the survivors or survivor of them. There was no issue of the marriage. J. F. and R. F. died in the lifetime of J. A. and S. A., leaving issue. W. F. survived J. F., and died in the lifetime of R. F. without issue. E. F. survived both J. A. and S. A.:—Held, that she was entitled by survivorship to W. F.'s share in the fund.

By the settlement made on the marriage of Joseph Acott and Susanna Finch, dated the 16th of August 1815, a sum of 1,000*l.* Navy 5*l.* per cent. annuities was vested in John Finch, Robert Finch and William Acott, upon trust after the decease of J. Acott and Susanna Finch, and failure of issue of the marriage (which happened), to transfer, pay, apply, dispose of and retain the same sum, and all dividends, interest and proceeds thenceforth to accrue due and payable thereon, unto, amongst and between and for the benefit of themselves, the said J. Finch and R. Finch, and their brother William Finch, and their sister, Elizabeth Finch, equally to be divided between and amongst them, share and share alike; provided that, in case either of them, the said J. Finch, R. Finch, W. Finch and E. Finch, should depart this life without having acquired a vested interest in the said stocks, funds and securities, leaving lawful issue of his, her or their body or bodies, then the share or shares of him, her or them so dying of and in the said trust funds should go and accrue to such children, if more than one, in equal shares; but if only one, to such only child, such children or child respectively taking only his, her or their parent's share of and in the said trust stocks, funds and securities. But in case either of them, the said J. Finch, R. Finch, W. Finch and E. Finch, should die without having lawful issue of his, her or their body or bodies, then the shares or share of him, her or them so dying of and in the said trust stocks, &c. should go and belong unto the survivors or survivor of them, the said J. Finch, R. Finch, W. Finch and E. Finch for their, his or her own use and benefit.

Joseph Acott died on the 14th of September 1835, and Susanna Acott on the 27th of September 1858.

John Finch died on the 5th of July 1819 leaving six children, of whom three died in the lifetime of Susanna Acott.

William Finch died on the 7th of February 1827 without leaving any issue, but leaving Robert and Elizabeth Finch and also five of the children of John Finch surviving.

Robert Finch died on the 11th of July 1832, leaving five children, all of whom were still living.

The present trustees of the settlement transferred and paid the trust fund, with a dividend which had been received since Susanna Acott's death, into court, and Elizabeth Finch now presented her petition claiming to be entitled to one-half of the trust fund, that is to say, her own original one-fourth, and also the one-fourth originally given to William, on the ground that she was the survivor at the period of distribution.

The case was argued by Mr. Jessel, for the petitioner.

Mr. Wickens, for the administratrix of one of the children of John Finch.

Mr. Smart, for the children of Robert Finch, and

Mr. Osborne, for other parties.

Wood, V.C. held, that the word "survivors" applied only to such as survived the period of vesting, and the children therefore of those who died before that period could take no more than the original share of their parents. The result was, that the petitioner was entitled to one-half of the trust fund, and the residue would be divided between the children of John and Robert Finch equally per stirpes.

Practice—Company—Service of Bill.

Where a company amalgamate with another, and cease to have either officers or any place of business, the Court, upon a bill being filed, ordered the service to be made upon the late deputy-chairman and secretary, and directed that it should be good service upon the company.

The London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society was amalgamated and merged in the Eagle Life Insurance Society. The company was never formally dissolved, but the place of business was given up, and the directors, secretary and other officers ceased altogether to act. Upon a bill against the company, the late directors were made parties.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beavan, for the plaintiff.—The company has ceased to exist. In the absence of officers, the bill cannot be served in the usual manner; it is necessary, therefore, to ask the Court to direct on whom service should be made.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The bill is against the company; let the service be made upon Mr. Chambers, the late deputy-chairman, and Mr. Laundry, the late secretary. Direct that it be good service upon the company, and let this order be served with the bill.

Dec. 15, 16. } GASKELL v. CHAMBERS.

Company—Directors' fiduciary Position.

The directors of a company are trustees for the shareholders; and, therefore, where directors contracted for an amalgamation of their company with another, and, without the knowledge of the shareholders, contracted for payments to themselves of sums of money as a compensation for their prospective interest in their fees, they were, upon a bill filed by a shareholder for an account, compelled to pay such monies into court.

This was a motion, by the plaintiff,
NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

asking that the defendants, late the directors of the London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society, might pay into court divers sums of money which, by their answers, they had severally admitted to have received.

The London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society was established in London, in the year 1848; and in 1857 it was amalgamated with and merged in the Eagle Life Insurance Society.

The plaintiff was a member of the London Mutual, and he filed this bill, on behalf of himself and all the other members of the society except the defendants, against seven of the late directors, the secretary, medical officers, auditors and solicitors of the society, and against the personal representatives of a deceased director, praying for an account of all monies severally received by the deceased director and the defendants from the Eagle Insurance Company under a private agreement stated in the bill, and that they might be declared trustees thereof for the London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society; and that they might be decreed to refund the several sums, and pay them into court.

The facts admitted by the defendants in their answers were, that the London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society was established in London in 1848; that a deed of settlement was executed, by which a temporary capital of 50,000*l.* was to be advanced for working the company in the first instance, and provision was made for paying it off, and so long as any capital should exist the profits were to be divided between those persons, who were to be considered members and shareholders from having effected insurances with the company, upon the terms that they should participate in the profits, and who should have paid five yearly premiums, in the proportions of one-sixth to the former and five-sixths to the latter, in proportion to the value of their respective policies; and as soon as the shareholders should be repaid their capital, then the members insured were to be entitled to the whole of the profits. The deed also authorized an extraordinary meeting to sell any portion of the business of the company to any other company.

The board of directors comprised a chairman, deputy-chairman and six other directors, all of whom were remunerated by fees, but the chairman and deputy-chairman received a larger sum than the other directors. Business was commenced by the company in November 1849; one-tenth only of the capital was raised, and that, it was alleged, had since been paid off, so that the entire profits then became divisible among the members only.

On the 23rd of January 1853 the plaintiff assured his life with the society for 499*l.* 19*s.*, on the terms that he was to participate in the profits.

From the reports made by the directors from time to time, it appeared that the business of the company increased steadily, and was profitable to the end of the year 1856, at which time it was ascertained that the business of the year had increased by 50 per cent., so much so that the year ending in December 1856 was found to be one of great prosperity. In the year 1857 the directors, as they alleged, considered that the prospects of the younger mutual assurance offices were not encouraging, consequent on the depression of trade and the great competition amongst the offices then recently established for business; and being influenced by the retirement of one of the directors of the company, which had been detrimental to its interests, they entered into negotiations with the Eagle Insurance Company, with a view to the sale of their business and assets to that company; in August 1857 the terms of amalgamation agreed upon were, that the Eagle should give to those policyholders in the London Mutual who had received profits the bonuses already added to their policies, and a reversionary bonus of 40*l.* per cent. on the amount of premiums paid by them since the last division of profits, and should also give a like reversionary bonus of 40*l.* per cent. upon the premiums paid by all policyholders assured for the whole term of life, who had not then participated in the profits, and should give to all the assured an equal participation in every future quinquennial division of profits with the assured in the Eagle; and should guarantee that, as far as the assured in the London Mutual were concerned, such future bonuses should never be less than 30*l.* per cent. The directors, the defendants, stated in their answer that these were alone and exclusively the considerations given, or intended to be given, to the London Mutual for the transfer of the company's business and policies to the Eagle.

While the negotiations between the two offices were proceeding, the Eagle proposed to appoint four of the directors of the London Mutual to be trustees of the Eagle, with a salary to each of 50*l.* per annum, and that as opportunities offered they should be appointed directors with a director's allowance of upwards of 100*l.* per annum, and that the chairman, deputy-chairman and two remaining directors should receive from the Eagle compensation for the loss of their fees, calculated with reference to the average amount of fees received by them as directors, and that the chairman in consideration of services to be rendered to the Eagle should receive an annuity. It was also proposed that the solicitor, medical officers, secretary or actuary, auditors and two of the principal clerks and the messenger should receive compensation. The four annuities proposed to be given to the four directors who were to be made trustees, were valued, according to the ages of the parties, at from 2,200*l.* to 2,600*l.*; these sums the Eagle proposed to pay to them instead of the salaries; but ultimately the form in which the compensation was to be given to the directors was agreed upon as follows, that the four directors to be appointed trustees were to act without salary, and were to be eligible to become directors of the Eagle, and that 4,000*l.* should be distributed by the Eagle amongst the directors other than the chairman, and that he should receive in lieu of compensation and for services to be rendered to the Eagle an annuity of 130*l.* a year for life.

The directors alleged, that before these terms were finally agreed upon, they inquired of Mr. Jones, one of the actuaries employed about the amalgamation, and ascertained that the bonus to be paid to the policyholders of the London Mutual would not be affected in any degree by the compensation to be given to the directors and other officers, and that the proposed bonus was according to the actual value set upon the policies, and that it was the highest which could be given under any circumstances.

On the 19th of August 1857, an agreement embodying the terms of amalgamation between the two offices was drawn up. Article 5. was, that the Eagle should pay to the several persons whose names were mentioned in the memorandum or schedule signed by the parties to that agreement, who were the directors and other officers of the company, by way of compensation for any loss sustained by them by reason of the sale or transfer of the business, contracts, assets, &c. of the London Mutual to the Eagle, the respective annual or other sums set opposite to their names in such memorandum or schedule at the time therein mentioned.

Article 6. was, that four of the directors of the London Mutual should be appointed trustees of the Eagle.

On the 29th of August 1857, the directors of the London Mutual issued a circular to the policy-holders, informing them that they had made a conditional arrangement with the Eagle for amalgamation, on the terms as regarded the policy-holders before stated, and that to secure the interests of the members the Eagle had agreed to appoint four of the directors trustees, with a view to their being appointed directors as vacancies occurred. There was no mention of any arrangement that compensation was to be made to the directors and other officers of the company.

The policy-holders were requested to sign a letter sent with the circular, assenting to or dissenting from the proposed amalgamation. Seventeen hundred members returned the letters assenting to the arrangement. Seven members only returned letters of dissent.

The directors of the London Mutual immediately convened an extraordinary meeting to be held on the 24th of September 1857, to confirm the agreement, and to authorize the sale of any part of their business to the Eagle. This meeting was attended by a large number of members, and, with one dissentient, they passed a resolution, authorizing the directors to carry the agreement into effect, which had accordingly been done.

The sum of 571*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* was paid to each of the seven directors, and the annuity of 130*l.* per annum which was to be paid to G. Wilson, the chairman, since deceased, was valued at 1,000*l.*, and this sum was paid to him. Sums of money were also paid to the secretary, the two medical officers, the two auditors, and the two solicitors.

The directors, by their answer, stated that they believed many of the members present at the meeting to be aware that the agreement contained provisions giving compensation to the directors, and that it was the custom on the amalgamation of two companies for the directors and officers of the retiring company to receive compensation; and, consequently, that they did not think it necessary to direct the attention of the members specially to the agreement. They denied, however, that they had concealed the facts of such agreement. They also said that the chairman at such meeting had stated that the agreement was in the hands of the solicitor, who was sitting next to him, and that he asked the meeting if they desired that it should be read, and that the answer was in the negative; that a question was put by one of the members, whether the officers of the company had been properly taken care of in the arrangement; and that the deputy-chairman, in answer, said that all persons connected with the office were to be liberally compensated; that another member wished to know the particulars of such compensation; but that another member suggested that such a question was uncourteous to the board, and that it was unnecessary, unless members were dissatisfied with the terms which had been made on their own behalf in the amalgamation of the companies.

The directors of the London Mutual also stated that they believed the plaintiff was aware of the arrangement proposed and carried into effect, though he was not present at the meeting.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beavan, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff asks that the defendants may pay the sums severally received by them into court. They were the trustees of the London Mutual Society, and, as such, they could never be allowed to derive personal advantage from their position. This Court would never permit trustees to deal for their own advantage behind the backs of their cestuis que trust. The answers admitted that they had received sums of money, and that they had not applied them for the benefit of the members; but this money was affected with a trust for the benefit of all the persons interested in the society. It was received in consequence of their position as trustees: it was received while they were acting for their cestuis que trust, and in that position they could not make any contract for their own individual advantage. If it were otherwise, a trustee might as well stipulate for an advantage to himself while contracting for the sale of an estate he was intrusted to dispose of.—

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the defendants.—The plaintiff was seeking to establish an equity upon several sums of money paid to the directors and other officers of the company. He had not made out any prima facie right sufficient to support the suit; so long, therefore, as the title of the plaintiff was doubtful, his Honour would not order the money into court; and even if it were in court no order would be made to transfer it to the credit of a cause in court. If the plaintiff considered the admissions sufficient to entitle him to a decree, he could set the cause down on the bill and answer. This money was impressed with no trust, to enable the Court to take possession of it.—

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—After reading the answer of the directors, I do not find that it contains more than was stated by counsel during the argument; and assuming all the statements contained in it to be true, taking them at the same time most unfavourably to the pleader, I am of opinion that these defendants are trustees of the fund received by them, and that they must pay the amount into court. I am also of opinion that they are trustees for the plaintiff, and for those on whose behalf he sues. The answer clearly admits that each of the directors has been paid a sum of 571*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* I have no desire to go into the details or to prejudice the hearing, since it may, as stated, be possible that when the evidence is given a different complexion may be given to the transaction; but as the case stands on the answer, I must order the directors to pay the money into court.

Production of Documents—Company—Solicitor—Privilege.

If a solicitor, party to a suit, admits by his answer the custody of papers relating to a company, he will, if the directors and the company are before the Court, be compelled to produce them, notwithstanding, by their answers, the directors say that the papers are in the hands of a third party, and the solicitor says that he has the documents, but that in his hands they are privileged.

The plaintiff filed the bill in this suit, on behalf of himself and the other shareholders of the London Mutual Life and Guarantee Society, against the directors, the secretary, medical officers, auditors and solicitors of the company, praying for an account of all monies received by them.

The business of the London Mutual had been practically merged in and amalgamated with the Eagle Insurance Company, and the latter company had, in divers sums, paid to the directors and other officers of the London Mutual sums amounting to about 4,000*l.*, which this suit now sought to recover for the benefit of the shareholders.

The directors, by their answer, said that certain papers, &c. were in the possession of the defendant Charles Shephard, as one of the solicitors of the society.

Joseph M. Yetts, another solicitor of the society, by his answer, said that he had in his possession certain other documents, as solicitor of the directors, and he insisted that they were privileged. These documents were not mentioned in the answer of the directors.

A summons was then taken out, by the plaintiff, against the directors, and against J. M. Yetts, for the production of all the documents.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS directed that the society should be served with notice of the application. This was done accordingly, but the company did not appear.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Beavan, for the plaintiff, now moved for production, on the ground that the parties interested in the papers, and the party holding them, were both before the Court.—

In re the Cameron's Coalbrook, &c. Railway Company, 25 Beav. 1.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the directors, offered no objection to the production of the papers, but asked for the costs of the adjournment of the summons into court, on grounds which it is not necessary to state—Murray v. Walter (1).

Mr. Lloyd, for the defendant J. M. Yetts.—No order for production can be made against a solicitor. Such an order could only proceed on the admissions in the answer of the clients, and certainly not upon the answer of the solicitor. He only held the papers for the clients, and he had been improperly brought before the Court.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered that as the parties interested and the parties holding the papers were before the Court, the documents ought to be produced.

STUART, V.C. } LLOYD AND OTHERS v.
Dec. 15. } EAGLE.

Assignment—Pension of retired Government Officer—Insolvent—Injunction.

The defendant, a retired storekeeper of one of Her Majesty's dockyards, entitled to payment from the Treasury of a pension or superannuation allowance of 155*l.* a year, assigned such pension to the plaintiffs, to secure a loan of money. The defendant afterwards became insolvent, and included the debt due upon the plaintiffs' security in his schedule of debts. The Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court, by his order, made in the presence of counsel for the plaintiffs, recommended that 50*l.* a year, part of the insolvent's pension, should be paid by the Paymaster-general to the provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court, for the benefit of the general creditors of the insolvent. The plaintiffs declined to prove as creditors under the insolvency; but, having filed their bill, moved in this Court for an injunction to restrain the defendant from applying for, or receiving, or enabling any other person to receive the balance of his pension left after the appropriation of the annual sum recommended by the Commissioner. Ordered accordingly.

William Eagle, a retired storekeeper in the Ordnance department, and grantee of a pension or superannuation allowance of 155*l.* a year by Her Majesty, payable under the warrant of the Commissioners of the Treasury, by deed dated in February 1857, assigned the said pension to the Indisputable Life Policy Company, to secure a sum of 100*l.*, advanced to him by way of loan. The deed provided that, on payment of the said debt of 100*l.* by instalments of 25*l.* a year, with interest as therein mentioned, the company would not proceed to enforce a covenant on the part of the said W. Eagle for payment of the said principal sum and interest. The deed likewise provided, that in case default should be made in payment of any or either of the said instalments or interest, it should be lawful for, but not imperative upon, the said company to receive from the Paymaster-general the said pension of 155*l.*, and thereout to retain the said instalments or interest, and pay the surplus of such pension to the said W. Eagle. And W. Eagle thereby appointed Alexander Robertson, or other the manager for the time being of the company, his attorney to receive the said pension.

In September 1857 the business of the London Indisputable Life Policy Society was transferred to the Eagle Insurance Company, whereby W. Eagle's above-mentioned debt and security became vested in the latter company.

W. Eagle made default in payment of the instalment and interest which became payable in February 1858, whereupon the Eagle Insurance Company applied to the Paymaster-general to be allowed to receive the pension under the provisions of the indenture of the 8th of February 1857; but to this application the Paymaster-general declined to accede, on the ground that he could not properly be called upon to determine whether default in payment of the principal and interest had been made by W. Eagle.

In October 1858 W. Eagle, being then in prison under an arrest for debt, filed his petition in the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England; whereupon a vesting order was made in the November following, and the Chief Commissioner of the Court, by his order, made in the matter of the insolvency, recommended that a sum of 50*l.* a year, part of the above-mentioned pension, should be paid by the Paymaster-general to the provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court, for the benefit of the insolvent's creditors generally, and directed that a communication to that effect should be made to the Paymaster-general.

The plaintiffs, representing the Eagle Insurance Company, then filed the bill in this suit, praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant, William Eagle, from applying for, obtaining or receiving the above-mentioned pension or superannuation allowance, or the balance thereof after payment to the provisional assignee of the said sum of 50*l.* a year, as above mentioned, or empowering or enabling any person other than the plaintiffs to receive the same respectively, so long as any money remained due to the plaintiffs on the security of the said indenture of February 1857.

The bill alleged that the plaintiffs had not proved, and did not intend to prove their claim under the insolvency against the estate of the defendant, but that they did not object to the appropriation of the portion of the pension recommended by the Chief Commissioner for the general creditors of the insolvent.

The provisional assignee of the Insolvent Debtors Court was not made a party to the bill.

Mr. J. N. Higgins now appeared in support of a motion for an injunction in the terms of the prayer of the bill, and referred to—

s.c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 294.

Knight v. Bulkeley, 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 592.

Mr. Hislop Clarke, for the defendant, said that the debt claimed by the plaintiffs was amongst those entered by the insolvent in his schedule, and that the Commissioner, a Court of competent jurisdiction, had, at the hearing, and in the presence of the plaintiffs' counsel, made an order providing for the payment of all the debts included in such schedule. He submitted, therefore, that the plaintiffs, as they had offered no opposition to the order made by the Commissioner, were estopped by that order from making any further claim upon the defendant's pension.

STUART, V.C. observed that the defendant could not be allowed to violate the contract made by him with the plaintiffs, and made an order for an injunction to restrain the defendant, William Eagle, from receiving the balance of the pension in the pleadings mentioned, which should be left after payment to the provisional assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, of the said sum as in the pleadings mentioned.

The costs to be costs in the cause.

Jan. 27, 28. } MASON v. BATESON.

Legacy — Indefinite Class — Blanks in Will.

A legacy to a class not definitively fixed will be carried into effect so far as the objects can be ascertained, but blanks in a will cannot be filled up, though the testator apparently contemplated an extension of the class.

Joseph Warhurst, by his will, dated the 15th of November 1832, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to Richard Bateson and Robert Gill, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust to pay to his sister Rebecca Mason the annual sum of 20*l.* during her natural life, and, subject thereto, upon trust to pay the annual income to his daughter Ede for her life, and after her decease he directed that the whole of his real and personal estate should be in trust for the children and child of his daughter as tenants in common, and their respective heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with benefit of survivorship. The will also contained a provision for the maintenance of them, and proceeded as follows:—"And I hereby direct, that in case my daughter shall die without leaving lawful issue her surviving, or leaving such issue, all of whom shall die under the age of twenty-one years, then the whole of my real and personal estate and effects shall so remain and be in trust for all and every my nephews and nieces, the sons and daughters of my sister Rebecca Mason, including — who — the — illegitimate — of the said Rebecca Mason, equally to be divided between and amongst them, share and share alike as tenants in common, and their, his or her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns." The testator appointed his trustees executors of his will.

The testator died on the 16th of March 1833. His residuary estate consisted of 6,793*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, which had been invested upon mortgage, and a copyhold estate, which was let at 138*l.* a year.

The testator's daughter Ede was born in the year 1812. In the year 1844 she intermarried with Horatio John Webster.

She was still living, but had never had any children or child.

On the 15th of February 1807, Rebecca Warhurst, the testator's sister, intermarried with Thomas Mason. She had five children — viz. first, the plaintiff Harriet Sorby, born 1798, now the wife of the plaintiff, Charles Sorby; second, the plaintiff Sarah Burgin, born 1801, now the widow of Thomas Burgin; third, the plaintiff John Monsford Mason, born 1805; fourth, Hannah, born in 1813, now the wife of Samuel Bagshaw; and fifth, Harry Mason, born 1815, who died in January 1854, intestate, leaving a widow and children, but no letters of administration had been taken out to his estate and effects.

The testator's sister Rebecca died in November 1857.

The bill was filed, by the three eldest children of Rebecca Mason, alleging that they were within the words of the will, and praying that, subject to the life estate of the testator's daughter, and the contingent interest to her children, they, the plaintiffs, might be declared entitled to three equal fifth parts of the residuary real and personal estate of Joseph Warhurst, and that the trusts of the will might be carried into effect.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Busk, for the plaintiffs.—The will shews the intention of the testator; it also demonstrates the persons whose names were intended to fill up the blanks. Extrinsic evidence therefore may be given to shew the circumstances under which the will was made, and why the blanks were left. The words "all and every my nephews and nieces, the sons and daughters of my sister," clearly referred to a class, and the word "illegitimate" extended it to those who otherwise would not be included. That word must receive a construction; it could not be rejected: had there been illegitimate children only, they must have taken.

Mr. T. Stevens, for Mr. and Mrs. Bagshaw, declined to offer any opposition to the prayer of the bill.

Mr. Selwyn, for Mr. and Mrs. Webster, as next-of-kin of the testator.—The class entitled ought to be ascertained at the death of the testator. The bequest must be confined within some limit; it was evident that the testator did not mean that all the children of the sister should take; there was nothing from which it could be collected whether the testator intended to fill the blanks in with the word, "is" or "are," or whether it was to be confined to the two eldest or two youngest illegitimate children, or whether he preferred the girls to the boy. The plaintiffs had not made out their claim; the estate, therefore, ought not to be burthened with the costs: on the contrary, the plaintiffs ought to be made to pay the costs of the suit.—

Doe d. Gord v. Needs, 2 Mee. & W. 129; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 59.

Mr. Follett and Mr. C. Hall, for the trustees, as representing the widow and children of Henry Mason, deceased (1).—The gift was complete so far as the legitimate children were concerned; it was, however, incomplete as to the illegitimate children; something further was intended, and as there were no means of filling up the blanks, they must be rejected.—

Illingworth v. Cooke, 9 Hare, 37; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 512.

Mr. Palmer, in reply.—The Court was bound to consider the generality of the gift, the intention of the testator, and to construe the words he had used; none were to be rejected, if there were means to construe them.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot give any effect to the gift to the illegitimate children. The blanks may be filled in either in the singular or plural number; they may be supplied either with the name of a son or a daughter; and whichever way they were filled in, still it would apparently give effect to the will. There appeared, however, but little doubt that the testator left the blanks to be filled in upon facts to be subsequently obtained. The words "all and every" are general, and seem to create a difficulty and doubt, but that must mean all the legitimate children born, and to be born, as well those who were living as those who were dead. If, however, I filled in the blanks, I should be making a will for the testator. I will read the will before finally deciding.

Jan. 28.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It seems very clear that the testator meant the blanks to be filled up on information to be subsequently ascertained; I must, therefore, consider the gift void altogether in favour of the illegitimate children; I also think that the next-of-kin have no interest in the fund. I shall, therefore, dismiss the bill, without costs, and direct the trustees to be paid their costs as between solicitor and client, out of the fund. The costs of the other defendants must also be paid out of the fund.

WOOD, V.C. } THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. WILKINSON.
Feb. 21; Mar. 2. }

Poor—Judgment Creditor—Execution against—Property of the Union—Money in the Hands of the Treasurer—Extraordinary Charges.

Semble—The real and personal property vested in the guardians of a union for the general benefit of the parishes in the union are liable to the debts of judgment creditors.

But money raised by rates for the relief of the poor is impressed with a definite trust, and as it would be a breach of trust to apply such money in the discharge of outstanding debts, a creditor who has obtained judgment in respect of a debt incurred prior to the year for which the rate was raised will be restrained from levying execution against the money so raised.

Whether a judgment creditor of the existing year can levy execution against such money—quære.

This was a demurrer to an information and bill filed, on the part of the Attorney General and by the guardians of the poor of the City of London Union, against a judgment creditor of the board of guardians, and also against the sheriff of London and Middlesex, praying that it might be declared that the lands and hereditaments, and the goods and chattels in and about the union workhouse and premises were held by the plaintiffs, in trust for and on behalf of the union, and that the same were not liable to satisfy the claims of the creditor under his judgment, and that the defendants respectively might be restrained from levying writs of fi. fa. and elegit, and levying execution against the goods, chattels, lands, hereditaments, monies or property of the said board.

The City of London Union consisted of ninety-eight parishes, and Charles Guerino Manini was the collector of rates for nine parishes within the union. In December 1856, Manini and one John Paul, the assistant clerk of the board, absconded, and it was then discovered that they had embezzled upwards of 24,000*l.*, and the result was, that at Christmas 1856 the board found themselves indebted in this amount to various tradesmen and to the treasurer of the union. In order to discharge these debts, and to make provision for the current expenses of the ensuing half-year, the board sought to raise a sum of 61,000*l.*; and, accordingly, on the 17th of February 1857, they made orders upon the overseers of every parish in the union, for the payment of certain sums of money towards the relief of the poor of the parish, and for the contribution of the parish to the common fund of the union, and for such other expenses as were chargeable by the guardians on the said parish; and in the estimate upon which the orders were founded the clerk of the union had included, as extraordinary charges to which the union would be liable in the ensuing half-year, the amount of the outstanding debts.

The validity of these orders was disputed by many parishes, on the ground that the rate so sought to be raised was retrospective, inasmuch as several of the debts intended to be discharged out of it had been accruing for several years previously to the 17th of February 1857, and on the 4th of May 1857, the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Stephen, Coleman Street, obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench a rule nisi, to bring up the order which had been made upon them, for the payment of

2,800*l.*, the apportioned share of that parish of the 61,000*l.*; and thereupon a special case was directed to be and was stated for the opinion of the Court; the questions being, first, whether the call or order of the 17th of February 1857, was valid and enforceable for the whole, or for any and what portion of the 2,800*l.*; and, secondly, whether the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of St. Stephen, Coleman Street, were liable and bound in law to pay any and what portion of the said sum of 2,800*l.* The Court of Queen's Bench decided in favour of the board of guardians; but this decision was reversed, on appeal, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which decided both questions in the negative (1).

Pending the appeal, the defendant, Josiah Wilkinson, commenced an action in the Court of Queen's Bench against the guardians of the union, to recover 1,031*l.*, the amount of one of the outstanding debts of the union, and on the 17th of January 1859 signed judgment for the debt, interest and costs, and was now about to sue out writs of fi. fa. and elegit against the personal and real property of the board of guardians.

The proper authorities of the parishes comprised in the union paid up to the board, in the course of the litigation, about one-half of the several sums of money which, by the orders of the 17th of February 1857, they were required to pay, and out of these monies the ordinary expenses of the union had been paid, but the board of guardians had not now in their possession or power any monies which could be legally applied to the payment of the outstanding debt.

The bill stated, that the board of guardians had no property against which these writs could be executed, except the goods and chattels in and about the union workhouse and the board-room and offices of the union, and the monies for the time being in the hands of the treasurer; and it was submitted that the board of guardians were only trustees of the property for the benefit of the union. It was further alleged, that the monies levied under the authority of the board of guardians from the several parishes comprised in the union, were paid by the proper officers to the treasurer of the union, in whose hands there was frequently a large sum of money applicable by law to the relief and sustenance of the poor for the time being within the union, which monies in the hands of such treasurer were at law the property of the board; and the defendant Wilkinson threatened and intended, by attachment or otherwise, to seize and appropriate such monies in or towards satisfaction of his judgment debt.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Speed, in support of the demurrer, referred to art. 81. of the Consolidated Poor Law Order (1847), 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 69. s. 3, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 25, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 4, and contended that this was an extraordinary charge, to which the ratepayers were liable to contribute under the 81st article of the Consolidated Order (2). The debts were bond fide contracted, and the guardians were at liberty to sell the property of the union, in order to provide payment of them.

Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Fischer (with Mr. Roll), in support of the information.—It would be a breach of trust to apply the property of the union in payment of these debts—The Attorney General v. Compton (3). It has been settled by the decision in the Exchequer Chamber, that the parishes other than those for which Manini was collector are not liable for the debt; and to allow execution to be issued, would be to overrule that decision.—

(2) By the 81st article it is ordered that "the clerk of each union shall, four weeks at least before the 25th of March and 29th of September respectively, in each year, ascertain the cost to each parish in the union for the maintenance of the poor, and other separate charges, as well as for the common charges incurred in the half of the last year, corresponding to the half-year next coming, and shall estimate, and as near as may be divide among the parishes any extraordinary charges to which the union may be liable in the coming half-year, and shall then prepare the orders on the several parishes for the sums which, upon such computation, it shall appear necessary for them to contribute to the expenses of the union for the coming half-year."

Mr. Greene, for the sheriffs.

Mr. Bovill and Mr. Watkin Williams watched the case on behalf of the parish of St. Stephen, Coleman Street.

Mr. Daniel replied.

Wood, V.C.—A difficulty arises in this case from the demurrer embracing a variety of subjects, the principal difficulty being as to the money in the hands of the treasurer of the union. I do not feel so much difficulty upon the other parts of the case. It appears to me that when those who have property vested in them for their cestuis que trust, and having power to contract for those cestuis que trust do enter into contracts, there is nothing in principle to lead this Court to say, that they having that power, and having express power to sell the property for the purpose of satisfying and discharging the debts, there should not be execution upon the property. But the difficulty in this case, which I do not see my way to overcome, arises from the present state of the law as laid down by the Exchequer Chamber with regard to money in the hands of the treasurer; because the land and other property of the union, with the exception of these monies, is vested in them absolutely as part of the union property for the general benefit of the parishes, without any definite application being impressed upon any portion of that property beyond its being for the benefit of those parishes, and subject to their debts and capable of being sold for those debts. But when we come to deal with the monies, they are paid into the hands of the treasurer of the union for a specific purpose under the act. The monies are contributed by the parishes upon these terms, and upon these terms only: they are asked for and received as being monies for the poor-rates of the parish, to be contributed towards the relief of the poor thereof, and as the contri—bution of the parish to the common fund of the union for the purpose of defraying such expenses as are chargeable on the guardians of the parish. For those purposes, and for those purposes alone, are they placed in the hands of the union. There is a definite set of objects, therefore, impressed upon these monies, and accordingly there would be a right on the part of the ratepayers, at the suit of the Attorney General, to come here to restrain any improper application of the fund. Now, what is the result of the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber? It is that by no possibility can any funds now coming into the hands of the treasurer from rates be applied towards the payment of debts, and that a rate made for that purpose is illegal. I presume that these gentlemen will act legally, and that they will only call for funds which they can legally receive for definite purposes, and as they cannot call for money for the purpose of paying the defendant, the money cannot be, when in their hands, applicable for that purpose, which is neither for the relief of the poor nor for a contribution to the common fund for the purpose of paying such casual and other expenses as are chargeable by the guardians of the parish. That makes an end of the case, for the Court of Exchequer Chamber says it is not an expense chargeable on the parish. It is true there are strange words with reference to extraordinary expenses on which a good deal of argument was founded, which prevailed in the Court of Queen's Bench; but the Court of Exchequer Chamber has said that this debt is not to be paid out of any rate now to be raised. The averment in the 12th paragraph of the bill is, that "the overseers or other proper authorities of the said several parishes comprised in the said union paid up to the said board of guardians in the course of the aforesaid litigation, about one-half of the several sums of money which, by the said orders of the 17th of February 1857, they were respectively required to pay, and by and out of such monies the ordinary expenses of the said union had been duly paid and kept down, but the said board of guardians had not then in their possession or power any monies which could be legally applied to the payment of the aforesaid outstanding debts and liabilities of the said union." And the 19th paragraph states, that "the monies levied under the authority of the said board of guardians from the several parishes comprised in the said union are paid by the proper officers of such parishes to the treasurer of the said union, in whose hands there is frequently a large sum of money applicable by law to the relief and maintenance of the poor for the time being within the union, which monies in the hands of such treasurer are at law the property of the board of guardians, and the said defendant, J. Wilkinson, threatens and intends, by attachment or otherwise, to seize and appropriate such monies in or towards the satisfaction of his said judgment debt." That seems to me to amount to an averment that out of those monies coming to their hands by rate which cannot be applicable to this particular debt, according to the decision of the Court of common law, the execution will have the effect of paying that debt to which, according to that decision, the money is not applicable. In other words, it would be a breach of trust. It would be as plain and explicit a breach of trust to pay this debt out of monies which cannot be so applied, as it would be to pay any other debt or demand to which the monies paid in by the several parishes are not properly by law to be applied. I think it is a very lamentable state of things that these creditors should remain unpaid; and if the state of the law be such that they remain unpaid, the probable result will be that no one will ever supply the union except for ready money. I am by no means certain that any creditor of the existing year could not take out execution, if he were alert enough to obtain a judgment for a debt of the year. Probably, if ever it should become necessary to determine that question, it would be held that he might take out execution for that; but it appears to me, looking at the existing state of things and this demurrer extending to the whole bill, whatever may be the result if it is further proceeded with, I cannot hold that this is property in the hands of the treasurer which can be applied to the payment of the defendant's debt. The demurrer, therefore, must be overruled.

March 2.—Upon motion made for an injunction according to the prayer of the bill, the following order was made:—"The defendant, J. Wilkinson, undertaking not to issue an elegit without leave of the Court, restrain him from levying upon the money in the hands of the treasurer or upon any goods purchased since the 25th of March 1858, with liberty to apply in case the parties differ with reference to such last-mentioned goods.

July 6, 8, 9, 13, 16. } WHICKER v. HUME.

Will—Domicil—Mortmain Act—Colonial Law.

G. was born in Scotland, and went when quite a young man to India, where he entered into the service of the East India Company. After being there more than twenty years, he returned to Scotland. He took a house and married in Edinburgh. He afterwards became offended with the people there, and using very strong expressions as to his intention never to return there, he came to London. He brought his books and his property to London, and lived in London for some years, and engaged in various occupations. He then left London and went to Paris, but left his books, some ornamental furniture, and other things in London, telling the persons with whom he left them to keep them until his return. He lived in Paris for some years, made his will there, made it in the English form, but described himself in it as "of Edinburgh"; and he died in Paris:—Held, that he had lost his domicil of origin, which was Scotch, and had acquired, and never lost, an English domicil.

In his will he gave property to trustees, to appropriate the same as they in their "uncontrouled discretion should think proper for the benefit, advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world":—Held, that the will was valid, and that there was a valid bequest of a charitable nature which was not void for uncertainty.

The testator had lands in New South Wales, which were to form part of the property given to trustees for the purposes of the charity:—Held, that these lands would pass, and that the Mortmain Act was not applicable to New South Wales.

The questions in this case arose upon the will and codicil of Dr. John Borthwick Gilchrist, made at Paris, on the 8th of December 1840, in the English form, and executed and attested to pass freehold estates in New South Wales, which were devised by the will, but not so executed as to pass heritable property in Scotland, which was also included in it.

By the will, the testator, after giving his household furniture and other things to his wife, proceeds:—"And as to and for and concerning my estate, commonly called 'Gilchrist Place,' situate at or near Sydney, in New South Wales, and my house or flat in Hunter Square, Edinburgh, with their respective appurtenances, and also all the rest and residue of my real estate and hereditaments whatsoever and wheresoever; and also as to all the rest and residue of my personal estate and effects of what nature or kind soever, I devise and bequeath the same unto and to the use of Joseph Hume, of Bryanstone Square, in the county of Middlesex, esq., M.P., Charles Holland, of Queen Street, May Fair, in the same county, Esq., M.D., John M'Gregor, Esq., one of the Secretaries of the Board of Trade, John Bowring, of London, Esq., Doctor of Laws, and Robert Verity, of the city of Paris, Esq., M.D., Physician to the British Embassy, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the natures and qualities thereof respectively, upon trust," that they should sell and convert into money all the residuary personal estate, not being ready money, and also absolutely sell and dispose of the real estate and hereditaments. The will then declared that the trustees should stand possessed of "the said trust money, stocks, funds and securities," upon trust, out of the annual produce thereof, to pay an annuity to his wife and various legacies. And it then proceeded, "And as to and for as concerning all the residue or surplus of the said trust monies, stocks, funds and securities, I direct that the trustees for the time being of this my will, do and shall stand possessed thereof, upon and for such trusts, intents and purposes, and with;

under and subject to such powers, provisions and declarations as I by my codicil or codicils hereto shall direct, limit or appoint."

Then, by a codicil which he made on the same day, he directed and appointed that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said will, "Do and shall stand possessed of and interested in the residue or surplus of the trust monies, stocks, funds and securities thereby to them bequeathed in trust, upon trust to apply and appropriate the same in such manner as they, my said trustees or trustee, shall in their absolute and uncontrouled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, as far as circumstances will permit."

The testator was born in Scotland, went to the East Indies, returned to London, where he lived for some time, and had all his books and furniture; then, leaving them here, went to Paris, where he continued for some years, and made a will in the English form (describing himself, however, as "of Edinburgh"), and died in Paris.

The evidence as to change of domicile, on the question as to what was his domicile at the time of his death, was very voluminous, and is substantially set forth in the report of the case when it was first heard before the Master of the Rolls (1). His Honour decided that the testator's domicile of origin in Scotland had been lost, that he had acquired an English domicile, and had such domicile when he executed the will and codicil, and that the will was valid.

The case was taken, by appeal, before the Lords Justices (Lord Justice Knight Bruce and Lord Cranworth), who affirmed the decision, and held that the words "education and learning" in the will were to be read "education in learning," and that there was a good charitable bequest. They also held, that the 9 Geo. 4. c. 83, which provides that all laws and statutes of the realm shall be enforced in the administration of justice in the colonies so far as the same can be applied, means "reasonably applied" (2), and that the statute 9 Geo. 2.

c. 36. (the Mortmain Act) is inapplicable to lands in New South Wales (3). This was an appeal against both decisions.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Greene, Mr. W. Morris and Mr. Springall Thomson appeared for the appellant.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Bagshawe were for the respondent.

Horde v. the Earl of Suffolk, 2 Myl. & K. 59.

The Solicitor General was heard, on behalf of the Crown, to maintain that the testator lost his Scotch, and acquired an English domicile, which he ever afterwards retained, and that the will was valid.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the judgment of the House.—The will in this case was, though made at Paris, executed in the English form, so that it would pass real estate in New South Wales, but not heritable property in Scotland, though some property of that kind was included in it. The property was given to several eminent persons as trustees, “upon trust to apply and appropriate the same in such manner as they shall in their absolute and uncontrouled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, as far as circumstances will permit.” Upon the argument at the bar three main questions were raised: first, what was the domicile of the testator; secondly, whether the Mortmain Statute, 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, applied to lands in New South Wales; and, thirdly, whether the devise constituted a true charitable bequest. The first question was disposed of by the fact, that the Ecclesiastical Court had granted probate of the will as that of an English will; and against that decision there had not been any appeal—Douglas v. Cooper (4). But though the will itself was thus established, the question of the testator's domicile at the time of his death was, with reference to other matters, still open to discussion. By birth a Scotchman, he went to India in 1782 and remained until 1804, having there acquired what was called an Anglo-Indian domicile. In 1804 he returned to this country and went to Scotland, where, in 1808, he married; he quitted Scotland in 1817, never permanently to return. At first he established himself in London, with the especial purpose of selling his Oriental works. As one of the means of doing this, he obtained employment from the East India Company as a professor of the Hindostanee language. From 1817 to 1828 he resided in London, partly in houses taken on short leases, and partly as tenant at will, making during the time several excursions to the Continent. In 1828 he went abroad, and resided abroad until 1831. He returned to London for a short time, again went abroad, and returned to London in 1833. In that year he set up a newspaper, which failed, and in 1834 he went abroad, where he lived to the period of his death, but returned occasionally to London, especially in the years 1839 and 1840. He lost his Scotch domicile or domicile of origin in 1817. Did he then acquire a domicile in England? There seemed little doubt that he did. His books and papers were here; the great object of his life was to sell them and to extend the study of the Oriental languages, on which they treated, and his residence abroad was travelling, for his home was here. He did not lose that domicile, and he did not acquire another, for a domicile could only be acquired animo et facto; and there was here no evidence of the animus to change the English domicile for a foreign one. He certainly took apartments in Paris upon a three, six or nine years' lease, determinable after the first year's occupation on a six months' notice, but still he did not manifest an intention of abandoning the domicile he had acquired here. On the contrary, besides leaving his books and papers here, he left also a handsome ornamental clock and some pictures, which a friend was to keep for him till his "return." All the evidence shewed that he did not intend to acquire a French domicile. Now, he had lost his Scotch and had acquired an English domicile. As he shewed no real intention to acquire a French one, he must have retained that which he had acquired here. Then came the question as to the Mortmain Laws. These laws did not appear to apply to colonies—The Attorney-General v. Stewart; and though that case was decided with reference to a conquered colony, and New South Wales was a planted colony, yet the reasoning of Sir W. Grant in that case appeared to apply equally to both kinds of colonies. But even if that were not so, and the question should be required to be determined on this, whether the Mortmain Laws were by that statute applicable to the colony of New South Wales, he was prepared to answer that question in the negative. The 9 Geo. 4. c. 83. s. 24. did not get rid of the difficulty, for that statute did not leave it doubtful what were the general laws under which the people of New South Wales were living, since so to leave it would have been a great public mischief, but applied only to the laws regulating the administration of justice, as to the applicability of which the Courts of the colony were to decide as occasion required. Then came the last question, whether this was a good charitable bequest. The great difficulty in this case arose from the introduction of the words "and learning" after the word "education," the word "learning" being one of very extensive signification, and "learning" being capable of being benefited in various ways which would not be charitable; so that, if this bequest could be brought within any such case, it would be invalid. But that argument was a begging of the question, for it first assumed a meaning for a word more extensive than it was shewn generally to bear, and then assumed a consequence as the result of the assumed meaning. If there were two meanings capable of being applied to a word which was used by a testator, that which would effectuate, not that which would defeat, his evident intention was to be preferred. Here there was enough to say that the word "learning" had the meaning of imparting knowledge by instruction or teaching, and if so, then "learning" and "education" must be treated as mere repetitions the one of the other. Then it was objected that the bequest was too general, as it extended over the whole habitable world, but to that objection the principle stated in the case of The United States v. Drummond afforded an answer. There a bequest to found an "institution for the increase of knowledge among men" was held valid, and that was certainly as extensive a bequest as the one contained in this will. Upon the whole, therefore, he thought that the decree ought to be affirmed, and affirmed with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that his noble and learned friend had gone so fully into the case that he should feel himself called on to make but few observations. The first question, namely, whether the grant of probate was not conclusive evidence of domicile, was the most important. In his opinion, it proved no more than that the instrument was testamentary according to the law of the country where the probate was granted. To give effect to the will itself, it must be known in what country the testator was domiciled. Here there was nothing to lead to the notion of anything but an English domicile. As to that point, it seemed clear that in 1817 the testator quitted Scotland with the intention of quitting it for ever, not, perhaps, not to visit it again, but not to reside there.—[His Lordship here went through the circumstances, which shewed that though the testator was frequently in Paris, his home must be considered to have been in London.]—These circumstances shewed that he must be considered a domiciled Englishman; and it ought to be considered as a rule, that the Courts would look with suspicion on any circumstances adduced with a view to shew that a man had voluntarily changed his domicile from his own to a foreign country, had left his own country to reside in one where there must always be difficulties in his own individual position and in the conflict of the duties which he owed to one country and to the other. The citations from the Roman law did little to illustrate this subject. They were instances of an endeavour to explain something by something which itself still more required explanation, clarum per obscurum. "Domicil" meant permanent home, and if that was not understood by itself, no illustration would help to make it intelligible. The question of domicile had been not improperly raised in this case, but those who had raised it had failed to shew a domicile anywhere out of the country.

With respect to the question as to the application of the statute of Geo. 2. to the colonies, he thought the decision of Sir W. Grant on that subject was perfectly conclusive. It was often difficult to say what laws were adapted to a colony, but it was not difficult to determine that matter with regard to the Statute of Mortmain. Some of the provisions of the statute could not possibly be complied with by residents in the colony, nor was the evil which this statute was meant to provide against one which had as yet afflicted the colony. He was therefore of opinion that the statute did not apply to New South Wales.

As to the words "education and learning," he thought that the one was but the correlative or repetition of the other. "Learning" was here meant to be education for the benefit of those who were to be taught, and they were to be taught what commonly passed in the world under the name of learning. But then this was to be extended all over the world. That was a silly provision, but it did not invalidate the will. The learning was not to be applied all over the world, but only so far as circumstances would permit, and in settling the scheme for this charity, which was a perfectly valid one, it would be the duty of the Court to see that it was as extensive as the nature of the income would permit.

fact, and had been very properly decided in the court below. He agreed entirely with the proposition that our Courts must look very narrowly into the evidence before they deprived an Englishman living abroad of his English domicile. If the question of domicile was, as he thought it, rightly decided, it was unnecessary to discuss the effect of the grant of probate of the will in the Court of Canterbury. Probate was conclusive evidence of the title of the executors to all personal property which the testator was capable of disposing of, and conclusive evidence that it was in the proper form of the place of his domicile. It would be a mere question, what would be the effect of a probate if the testator died domiciled in a country where there was no power to make a will at all. His own impression was, that until probate was revoked in solemn form, it would still pass, as far as England was concerned, all the property to which the English law applied, and that the objection could not be set up after the will had passed the Ecclesiastical Court.

As to the application of the Mortmain Act to New South Wales, he entirely concurred with the opinion of his two noble and learned friends. And he also agreed with them that the testator did not intend that any part of his property should be diverted to the purposes of learning unconnected with education. He therefore concurred with the advice that had been given, that the decree of the Court below should be affirmed.

with costs.*

Feb. 16. } HAYWARD v. LOWNDES.

Public Health Act, 1848, and Local Government Act, 1858—Power to construct Sewers.

The powers of local boards, under the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, for the construction of sewers, are confined to their own district; and the Local Government Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, extends the exercise of those powers beyond the district only where it may be necessary for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage, and not for the purpose of making new sewers.

The plaintiffs were the owners of certain lands in the township of Burslem and Wool Stanton, in Staffordshire, and the defendants represented the local board of health of Tunstall, in the same county. The defendants had commenced the construction of a sewer, which was to pass out of their own district and through the lands belonging to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had no power to go out of their own district for the purpose of making a sewer, and filed this bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants from constructing any sewer beyond their district; and affidavits were filed by the plaintiffs to shew that considerable injury would be done to their property if the intended sewer were constructed according to the plans proposed by the defendants.

There were also affidavits on behalf of the defendants, alleging that it was impracticable to construct the sewer in any other manner than that proposed; that if the sewer were confined to the defendants' own district it would be necessary to go to much greater expense, and to purchase a house; that, consequently, it was necessary for them to go out of their district, and they had powers for this purpose given them by the Local Government Act. They also alleged acquiescence on the part of the plaintiffs.

The question depended upon the construction of the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. ss. 43, 45, 46, and the Local Government Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 30.

By the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 43. it is enacted, that all sewers, whether existing at the time when this act is applied or made at any time thereafter (except sewers made by any person or persons for his or their own profit, or for the profit of proprietors or shareholders, and except sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving land under any local or private act of parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating land and sewers under the authority of any Commissioners of Sewers appointed by the Crown), together with all buildings, works, materials and things belonging or appertaining thereto, shall vest in, belong to, and be entirely under the management and controul of the local board of health.

By section 45, it is enacted, that the local board of health shall from time to time repair the sewers vested in them by this act, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this act; and the said local board may carry any such sewers through, across or under any turnpike-road, or any street or place laid out as or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriageway of any street, and after reasonable notice in writing in that behalf (if upon the report of the surveyor it should appear to be necessary), into, through or under any lands whatsoever; and the said local board may from time to time enlarge, lessen, alter, arch over, or otherwise improve all or any of the sewers vested in them by this act, and discontinue, close up or destroy such of them as they may deem to have become unnecessary.

By section 46, it is enacted, that the local board of health shall cause the sewers vested in them by this act to be constructed, covered and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleared, cleansed and emptied; and for the purpose of clearing, cleansing and emptying the same they may construct and place, either above or under ground, such reservoirs, sluices, engines and other works as may be necessary, and may cause all or any of such sewers to communicate with and be emptied into such places as may be fit and necessary, or to cause the sewage and refuse therefrom to be collected for sale for any purpose whatsoever, but so as not to create a nuisance.

The Local Government Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. s. 30, enacts that local boards may exercise the powers given by the 46th section of the Public Health Act, 1848, also without their district, if necessary for the purpose of outfall and distribution of sewage, upon making due compensation, to be settled in the manner provided by the 144th section of the Public Health Act, 1848.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Jessel appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Glasse and Mr. Humphry, for the defendants.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction to restrain the local board of Tunstall from constructing a sewer for the drainage of Tunstall. With regard to the jurisdiction of this Court over such a question generally, there can be no doubt. It has been suggested that under some of the clauses of one or other of these acts, the Court ought to come to the conclusion that in fact the jurisdiction to consider this matter is vested in the Secretary of State, or in some other officer. It appears to me that the jurisdiction of this Court, which exists in this class of cases, is not in the smallest degree interfered with by any section in either of these acts of parliament. That jurisdiction is an extremely wholesome jurisdiction, and is well established, but at the same time a jurisdiction which ought not to be exercised, except where there is a clear right in the plaintiff to call for the exercise of it. The question turns entirely upon the construction to be put on the Public Health Act, 1848, and the Local Government Act, 1858. Three questions have been suggested: one is, whether the local board have a right to make a new sewer out of their own district, against the will of the owners of the land through which they propose to make the sewer? Another is, whether, if they have such a power, they are exercising it in such a manner as to create a nuisance, in which event they ought to be restrained? And a third is, whether the plaintiffs have not so acted as to shew an acquiescence, and to induce the Court not to interfere? I may dispose of this last question at once, by saying that I think the plaintiffs have not so acted as to preclude the interference of this Court.

With regard to the first question, what appears to me to be the general intention of the act is this: that unless there be in any clause a specific direction to the contrary, the power and jurisdiction of any given local board is to be confined to their own district; that is, to the district in which that local board is constituted for the purpose of public health. That appears to me to be the scope of the act of parliament. No doubt there are words of general import, which, if you are to take them merely by themselves, and without reference to the whole context, would lead you to a different conclusion; but if you do so take them, they would go to this: that the jurisdiction of every local board of health would be co-extensive with the kingdom. That of course cannot be; therefore, there must be some limit, and some restriction intended to be put on these general words. It appears to me, on looking at the whole of the acts of parliament, that the intention is to limit the local board to the district for which that board is constituted.

I will take first of all the 43rd section of the Public Health Act, the effect of which is to vest in the local board all sewers, whether existing at the time the act was passed or made at any time thereafter (except certain sewers specifically mentioned), and all buildings and works belonging to them. It does not say that all sewers within the district are vested in the local board of that district; but that all sewers are vested in the local board. Yet nobody will pretend to say that the act meant to vest in such local board all the sewers in England:—it is too ridiculous to be suggested; so that we have here in the first clause general language used, which it must be admitted by anybody requires, not only some restriction, but that restriction which I have suggested, namely, a restriction confining its application to the limits of the district. Then we go on to the 45th section of the same act, where it is enacted, that the local board of health shall from time to time repair the sewers vested in them by that act. It appears to me that according to the 43rd section the sewers vested in the local board are the sewers within the district for which that local board is appointed; and by this 45th section it is enacted, that the local board of health shall from time to time repair the sewers vested in them by this act (that is, the sewers within their district): “sewers then made or thereafter to be made, shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of that act.” I apprehend that that section clearly means that those sewers, which they are thus empowered to make as necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this act, must be sewers within the district. See the absurdity that would follow if this act meant to authorize them to make a sewer not only co-extensive with their district, but extending beyond their district, and running into another district; the effect would be this: that although they made the sewer, this very act would vest that sewer, which would not be in their district, but in the neighbouring district, in another body, who might cut it off, intercept it, and do just what they pleased with it; and why? because they found it vested in them by this act. Again, no sewer is vested in the board by this act but the sewers within their own district; if, therefore, they had the power, as contended for, of making a sewer out of their own district, they would have no power to enlarge or lessen it, to alter or arch it over, or improve in any manner the sewers out of their own district. If this contention is to prevail, you would have that species of conflict between the two districts which it is impossible to suppose the legislature could have intended. Therefore, it appears to me that, not only to make the act reasonable and rational, but to render it quite consistent with itself, the Court must apply a similar restriction to the effect or language of this, as of the former section; and I must hold, that the 45th section speaks only of "sewers within their own district." But, then, further on in the same section, we find the words "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever." It was suggested that these words, taking them as they stand, would mean lands "anywhere" in the county of Cornwall or in the county of Cumberland within or without their own district; but does the same section mean streets, place, cellar or vault, &c. out of their own district? Does it mean that the local board of Tunstall may carry their sewers through or under the streets of any neighbouring town? It is quite obvious, when you come to look at the whole scope of the clause, that it must mean lands in their own district. Then come powers to alter or enlarge sewers, but these powers, for like reasons, must be confined to sewers within their own district. If not so confined, they might make them out of their district, but could not alter or enlarge them; and the local board of the next district might alter or cut them, or make them pass as they pleased. It appears clear to me, therefore, that the 45th section must also receive the same restriction, so as to make the general powers apply to sewers and lands within the district only. Then the 46th section, again, can only apply to sewers in their own district; otherwise, if they make sewers out of their own district they are not required to cover and keep them so as not to be a nuisance; and though they must make sewers within their own district so as not to be a nuisance, yet without their own district they may do what they please. The only purpose for which they may make these works is to cleanse sewers within their own district, and they have no power to do anything else, except within their own district. Then comes the question whether the 30th section of the Local Government Act in any way gives that power which, in my opinion, the former act does not give; that is to say, to go out of their own district.—[His Honour, having read the 30th section of the Local Government Act, continued]—Now, it appears to me that this clause makes it still more clear, or, I may say, necessary to construe the former act as confining the powers to the district, for if by the former act there was power to go out of their district, it would be unnecessary that this second act should give them these powers. I must hold, that the legislature itself has told me that until this act was passed they had not power to go out of their district. Now, this second act only gives them a right to exercise the powers of the 46th section, which are to construct reservoirs, &c., but not to make sewers under other districts. Why the legislature has thought fit to give them powers to go out of their district for such a purpose, but not power to make sewers out of their own district, may admit of a question, but it is clear that the 46th section does not give that power, and that is the only section which is extended. But suppose I came to the conclusion that the second act did give them power, then I should have to consider whether it was necessary to go out of the district for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage (for "and" must here be read "or"). When I look at the plan in this case, it is obvious that it is not necessary, and that the outfall may just as well be accomplished by keeping within as by going out of the district. But it was said that if they made it within the district, they would have to buy a house; but suppose they have to buy a house, is not that one of the obligations imposed upon them by the act? Is it necessary, merely because they wish to avoid buying a house that they should go out of the district? It may be that if the compensation were such an enormous sum as that it could not be raised out of the rates, then it might be necessary. But here the house is a single blacksmith's shop or shed, and there does not appear to be anything whatever of that necessity which the act meant for going out of the district. It appears to me that there is here no right whatever to go out of the district; because there is no necessity for it. I am, therefore, bound to say that this board are departing from their powers, and that I must grant the injunction.

Jan. 13. } HAMILTON v. SMITH.

Company, Promoters of — Partnership Liabilities.

Certain persons joined together for the purpose of forming a joint-stock company, and with that view purchased property and incurred debts and expenses. The project became abortive, and upon a bill filed for an account, on the footing of a partnership, it was held, that this was not a partnership; and the bill was dismissed.

The bill in this suit stated that previously to the month of July 1854, the defendants Frederick James Smith and Robert Galloway were proprietors of a patent for refining sugar, known as "Dr. Scoffern's Patent." In April 1853, F. J. Smith, together with other parties, purchased for the sum of 1,500*l.* a lease of certain business premises, situate at Pleasant Row, White-chapel, for the purpose of practically exhibiting the operation of the refining process; and in October 1853, the lease of these premises was assigned by way of mortgage to Messrs. M'Naughten & Parry, sugar-brokers, who were creditors of Smith, and his coadjutors, for the sum of 3,800*l.* Messrs. M'Naughten & Parry having applied for payment of their debt, F. J. Smith, with the assistance of Henry Hayward, took measures for the formation of a joint-stock company, in order that the premises in Pleasant Row might be secured, and the business of sugar-refining carried on. It was finally arranged that 1,500*l.* should be provided by F. J. Smith, of which 250*l.* should be the contribution of Robert Galloway, and a further sum of 500*l.* was to be provided by Edward Jackson, so as to make up 2,000*l.*, and the premises were then to be purchased for the sum of 4,000*l.*, of which amount, the above 2,000*l.* was to be paid at once, and the remaining 2,000*l.*, by instalments, within eighteen months. On the 27th of September 1854, a meeting of the promoters of the company took place, which was attended by the Messrs. F. J. Smith, Barnes, Hamilton, Jackson, Hayward, Hoyles and Taylor, and at this meeting the arrangements for the purchase of the above premises and the formation of the company were agreed to, and the premises were accordingly purchased, and the deposit of 2,000*l.* was paid in the manner before mentioned. Various subsequent meetings of the promoters of the company took place, which were attended by all the plaintiffs, and steps were taken for the formation of the company.

On the 19th of December 1854 the company was provisionally registered, and the following gentlemen were described as promoters:—Messrs. F. J. Smith, Barnes, Hamilton, Jackson, Hoyles, Munro, Hayward, sen. and Hayward, jun., Herbert and Dering.

The company was never completely registered, nor was the deed of settlement signed. After this the premises in Pleasant Row were further charged with a sum of 1,000*l.*

On the 5th of November 1855 a meeting of the promoters of the company was held, at which it was resolved that the project should be abandoned and the affairs of the company wound up; and in pursuance of other resolutions, the mortgaged property was sold by public auction for the sum of 3,000*l.*, which sum was paid over to the mortgagees. Considerable expenses having been incurred about the purchase and sale of the premises and connected with the formation of the company, the last-mentioned sum of 1,000*l.* was applied towards such expenses. On the 30th of June 1857 the defendant F. J. Smith commenced an action against Messrs. Hamilton, Hoyles, Munro, Herbert, Hayward, sen. and Hayward, jun., Dering and Barnes, to recover the sum of 1,250*l.*, being the amount contributed by him, and the bill was thereupon filed for an injunction to restrain the action, and for an account, and a declaration as to which of the parties were liable to pay the said sum, and to what extent and in what proportions; and if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were liable to reimburse Smith, then that the money advanced by him and by Galloway and Jackson might be included in the account, and that both the plaintiffs and the defendants were liable to contribute.

The action was stayed by arrangement between the two parties, and the cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Webb appeared for the plaintiffs, and contended that this was a case of partnership where the parties had actually purchased property for the purpose of carrying on a business, and all the partners were therefore liable to contribute. It was not like the ordinary case of persons joining together to attempt to form a company.

Mr. Glasse, Mr. Dickinson and Mr. Hobhouse appeared for the defendants, and submitted that a bill could not be sustained in this case on the footing of a partnership. It was the same as any ordinary case of persons uniting together to form a company, and the only remedy would be under the Winding-up Acts.

The following authorities were cited:—

Norris v. Cottle, 2 H.L. Cas. 647.

Bright v. Hutton, 3 Ibid. 341.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I have been much perplexed by the extraordinary nature of this case; and that perplexity is not entirely removed. The bill is filed upon the footing that certain persons agreed to form, and did form, an actual partnership or adventure; that the plaintiffs and the defendants were co-partners, and that some were entitled as against the others to an account and a winding-up of the concern. The bill prays an injunction to restrain one or more of such partners from bringing an action to recover specific sums, which should form items in the general account. Unless it can be proved that this is a partnership, the bill cannot prevail. Now one thing is clear: if half-a-dozen persons enter into a specific adventure for the sale of tea, or silk, or a share in a ship, they are pro hac vice partners; and it may be thought that such a rule would apply to an undertaking with a view to establish a joint-stock company. But the law has determined otherwise; whether rightly or wrongly it is not for me to say. I may say, however, that I wish it had been decided that it would, and that all the parties to such an undertaking were liable; but that is a mere matter of private opinion, and all that I can do is to administer—not make—the law. Well, then, persons combining as promoters of a joint-stock company, either by charters, under an act of parliament, or taking advantage of an existing statute, are not partners. In a partnership all the partners are liable to the expenses of carrying on the joint business or object, although each of them may not have personally concurred in incurring them; but such is not the case with promoters of a company. A company cannot be said to exist, as such, until it is formed; and from that moment a new state of things arises. What, then, is the effect of such a company not being formed? Why, that each promoter is only liable for that portion of the expenses which he himself, either actually or impliedly, by law may be held to have sanctioned. That rule is acted on every day under orders to wind up inchoate associations. The present case presents an instance of an association very much of that character; and therefore the promoters are only contributories as to those expenses which they caused to be incurred. The bill, however, proceeds on the footing of a partnership, which is not applicable to the state of things I have just instanced.

The parties here were not, in reality, partners; and although the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts have established the principle that you may have a winding-up order to embrace all persons, they still are only liable piece-meal, so to say; and each is only liable for his personal portion of the expenses. I am happy to say it has never yet been established that you may file a bill in such a case, and I hope it never will be so decided. There is not in such a case any principle enabling the Court to make a decree, and administer what might be regarded as the equities among the parties. Such a jurisdiction would introduce all those mischiefs and anomalies now confined to proceedings under the Winding-up Acts. The plaintiffs can, therefore, have no relief upon this bill. It has been argued that, in point of fact, this is a case of an actual partnership, and not of parties combining to promote a joint-stock company; that it is the case of parties who, having bought property to the amount of 4,000*l.*, had thereby done that which constitutes a partnership. That argument is ingenious and very striking at first sight; but when considered, it is not tenable. The purchase was made according to a determination at a meeting, when none of the defendants, except Smith, were present, and for the benefit of the company, "if ever formed." The project failed, and the property remained in the hands of those parties to answer the expenses incurred in endeavouring to form a joint-stock company. Why should those expenses stand on a different footing from expenses incurred to a surveyor, engineer or solicitor, in trying to form a railway? It was, no doubt, right that the property should be sold and the parties so far recouped; but how does that make persons who have not incurred the expenses liable in this? If Smith was liable, Galloway and Herbert were not. The property was not conveyed to Smith, and supposing those to whom it was conveyed were trustees for him, how came they to sell his property? In the correspondence Smith treated himself as a party concerned; but the plaintiffs have treated him as having nothing to do with the property; and he was never invited to any of their meetings. It is, therefore, impossible to say that they regarded him as a partner. Expenses were incurred for which those only who authorized them were liable. Neither Galloway nor Smith could be liable, and the bill entirely fails on the general principle. Smith and Herbert, however, so acted as to give a colour to the plaintiffs' supposed right to have an account; and, moreover, with respect to the actions which Smith brought and Galloway threatened to bring, they were for specific sums, which as to Smith he treated or allowed to be treated as an advance on account of shares to be taken in the company. Upon the whole case, and the general principles of this Court, the bill must be dismissed with costs as against Galloway; but without costs as against Smith and Herbert.

 March 7, 8. } HUMPHREY v. OLVER.

Power of Appointment — Fraud — Corrupt Bargain for Benefit of Appointor.

Where a person having a power of appointment over a fund in favour of her children, made an appointment under such circumstances as led the Court to believe that the appointor intended to derive some benefit to herself, but it was not proved that she actually derived any benefit, excepting that the fund appointed was applied partly in payment of debts of the appointee for which the appointor was a surety, the Court of Appeal (reversing a decision of the Master of the Rolls) set aside the appointment.

Where there is proof that an appointor at one time intended a benefit to herself, the onus of proof that at the time of the appointment she had abandoned that intention lies upon those who support the appointment.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls. The very short facts were these:—By indenture of settlement, dated the 11th of March 1822, 924*l.* consols, 116*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* New 3*l.* per cent. and twenty-three shares in the United States Bank, were settled in trust for Mrs. Webb for her separate use for life, and after her death for her husband for life, and after the death of the survivor, upon trust for the children of Mrs. Webb, in such shares as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for such children in equal shares. There were four children of the marriage. The husband died in 1847. In 1852, Sophia, one of the daughters, married the defendant, Olver.

By a deed of appointment, dated the 17th of August 1853, Mrs. Webb appointed 800*l.* consols out of the trust money, after her decease, to her daughter Mrs. Olver, for her separate use. In May 1854 Mrs. Olver raised 300*l.* by annuity secured upon her appointed share. She died in January 1855, having by her will appointed her whole share to her husband.

Mrs. Webb made a will previously to her daughter's death, whereby she gave the residue of the trust fund to Mrs. Olver, but after her death Mrs. Webb executed another will appointing the same residue among her three other children. Mrs. Webb died in June 1857.

The present suit was instituted by her surviving children, to set aside the appointment to Mrs. Olver, on the ground that it was a fraud upon the power, having been made partly for the benefit of Mrs. Webb, the appointor.

At the hearing of the cause at the Rolls, at the end of 1858, the Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the appointment, incorporating in his judgment the evidence on either side, saying "The question in this case is, whether the appointment made by Mrs. Webb is void, as being made in fraud of the power which she professed to exercise. It is contended that this appointment was, in fact, made partly for the benefit of Mrs. Webb, the appointor, and not for the sole benefit of her daughter, the appointee. The evidence upon which the plaintiff's case is founded is, that Mrs. Olver, at the time of her marriage, and at the time of the appointment, was in a state of health from which it might be assumed that she would shortly die, and would therefore obtain no benefit from the appointment, and that, in fact, she did die of consumption in January 1855, within a year and five months after the date of the appointment; that previous to the appointment various ineffectual attempts had been made by Mrs. Webb and Mr. Olver to raise money; that this appointment was made for the purpose of enabling money to be raised; that 300*l.* was raised by annuity, upon the security of the appointment; that the money so raised was intended to be employed for the joint benefit of Mrs. Webb and Mrs. Olver; and that if it was not so employed, still that Mrs. Webb obtained the benefit of the appointment to this extent, that the money so raised was partly employed in the payment of debts of Mrs. Olver for which Mrs. Webb was surety. Beyond this, it is contended, that the evidence establishes that when the appointment was made, it was so made by Mrs. Webb in the belief and under the promise from Mrs. Olver, that part of the money should be applied for her benefit, and that although it was not so applied, this breach of the agreement entered into by Mrs. Olver could not make good an appointment which was made for the purpose of obtaining a benefit of which Mrs. Webb was afterwards unexpectedly deprived. Now, certainly, if the evidence had established the fact that Mrs. Webb executed the appointment with the view and for the purpose of benefiting herself, even though she failed in obtaining the advantage which she had anticipated, I should be of opinion that the appointment was void. But the evidence does not satisfy me that such was the case. The documentary evidence consists of testimony drawn from Mrs. Webb, certain letters and a declaration signed by her. Previous to the death of her daughter, Mrs. Webb had made her will, leaving her daughter Mrs. Olver the residue of her estate, consisting of 643*l.* consols; and this, as far as it goes, is in favour of the bona fides of the appointment. After her daughter's death she executed another will, by which she gave the 643*l.* consols to her other children. A fortnight before she made this second will, she wrote a letter to her solicitor, in which is the following passage:— 'It is true, I was pressed to make the deed of gift in favour of my late daughter, which I always felt the greatest reluctance in doing, and which I did consent to only upon one condition, and that which was solemnly promised, of my having a share in the benefit to be derived from it; but when I saw you take 200*l.* out of 300*l.*, I found I had no chance, and was left with many others to do as well as we could; the promise was a mere bribe held out to me.' This document affords abundant evidence to shew that Mrs. Webb had changed her mind respecting the appointment; but it does not, in my opinion, shew that the appointment itself is bad, because it is impossible that I can, as against the appointee, take the statement of this lady to be absolutely true as against him. It does shew this, that she derived no benefit, or that she considered that she derived no benefit from the appointment; but I do not find that she makes any complaint prior to the decease of her daughter Mrs. Olver. This statement also is contradicted by a declaration which she made in February 1854, which is attested by two witnesses, in which she asserts the purity of the motive in making the appointment. The latter document itself is undoubtedly of little value for the purpose of confirming the appointment; the only effect of it is to shew that Mrs. Webb, or those who advised her at that time, thought that a question might be raised as to the validity of the appointment. But it is also of value for the purpose of shewing how little reliance can be placed upon the subsequent statement of this lady, who had made this solemn declaration, that she had no corrupt motive in making the appointment. Whether any weight is to be attributed to the circumstance that one of these documents was made before and the other after her daughter's death, I am unable to ascertain; nor can I tell what the motives were which actuated her to make these statements; but it is obvious that I cannot have recourse to either for the purpose of invalidating or confirming the appointment. That is a question which must rest upon distinct and independent testimony. I pass over, as matters which cannot affect my decision, all the evidence, of which there is a considerable amount, as to the statements made by Mrs. Webb to the witnesses subsequently to the appointment. Assuming it to be proved, and the evidence to be admissible, it amounts to no more than what she wrote in the letter I have already alluded to, and to which, for the reason I have given, I am of opinion I cannot attach any weight. The visd voce evidence respecting the health of Mrs. Olver establishes that she was taken ill before her marriage; that she was afflicted with a pulmonary complaint, which put an end to her existence three years after marriage. But this alone is not sufficient to avoid the appointment, for, notwithstanding her state of health, Mrs. Webb made Mrs. Olver her residuary legatee, and the appointment complained of preceded Mrs. Olver's decease by upwards of a year and a quarter. The evidence of the transaction being clandestine also fails. Notice was given to the trustees of the settlement very shortly after the date of the appointment by the parties who had advanced the money upon it; and this was in substance all the notice that could be required or could have been expected. I attribute no weight to the fact, that the parties to the appointment did not mention it publicly in the family. There is evidence which, so far as it goes, supports the case of the plaintiffs, namely, that Mrs. Webb was greatly in debt at the time she made the appointment. This undoubtedly is evidence of the existence of a motive for fraud in the exercise of the power; but whether this would be sufficient to invalidate the appointment is a question which I could not determine without further evidence. This leads to the consideration of the only additional evidence which goes to the root of the matter, and which is of considerable importance. It is the evidence of Mr. Huxtable, the medical gentleman, who speaks to what occurred prior to the execution of the appointment. He says, 'In the early part of the year 1853, I pressed Harriet Webb and Olver for the payment of my account. They both stated they were unable to pay the same; but they proposed to raise money upon the marriage settlement of Harriet Webb, and that when they had done so I and the other creditors should be paid in full. They informed me that Harriet Webb was about to make a will and dispose of the reversionary interest under her marriage settlement in favour of Sophia Olver, for the purpose of enabling the defendant Olver and his wife to raise money upon the will, and that out of such money I should be paid the amount due to me, and they requested me to allow my account to run on until they could raise the money in the manner stated. A will was afterwards executed by Harriet Webb in my presence, and at the earnest solicitation of Harriet Webb I subscribed the same as one of the attesting witnesses. Soon after the execution of the will, I inquired of Harriet Webb and Olver whether they had succeeded in raising the anticipated sum of money, but they informed me that they could not obtain the money, and that their object could only be accomplished by making a deed in favour of Sophia Olver, and that Harriet Webb intended to make such deed, and that their solicitor was preparing such deed.'—'Upon one occasion, in 1853,' he says, 'I was going to the west end of London, together with Harriet Webb and Olver, to consult a physician upon the state of health of Mrs. Olver; we called upon Mr. Chidley, the solicitor of Harriet Webb, at his office (Guildhall Chambers), and upon such occasion the subject of the proposed deed and borrowing the money was discussed, and it was frequently mentioned to me by Harriet Webb and Olver; and Harriet Webb informed me that she was in greatly embarrassed circumstances, and the defendant Olver also informed me that he was greatly in debt when he married, and upon this ground, because they were in great want and unable to pay their creditors, I agreed not to insist upon the payment of my account until they received money. Harriet Webb and Olver always told me the money intended to be borrowed was to pay their debts,—mine, among others, more particularly; but I have never received any portion of the money due to me.' Various observations occur upon this evidence. In the first place, it is stated, that the money was to have been raised expressly for the purpose of paying Mr. Huxtable among other creditors; but, although the money was raised, no portion of it was applied towards the payment of Mr. Huxtable's debt. The whole passage is expressly denied by the defendant Olver, who swears that the appointment was the spontaneous act of Mrs. Webb, and was not at all the effect of any corrupt motive or agreement between her and Mr. Olver. Certainly, the money was not applied for the benefit of Mrs. Webb at the time, as she herself afterwards complained, but she made no observations respecting it until after the death of her daughter. In that state of things, I think there is not sufficient to justify me in coming to the conclusion that the appointment was made by Mrs. Webb with a view to benefit herself. The burden of proof lies upon the plaintiffs; and, although I cannot say the case is one not involved in a good deal of suspicion, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to prove the corrupt agreement; I must, therefore, dismiss the bill, but without costs."

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed, and the Lords Justices required that Mr. Olver should submit himself for examination, a course which had not been pursued in the Rolls Court, as the plaintiffs had filed a replication to his answer. The witness Huxtable was not cross-examined for the defence, nor was Mr. Chidley, who prepared the deed of appointment, examined by either side, either on the original hearing or on the appeal.

Mr. Olver was cross-examined at length on his answer, and in general terms adhered to the statements therein contained.

Mr. Shapter and Mr. Dickinson were for the appellants.

Mr. Wellington Cooper (with Mr. Roundell Palmer), for the defendant Olver, and for one of the trustees of the deed of appointment, supported the decision of the Master of the Rolls.

Mr. Southgate, for the other trustee of that instrument.

Mr. C. M. Roupell, for the trustees of the original settlement.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that the defendants had not cross-examined Mr. Huxtable, and that Mr. Chidley, who prepared the deed, had not been called as a witness by either side. It might be, considering the circumstances, not unreasonable that those who impeached the appointment should have abstained from examining Mr. Chidley; but that observation could by no means apply to the defendants, who supported it. In his Lordship's opinion, it was clear that the Court could not rely upon the accuracy of the defendant Olver's memory as to circumstances of fact; on the other hand, having regard to the evidence of the plaintiffs generally, and particularly to the nature of Mr. Huxtable's, his Lordship was satisfied that the disputed appointment had not been determined on, prepared and executed solely with a view to the benefit of Sophia Olver and her husband, but that it was intended—in part at least—to be for the benefit of Mrs. Webb, the appointor; and that consideration was, of course, fatal to its validity.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER was also of opinion that this appointment could not be upheld. The defendants had contended that there was in the circumstances of this case nothing beyond suspicion, and that a transaction of this nature would not be overthrown by this Court merely upon suspicion. That was, no doubt, true; but it was different where there was a just inference of a wrongful intention from the facts established. The question to be considered was, whether there was to be drawn from the circumstances of this case such an inference that the appointment was in any manner intended for the benefit of the appointor. It seemed impossible to doubt that, at all events, there had been such an intention in Mrs. Webb's mind; but it was contended, that that intention had been abandoned—and of this abandonment his Lordship said he could find no proof. In his opinion, if the evidence established that such an intention had ever been entertained, the burden of shewing that it was abandoned previously to the execution of the appointment lay upon those who supported it. Here the defendants had not thought proper to cross-examine Mr. Huxtable, or to call Mr. Chidley; and he (the Lord Justice) was not satisfied with the evidence given by Mr. Olver. His Lordship said that everything that could be urged in support of the appointment had been very ably urged by Mr. Wellington Cooper; but his opinion was, notwithstanding, that the appointment by the deed must be set aside, and that the fund must be declared to have been well appointed by the will amongst the other children of Mrs. Webb.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE added, that he entirely agreed that Mr. Cooper had said all that could be said in favour of the appointment, and that the parties had no reason to regret the absence of their leading counsel, Mr. Roundell Palmer.

M.R. { WILSON v. FOSTER.
Jan. 13, 14. { In re THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAIL-WAY COMPANY.

Company—Reinvestment—Costs.

Upon a petition by a tenant for life for the reinvestment of purchase-money for lands taken by a railway company,—Held, that the costs of the appearance of the reversioner and of the trustees of a deed of separation between the tenant for life and her husband, ought to be paid out of the fund, and not by the railway company.

This suit was instituted to carry into execution the trusts of the will of Sir H. Wilson, deceased; by which will various real estates were settled to the use of the defendant Mary W. H. Wilson for life, with remainder to the plaintiff in this suit. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company took a portion of these estates for the purpose of their undertaking, and the purchase-money was paid into court.

By this petition M. W. H. Wilson now asked for a reinvestment of the purchase-money in other lands. It was also prayed that the costs might be paid by the company. The plaintiff, as reversioner, and the trustees of a deed of separation between the petitioner and her husband, consented to the prayer of the petition.

Mr. Barry appeared for the petitioner.

Mr. Rogers, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Warren, for the trustees of the separation deed.

Mr. Humphreys, for the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company.—The costs of the reversioner and of the trustees ought not to be paid by the company. It was never contemplated that parties with remote and indefinite interests would appear upon an application for a reinvestment of the purchase-money of lands taken by the company; it was certainly not within the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. s. 83.—In re Hore's Estate (7).

Mr. Rogers and Mr. Warren.—Both the trustees and the reversioner were served with a copy of the petition; their consent was necessary in the suit, and they could not be joined as petitioners. Their solicitors, also, without the papers could not advise them on the proper course to pursue; even then they had no discretion: they were served and were compelled to appear, and act according to the circumstances brought before the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The company cannot be asked to pay the costs either of the trustees or the reversioner. Where petitions are presented asking for the reinvestment of the purchase-money of lands taken by companies, it may happen that parties who are defendants to a suit cannot join in the petition, but in such cases they ought neither to appear nor to interfere with the petition. In this case, however, the costs of serving the petition upon the trustees and the reversioner ought to be borne by the company, but the rest of their costs must be paid out of the fund.

Jan. 28, 31. } CARTER v. SEBRIGHT.

Tenant for Life—Copyholds—Fines on Admission of New Trustees.

A copyhold estate was devised to trustees for a tenant for life, with gifts over to other persons in remainder. Upon the admission of new trustees to the copyhold estate,—Held, that the fines and fees must be borne by the tenant for life and those in remainder in proportion to the value of their respective interests.

Richard Howard, by his will, dated the 16th of February 1843, gave and devised to James Walter Sebright and Frederick James Hall, their heirs and assigns, all his freehold and copyhold hereditaments, in trust to receive the rents and profits thereof and pay the same unto his wife (now Mary Ann Sebright) for life, and after her decease to pay such rents and profits unto Julia Elizabeth (the wife of Alfred Hall) for her separate use for life, and after her decease to all her children or remoter issue as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, to all her children living at her decease.

The testator also bequeathed various leasehold premises to the same trustees, upon trusts similar to those declared of the copyhold estate. He also appointed Messrs. Sebright and Hall executors of his will, to whom he subsequently added his wife. The will also contained a power authorizing the executors or administrators of the last surviving trustee to appoint new trustees in their stead for the purpose of fully executing the trusts in the will declared.

The testator died on the 13th of January 1844, and his trustees alone proved his will.

The copyhold premises were held of the manor of Kingshold, in the parish of Hackney, in the county of Middlesex, and the trustees were admitted to them and their heirs, upon the trusts of the will, according to the custom.

James Walter Sebright survived his co-trustee, and on the 11th of May 1848, he intermarried with the testator's widow. On the 13th of October 1851 he made his will, giving the whole of his property to his wife, and he appointed her his sole executrix.

On the 17th of March 1857, J. W. Sebright died, leaving his wife surviving, and she proved his will.

By an indenture, dated the 29th of April 1858, Mary Ann Sebright, by virtue of the power in the will of Richard Howard, appointed Thomas Carter and Colville Hillary to be trustees, and by the same deed she assigned the leaseholds to them, and she further covenanted with Messrs. Carter and Hillary to be admitted to the copyhold premises, and surrender the same to them, upon the subsisting trusts of the will of Richard Howard.

Neither M. A. Sebright nor the trustees, however, were admitted to the copyhold estate.

The annual value of the copyholds amounted to no more than 28*l.* a year, yet the fines and fees demanded on the double admission, the one being merely for the purpose of transmission, amounted to 149*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

In February 1854, Mr. and Mrs. Sebright mortgaged her life interest in the trust estate to John Law, to secure the repayment of 300*l.* and interest, and on the 26th of May 1856 they again mortgaged her life interest to Henry Strong, to secure the repayment of 250*l.* and interest.

The will of R. Howard made no provision for the payment of the fines and fees becoming payable on the admission of the new trustees.

Mrs. Sebright, as tenant for life, denied her liability to pay any part of such fines and fees.

Messrs. Carter and Hillary now filed the bill in this suit, praying that Mrs. Sebright should be admitted, and then surrender the copyhold premises to them, and that the fines and fees consequent on these double admissions might be raised by a sale or mortgage of the copyhold estate, and, if necessary, of the leasehold estates. The bill also prayed for a declaration that the interest of the monies so raised ought to be borne by the tenants for life for the time being, and that M. A. Sebright, as tenant for life of the copyhold estate, ought to contribute to the fines, fees and expenses attending the admissions, and to the costs of the plaintiffs, in proportion to the benefit she might derive therefrom, and that, if necessary, inquiries might be directed as to what she ought to pay, and what securities she ought to give. It also prayed for inquiries whether it would not be beneficial to the parties to abandon the copyhold premises.

Jan. 31.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

—The question is, whether the fine that must be paid for the renewal of a copyhold is to fall upon the tenant for life and the person in remainder, in proportion to their interests in the property. No distinction ought to be made between a fine for the renewal of a copyhold and a fine for the renewal of a lease. The authorities are clear and decisive upon the subject, as far as legal estates are concerned. If a devise of a copyhold is made to A. for life, with remainder to B. in fee, it is quite certain, according to Lord Eldon and the subsequent authorities, that the fine to be paid for the admission of the tenant for life, if the admission is to enure to the benefit of the remainderman, is to be paid in proportion to the interests which they have in the estate. If, here, Mrs. Sebright were admitted only for her own life, then the fine would be proportioned to the value of her interest. Where a trustee is a person who is admitted for the benefit of the parties entitled for life and in remainder, exactly the same rule and the same principle applies. In Scriven on Copyholds it is considered as a question not to be doubted or disputed, but the case of Playters v. Abbott also recognizes that as the principle to be followed. I adopt the argument that if it be so with respect to legal estates, à fortiori it is so with respect to equitable estates; because there can be no question that it is according to the justice of the case, when an admission is made for the benefit of persons who have various interests in an estate, and one admission enures to the benefit of all, that they ought to pay the expenses of admission in proportion to their interests. It is the same principle as that which applies to the costs of the appointment of trustees, which is very similar. The expense is paid out of the estate generally. That diminishes the interest of the tenant for life and of the person in remainder. I am of opinion, therefore, that the fine must be borne by the tenant for life in proportion to her interest, and that she must give security in the usual way for payment of her share of the fine.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } KINGSFORD v. SWIN-} FORD.
 Jan. 31.

Injunction—Common Law Procedure Act —Equitable Plea.

Upon bill filed to restrain an action at law for damages by reason of the non-performance of a covenant in a deed to pay premiums upon a policy, the Court held that, under the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, it was optional and not compulsory upon a defendant at law to put in an equitable plea; and that if the defendant did not choose to avail himself of his right he could not be compelled to plead an equitable defence, although the question might be more proper for the decision of a Court of law. Injunction granted upon motion to restrain the action until the hearing.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from prosecuting an action at law under the following circumstances :—

The plaintiff and James Swinford (a son of the defendant, John Swinford) had been in partnership together as chemical manufacturers, but dissolved their partnership in the year 1855. At that time the partnership was indebted to the defendant in the sum of 4,278*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, the payment of which sum the plaintiff took upon himself, all the interest of his partner in the business being transferred to the plaintiff. A deed was then executed, dated the 19th of November 1855, by which the plaintiff covenanted to pay to the defendant the above sum, and he gave to the defendant eight promissory notes for the amount. An agreement in writing was afterwards entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, dated the 5th of January 1856, by which the plaintiff agreed to deposit certain policies of assurance on his own life, to the amount of 2,000*l.*, as a security for the payment of the promissory notes, and covenanted to pay the premiums and to execute a mortgage of the policies, with a power of sale. The defendant also agreed not to give notice to the insurance office of the deposit of the policies until default should be made in payment of the premiums. The plaintiff paid several of the promissory notes, amounting in all to the sum of 1,087*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*, but suspended payment on the 18th of August 1856, at which time a deed of inspectorship was signed by him and his creditors, the defendant being one of the creditors who signed the deed; and by this deed it was provided, that the plaintiff should still continue to carry on the business; that the money and assets to be realized by him should be distributed in the same manner, and that the same rights and equities should prevail as if an adjudication in bankruptcy had been made at the date of the deed; that any application of such monies or assets not strictly in accordance with the rules in bankruptcy should be qualified and controuled by the stipulations of that deed; and it was further provided that nothing therein contained should extend to prevent the creditors, parties thereto, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, from enforcing any mortgage, claim, charge or lien on the estate, or from proceeding against any person as well as the plaintiff, liable to the creditors, either as indorsees, drawers or acceptors of promissory notes or otherwise. The deed contained a statement that no creditor signing or assenting to the resolutions in the deed should be in any way prejudiced with respect to his rights and remedies against third persons, or with respect to any security or lien he might have for his particular debt; and a proviso that the deed might be pleaded as a release by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, on his part, complied with all the requisitions of the last-mentioned deed, and duly proceeded to wind up his affairs under it. On the 31st of December 1856 the inspectors indorsed on the back of the deed a certificate that a proviso for making void the said deed therein contained had become incapable of taking effect, and that, in accordance with the stipulation in the deed, it operated as a release to the plaintiff. Three dividends were declared under the agreement; the defendant participated in them, and proved for his whole debt. In 1856 the plaintiff, considering his debt to the defendant as cancelled by the effect of the deed of inspectorship, discontinued the payment of the premiums on the policies, and ultimately surrendered them to the office, taking a new policy for the benefit of his family. The defendant, however, treated the plaintiff as still liable under the agreement to pay the premiums, and after some correspondence an action was, on the 7th of January 1859, brought in the Court of Queen's Bench for breach of the agreement to pay the premiums; and for damages, laid at 2,000*l*.

The plaintiff in equity, being advised that he had no legal defence, filed the present bill to restrain the action, and now moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant until the hearing of the cause from further prosecuting the action, and from commencing or prosecuting any action at law against the plaintiff, for the same or any similar purpose, or any other action for the recovery of damages in respect of any alleged breach of the agreement of the 5th of January 1856, or in respect of the surrender of the policies.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Wickens appeared in support of the motion, and contended that a defendant at law was not bound, under the Common Law Procedure Act, to put in an equitable plea. It was optional with him to do so or not. In this case the question depended upon the construction of a deed; and this could not be made the subject of a legal defence unless it was pleaded as an equitable plea. Such a case was more fit for the decision of a Court of equity; and it appeared very doubtful even whether it was such a plea as might be pleaded at law. They cited Elder v. Beaumont (1).

Mr. Glasse and Mr. H. Stevens, contra, submitted that the defence set up by the plaintiff in equity was just such a question as could best be decided by a Court of law, particularly as the action was for damages, and not for a particular sum. The Common Law Procedure Act gave the defendant at law the right to plead an equitable plea to an action, and it was for the Court to say whether he was not bound to do so in this case—Wild v. Hillas (2).

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I confess I have felt considerable hesitation during the argument as to the course which ought to be pursued in this case—more hesitation about that point than upon the question of the construction of the instrument, although that question is also one of some nicety. In the view which I take of the case, the matter presents these questions:—Supposing that there were no act of parliament giving to the defendant at law a right to plead an equitable defence, supposing no such act had ever passed, then the matter would stand simply thus:—here would be a case where an action at law is brought, in which the defendant at law comes into this court and says,—I have got a certain equitable defence, which depends upon what will have to be decided at the hearing of the cause in equity. In such a case, unless it were clear that there was no equity at all—no substantial point to be decided at the hearing of the cause—I should be of opinion that I ought, upon proper terms for the protection of the plaintiff at law, to grant the injunction. That would be the ordinary course. Now, here, putting aside, as I am doing for a moment, what is the effect of the act of parliament, which enables the defendant at law to make an equitable defence by plea—what case have I here? I have an instrument of a very peculiar character, an instrument, upon the construction of which will depend the question whether, under the circumstances that exist, the plaintiff at law ought or ought not to have the right of recovering damages from the defendant, by reason of the non-performance of the covenant to pay the premiums on the policy. In such a case as that I do not hesitate to say, that even although I might be in a condition to form some judgment upon it at the hearing of the motion, still, as the whole case really depends upon that question, I ought not to decide it upon motion, but ought to reserve the decision of the question until the hearing of the cause. That would be the state of the case supposing there had been no such act of parliament. Now comes the question, what is the effect of that act of parliament? And I confess, in the course of the argument I felt a strong disposition to take this view of it—that inasmuch as that act of parliament enables the pleading of an equitable plea, that is, making an equitable defence by way of plea at law, that the object of the act of parliament being to prevent the necessity of parties coming into two different courts of judicature, to have their rights decided in one and the same way, and inasmuch as, more especially, this is a matter depending upon the legal construction of an instrument, and a matter in which the result of the action, if it succeeded, must be, not the giving of a fixed sum in the shape of a debt, but damages, and therefore more properly for a Court of law,—I confess, that I felt a very strong disposition to take this course—to say that, as you can plead an equitable plea, you ought to plead it. But I should have had to ask myself this question:—If an equitable plea be pleaded, is it such an equitable plea as a Court of law would entertain and deal with finally? In other words, is it such an equitable defence as can be properly and conveniently pleaded by way of plea in an action at law? Now, in the case which has been referred to of Elder v. Beaumont, it appears to me that the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, is, that if this had been a case of actual bankruptcy, such a defence might be made by a plea; that is, although an equitable defence, it might be made by plea. I think Lord Campbell enunciated that proposition, not only in the interlocutory observations which fell from him during the argument, but also when he was solemnly and deliberately enunciating the opinion of the whole Court. I think that is the effect of it; and I do not see why, although in this case there has been no actual bankruptcy,—if, as the plaintiff in equity contends, it is to be treated under the terms of the deed, precisely in the same manner as if there had been an actual bankruptcy,—such a plea might not be well pleaded; or why, if pleaded, it would not be duly considered by the Court of law by virtue of that act of parliament.

Then I come to this question:—when I look at the act of parliament, the act, as I understand, merely gives an option to the defendant at law to plead such a plea. It does not impose upon him the obligation to plead it. As has been justly said, until that act of parliament passed, it was a matter of right to come into this court and ask upon equitable grounds to stay the action at law, alleging there was no legal defence; and that act of parliament says, instead of doing so, the defendant at law may, at his option, but not as a matter of compulsion upon him, instead of coming into a court of equity, plead his equitable defence at once in a Court of law, and the Court of law will take notice of it. That seems to me to be the effect of the act of parliament.

Then comes this question:—can I say, because I think you can plead such a plea, I will determine that, under the act of parliament, which makes it entirely optional and not compulsory, I will compel you to plead it? Supposing I were to adopt that view, which I am free to confess was the view I was very much disposed in the course of the argument to adopt, the effect might be this: I decline to give you the injunction in equity, because I think you ought to go and plead that plea at law. Therefore, the result of that would be that I should say,—Let this motion stand over until I see what the effect of that pleading at law is, and then I will deal with it according to the justice of the case. Supposing I took that course, and the defendant at law said,—I shall not plead that plea; I will plead a legal defence, if I have any, or will plead the general issue, and I will take my chance of what will turn up; I will not plead an equitable defence; I am advised by my common law counsel, that it is, at all events, doubtful whether the plea will lie; but even if the plea will lie, my counsel tells me that it is very questionable whether I shall have it considered in the same way by the Court of law as by the Court of equity. Then, supposing he should refuse to plead that plea, and I find the result of the case is a judgment against him,—what am I to do when the motion comes on? Am I to say, that because you did not choose to plead the equitable plea, I will refuse you equitable relief. Is not that, in other words, saying that that which the act of parliament makes entirely optional shall, by this Court, be determined in the particular case as compulsory upon the defendant, and he shall not be entitled to that relief which, independently of the act of parliament, he would otherwise have had, because he does not choose to avail himself of the option which the act of parliament gives him. After some hesitation in the course of the argument, I arrive at this result, that I have no right to compel him to plead that plea. The case that has been cited of Wild v. Hillas stood on different ground. There I had a case of an action pending, in which there had been the very identical plea pleaded. The equitable plea was there pleaded, and the parties were at issue on that plea, and in such state of things the party who had exercised the option of pleading that plea, making his defence at law upon the equitable ground, thought fit then to come into a court of equity and say, "Although I have exercised the option you gave me, yet I will now change my mind and ask for equitable relief in equity." I was of opinion, that being the state of the case, that I could not give him equitable relief where he had already exercised his option. That was the ground that I took there, but it does not exist here. It really appears to me to come to this question, whether I have a right to compel him to exercise that option which the legislature has given him to make his defence at law. If I thought I had a right to do it, I confess that this is a case in which I should be very glad to exercise the right, because, on all grounds, I think that it would be best and most convenient that the matter should be tried by a Court of law: first, because it is clear that the equitable defence may be very well set up by the deed there; and, secondly, because the result of the action would be to obtain damages and not a given sum; but still, feeling upon the whole that the result which I have arrived at is correct, that I have no right to alter the effect of that act of parliament, and make compulsory what the act says is only optional, I am bound to treat the case as if that act did not exist, that is, as if the party has a right to come into this court for equitable relief. Then, ought he to have it? It appears to me that there is a very fair question. I abstain from going into the clauses of the deed for the purpose of expressing my opinion upon them, because they will have to be determined at the hearing; indeed, if I come to the conclusion that I ought to let him go on at law,

I ought not to express any opinion upon the present application which could affect the question, or be supposed to affect the question that will have to be decided either at the hearing before me or at the trial at law. It appears to me, without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the case upon the construction of the deed, that there is a fair question to be tried at the hearing of the cause, and, as under ordinary circumstances in a case for equitable relief, I shall grant the injunction, but upon terms so as not to make the granting of it more prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff than the justice of the case requires.

Now it is not a case in which, from the very nature of it, I ought to say you must pay into court a given sum of money: for example, I never could say, your action being brought for 2,000*l.*, you shall pay in 2,000*l.*, because I have no ground for saying that the result of the action would be to recover 2,000*l.* as a given sum, or anything like that, whatever the success of the case might be. It appears to me that it is a case in which, to do justice to the plaintiff, I ought to require judgment to be given, and if it were an action for a given sum I might require judgment to be given for that sum, but it is an action to recover damages, the damages being laid at 2,000*l.* It is an action for damages for breach of covenant for non-payment of premiums on a policy. There is a special judgment which is obtained, in some particular manner, by the plaintiff in a case of default by the defendant, which is a judgment not for a given sum, or, at all events, not for a nominal sum, but only for the amount of the actual damages to be recovered, to be ascertained by subsequent proceedings, usually I believe, in the Sheriffs' Court. It appears to me that that is the sort of judgment that I ought to require the defendant to give. The mode of working it out in the order must depend upon more accurate and definite knowledge of the technicalities and proceedings at law than I can venture to assume to myself at this moment; but that appears to me to meet the justice of the case, and upon such terms the injunction will be granted.

LOrDS JUSTICES. { THORNDIKE v. HUNT.
Jan. 31. { BROWNE v. BUTTER.

Trustee and Cestui que Trust—Trustee of two Funds—Breaches of Trust—Sale of one Fund to replace the other—Right to follow Fund though paid into Court—Bonâ fide Purchaser—Accountant General a Trustee of Funds paid into Court.

*Mrs. E. Linzee, by her will, gave stock to her three daughters for life, with remainder to their children respectively. W. A. H. was one of the trustees. He ultimately became possessed of the whole fund, and sold out part and applied the same to his own purposes. G. E. V. by his will, gave 8,000*l.* consols to Mrs. Thorndike for her life, with remainder to her children. W. A. H. was one of the trustees. He ultimately became possessed of this fund, and sold it out and applied the proceeds to his own use. Mrs. Thorndike filed a bill against him (Thorndike v. Hunt) and an order was made that he should transfer into court the amount sold out, and he accordingly transferred into court 3,253*l.* consols (which in fact was part of the trust estate of Mrs. Linzee). The dividends were paid for many years to Mrs. Thorndike. W. A. H. became insolvent, and the parties beneficially interested under the will of Mrs. Linzee filed a bill (Browne v. Butter), and soon afterwards presented a petition in both suits, praying that the 3,253*l.* which originally belonged to the trust estate of Mrs. Linzee, but which had been transferred to the name of the Accountant General in the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt, might be transferred to the suit of Browne v. Butter, and that the dividends which had been paid to Mrs. Thorndike might be repaid; and the Master of the Rolls ordered accordingly, on the ground that the 3,253*l.* was part of Mrs. Linzee's trust estate. The plaintiff in the first suit, Mrs. Thorndike, appealed to the Lords Justices, who held, reversing that decision, that the legal estate in the fund had by transfer become vested in the Accountant General for the purposes of the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt; that Mrs. Thorndike was a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, and was entitled to hold the fund against the parties interested under Mrs. Linzee's will.*

Strictly, a bill ought to have been filed, though the merits were so plain that their Lordships felt themselves enabled to decide upon petition.

W. A. H., who was a solicitor of the Court, was ordered to shew cause why he should not be struck off the roll, and was struck off.

This was an appeal petition against an order of the Master of the Rolls. The petitioners were Mrs. Mary Ann Thorndike and her infant children, the plaintiffs in the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt. The facts, which were of a very complicated nature and undisputed, were as follows:—

Emily Linzee, late of Plymouth, widow, deceased, by her will, dated the 24th of March 1822, after certain specified legacies, bequeathed to George Hunt, the Rev. Warwick Young Churchill Hunt, and Capt. Francis Holmes Coffin, all her stock and monies in the Bank of England, upon trust to pay and apply the dividends, &c. for the maintenance, education and support of her five children, namely, Emily Woolridge, afterwards the wife of Warwick Augustus Hunt the elder, Susannah Inman, afterwards the wife of William Cheselden Browne, Mary Ann Charlotte, afterwards the wife of James Warwick Woolridge the elder, Samuel Hood Linzee and John Linzee, during their minorities, but so that no more than one fifth part of such dividends should be applied for the maintenance, &c. of each such child; and when her son S. H. Linzee should attain twenty-one years, then to transfer to him his one-fifth part, together with all accumulations, for his own use and benefit; and when her son J. Linzee should attain the same age, to transfer to him his fifth in like manner; and when and as her three daughters should attain their several and respective ages of twenty-one years, then upon trust to pay unto, or permit and suffer each of them to receive the dividends on one-fifth part of the stocks and monies and unapplied dividends for their respective lives, with remainder as to one-fifth each to the children of her three daughters, with provision for their maintenance and education during their respective minorities. Emily Linzee died on the 22nd of March 1825, and her will was proved by the trustees and executors, and her personal estate was ultimately represented by 25,800*l.* consols, and 300*l.* 3*l.* 10*s.* reduced annuities, standing in the names of the trustees.

The testatrix's children all attained twenty-one; Samuel died in 1831, intestate, and his share of the above securities was transferred to his administratrix; the share of J. Linzee was transferred to him on his attaining his majority, and the fund was thus reduced to 15,480*l.* consols and 225*l.* 3*l.* 10*s.* reduced annuities.

G. Hunt and the Rev. W. Y. C. Hunt both died before any of the breaches of trust subsequently mentioned had been committed, leaving Capt. Coffin the sole surviving trustee of the will. In 1830 Emily Woolridge Linzee married Warwick Augustus Hunt, and a settlement was executed, by which the life interest of Emily Woolridge Hunt was vested in John Butter and George Hunt, for her separate use, with a restraint upon anticipation. Upon the death of George Hunt, Charles Shea was appointed a trustee in his place. In 1836 Susannah Inman Linzee married William Cheselden Browne, and upon that marriage a settlement was executed, by which the life interest of Susannah Inman Browne was vested in G. Hunt and W. A. Hunt for her separate use, with a restraint upon anticipation. In the year 1838 Mary Anne Charlotte Linzee married James Warwick Woolridge; and her life interest became in like manner settled to her separate use, and vested in W. C. Browne and W. A. Hunt. In 1836 the remaining sums of 15,480*l.* consols, and 225*l.* reduced annuities, were standing in the names of the three trustees named in the will, two of whom, however, were dead, and the petition alleged that W. A. Hunt, who is a solicitor, induced Capt. Coffin, the surviving trustee, to transfer into the names of J. Butter and C. Shea one-third of those funds, viz., 5,160*l.* consols and 75*l.* reduced annuities, and a like third into the name of himself, and that in the year 1837 he in like manner induced Capt. Coffin to transfer the remaining third part into the names of the said W. C. Browne and himself. Capt. Coffin died in 1842, intestate and insolvent, and no administration to his estate was ever taken out. The sums transferred into the names of

J. Butter and C. Shea continued standing in their names, until they were transferred into court in the suit of Browne v. Butter. The two former transfers having, however, been effected, W. A. Hunt sold out one-third of the consols, and appropriated the entire proceeds thereof to his own use; but he, notwithstanding, continued until January 1855 to pay to Susannah Inman Browne the amount of dividends which the stock would have produced, and she and her husband were up to that time wholly ignorant of the sale. He also sold 75*l.* reduced annuities; but this sum he paid to Mr. and Mrs. Browne. In August 1848 W. A. Hunt induced W. C. Browne to execute to him a power of attorney, authorizing the transfer into his name alone of another third, to which Mrs. Woolridge was entitled for her life, pretending that W. C. Browne was to be discharged from the trusts of the settlement on that lady's marriage. W. A. Hunt then transferred 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols into his own name, but he sold out the remainder and applied the proceeds to his own purposes. Still he continued to pay to Mrs. Woolridge an amount equal to the dividends of her one-third share. These were the facts relating to the fund subject to the trusts of Mrs. Linzee's will.

By the will of George Elliott Vinnecombe, dated the 16th of April 1840, J. Butter, Samuel Mallock, and W. A. Hunt were appointed trustees of a sum of 8,000*l.* consols, in trust to pay the dividends to the testator's widow Dorothy Vinnecombe for her life, and upon her decease to pay the same to his granddaughter Mary Anne Vinnecombe, for her life for her separate use, with remainder to her children, and in default of issue of Mary Anne Vinnecombe, the 8,000*l.* was to be held in trust for her, her executors, administrators and assigns absolutely. The testator died in October 1841, and his will was afterwards proved by the executors, and the 8,000*l.* consols was transferred by them to Butter, Mallock and W. A. Hunt. Dorothy Vinnecombe survived her husband, but died in the same year. Mary Anne Vinnecombe afterwards married the defendant Charles Franc Thorndike, and was the plaintiff in the first suit. S. Mallock died in July 1845. In April 1846 J. Butter retired from the trusts, and Frederick Cresswell was appointed in his place, whereupon the 8,000*l.* consols was transferred into the names of W. A. Hunt and F. Cresswell. On the 3rd of August 1847 they sold out and transferred 4,746*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, part of the 8,000*l.*, leaving 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* standing to that account. On the 20th of August 1847 there was transferred to them a sum of 1,146*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, which was on the 10th of February 1848 sold out and transferred. On the 9th of February 1848 they sold out and transferred the sum of 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, and the whole of the proceeds of the sales was received by W. A. Hunt.

Proceedings in Chancery being threatened against him on behalf of Mrs. Thorndike and her children in respect of this 8,000*l.* consols, W. A. Hunt the elder stated that the 4,746*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, part of it, had been invested on a mortgage, and in the month of August 1848 he procured W. C. Browne to execute to him the power of attorney before mentioned, and on the 8th of that month he caused 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, part of the sum of 5,160*l.* consols, then standing in the joint names of himself and W. C. Browne, to be transferred from that account to the names of himself and F. Cresswell.

Later in the month of August 1848, the first-mentioned suit of Thorndike v. Hunt, in which the defendants were W. A. Hunt the elder and F. Cresswell and C. F. Thorndike, the husband of the plaintiff, was instituted, to make W. A. Hunt and F. Cresswell liable in respect of their dealings with the 8,000*l.* consols, and to procure their removal from the trusteeship. The defendant W. A. Hunt, by his answer, alleged that the 8,000*l.* had been sold out in contemplation of a mortgage, but that the negotiations had been broken off, and that 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols had been repurchased by him. By an order made in that cause, on the 11th of January 1849, the defendants Hunt and Cresswell were ordered, on or before the 15th of February then next, to transfer into the name of the Accountant General, in trust in that cause, 5,000*l.* reduced annuities and 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols, admitted by the respective answers of those defendants to be standing in their names, subject to the further order of the Court, and without prejudice; and in pursuance of this order they transferred into court, to the credit of the cause of Thorndike v. Hunt, a sum of 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols.

By the decree in this suit, dated the 5th of June 1849, the defendants Hunt and Cresswell were ordered to transfer into court a sum of 4,746*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* consols, and the dividends thereon, and on the 5,000*l.* reduced annuities, and 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols already mentioned, were ordered to be paid to the plaintiff Mrs. Thorndike on her separate receipt. The defendants transferred the 4,746*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* into court, and there was then standing in trust in the cause of Thorndike v. Hunt the sum of 8,000*l.* consols, of which 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* was the same sum as was transferred from the names of W. A. Hunt and W. C. Browne to the names of the same W. A. Hunt and F. Cresswell, and it formed part of the funds subject to the trusts of the will of the testatrix Emily Linzee in favour of her daughters and their children.

W. A. Hunt became insolvent subsequently to this decree, and it was then discovered that he had made away with the whole of the sum of 5,160*l.* consols, so transferred into his name alone, and likewise with the whole of the said sum of 5,160*l.* like annuities transferred into the joint names of himself and W. C. Browne, excepting only the 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* transferred into court, in the cause Thorndike v. Hunt. The family of W. A. Hunt, the elder, claimed to be exclusively entitled to the remaining third part, viz. the 5,160*l.* consols and 75*l.* reduced annuities, which, upon the marriage of W. A. Hunt with Emily Woolridge Linzee, had been settled, and which was then vested in J. Butter and C. Shea. The second-mentioned suit was hereupon instituted by the children of W. C. Browne and Susannah Inman his wife, and the family of Mr. and Mrs. Woolridge against the other persons interested in the estate of the testatrix Emily Linzee.

The decree was made on the 26th of March 1857, and it directed that Butter and Shea should transfer the 5,160*l.* consols and the 75*l.* reduced annuities into court, to the credit of the second cause, to an account, "The account of funds subject to the trusts of the will of Emily Linzee, the testatrix," &c.; and inquiries were directed as to what sums of stock or money forming part of the estate of the said Emily Linzee had been received by the defendants W. A. Hunt and W. C. Browne, and by J. W. Woolridge, or any or either of them, and whether any, and what, proceedings should be taken as to the sums forming part of the testatrix's estate, which had been transferred to the credit of the cause Thorndike v. Hunt.

Mrs. Thorndike received the dividends as they became due on the said 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols. The plaintiffs in the second-mentioned suit presented their petition on the 10th of December 1857, in both of the above suits, whereby, after submitting that they were entitled to follow and receive back the said 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, they prayed that the Accountant General might be ordered to transfer the same to the credit of the cause Browne v. Butter, to an account, "The account of funds subject to the trusts of the will of Emily Linzee, the testatrix," &c.; and that proper directions might be given for recouping to the said trust estate the dividends which had been paid to the plaintiff Mary Anne Thorndike, and that the amount thereof until recouped might be declared a charge upon the dividends of the other funds in trust in Thorndike v. Hunt.

The Master of the Rolls, on hearing the petition, was of opinion that the funds out of which restitution was made by Hunt to Vinnecombe's estate were clearly part of Mrs. Emily Linzee's trust estate, and that the transfer of the fund by one who unrighteously had controul over it could not destroy the trusts. He therefore made an order according to the prayer of the petition. From that order the plaintiffs in Thorndike v. Hunt appealed.

For the appellants, it was contended that the 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* consols, which had been carried over to the credit of the cause Thorndike v. Hunt, was in the possession of the Court for the purposes of that suit, and could not now be disturbed. Mr. Hunt, the trustee, was a defaulting trustee, and had been ordered to transfer into court money he had wrongfully sold out, and having done so to the extent of the 3,253*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* from funds at his disposal, the parties beneficially interested in the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt had no knowledge of the source from whence the money so placed had been derived, and they being innocent parties, and the legal title to the fund having passed by the transfer, it was erroneous for the Master of the Rolls to make the order he had made. True, that the cestuis que trust under Mrs. Linzee's will would be the sufferers, inasmuch as the money was part of their fund which Mr. Hunt had transferred, under the order of the 11th of January 1849, yet, between parties equally innocent, if one must suffer, that party who had the legal title must prevail. The order of his Honour should be discharged.—On their behalf the following cases were referred to:—

Pitt v. Snowden, 3 Atk. 750.

Lloyd v. Attwood, Sugden's Vendor and Purchaser, 1182.

The Attorney General v. Magdalen College, 6 H.L. Cas. 189; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 620.

Warburton v. Hill, Kay, 470; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 633.

On behalf of the plaintiffs in the second suit, the parties interested under Mrs. Linzee's will, it was insisted that nothing could be more reasonable than that they should seek to have restored to them property which was undoubtedly theirs, and which their trustee had no right to transfer into the cause Thorndike v. Hunt. With respect to the legal title to the fund, it was to be observed that though it passed to the Accountant General of the Court by the transfer to him, it did so impressed with the trusts to which it was subject, namely, the trusts of Mrs. Linzee's will.

For Mrs. Hunt and her children it was argued that there had been no declaration of right by the Court further than a direction that Mrs. Thorndike should receive the dividends; and that a mere transfer of stock from one name to another, the identically same stock being all along in existence, could not alter the equities of the parties; and The Athenæum Insurance Company v. Pooley (1) was referred to.

In support of the case of Mrs. Woolridge and Mrs. Browne, it was urged that the transfer from Hunt and Browne to (1) Ante, p. 119.

Hunt and Cresswell was for a nominal consideration only. The equities between the two estates were not equal, for the estate of Mrs. Linzee had an earlier title to the fund, and the Master of the Rolls was quite correct in deciding in favour of that estate.—The following authorities were relied on:—

Lewin on Trustees, 3rd edit. p. 757, and cases there cited.

Taylor v. Plumer, 3 M. & S. 562, 574 (2).

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Francis Webb, for the appellants.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiff in Browne v. Butler.

Mr. Fellett and Mr. Rowcliffe, for Mrs. Hunt and her children.

Mr. Grenside, for Mrs. Woolridge and Mrs. Browne.

Mr. Francis Webb was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said that in this case two persons, who were trustees (under the will of George Elliott Vinnecombe) for the family of Mrs. Thorndike, the plaintiff in the first-mentioned suit, were personally charged with a sum of stock invested for the benefit of that family, and were bound to have it forthcoming at all times. Some doubts having arisen as to its safety, the first suit was instituted by Mrs. Thorndike and her infant children for enforcing this liability of the trustees. They put in their answer to the bill, and thereby admitted their liability, and further admitted that they had the whole fund in their hands. Upon this an order was made by the Court directing them to pay the fund thus admitted to be in their hands into court, for the purposes of the cause of Thorndike v. Hunt, or, in other words, for the purposes of the Thorndike trust. The transfer was made by the trustees, and from that moment the fund transferred was treated as belonging to the Thorndike trust. The legal title to the fund had therefore become vested in the Accountant General for the purposes only of the cause of Thorndike v. Hunt, which, as he had said, was the same thing as the Thorndike trust. But it now appeared that the defendants, the trustees against whom the order had been made, had provided themselves with the means of discharging themselves from their personal liability to pay the fund into court, by a new fraud, and that there were third parties whom they had cheated with that object. Therefore, the trustees, so far as they were alone concerned, had acted wrongfully. Nevertheless, the complete legal title in the fund transferred was, as his Lordship had already stated, already in the Accountant General, for the purposes solely of the suit of Mrs. Thorndike. The question that then arose was, whether any of the persons beneficially interested in the suit of Thorndike v. Hunt, or the solicitors of the plaintiffs, or their next friend, had notice of the circumstances, or of the want of title, or of the want of an equitable title or honest right in the trustees to make the transfer as they did? He (the Lord Justice) had waited in vain for the suggestion that the fact was so. For anything that appeared before the Court, neither the plaintiffs themselves nor their solicitors or next friend had any notice of the manner in which the trustees had become possessed of this money. Then, was the transfer a transfer for valuable consideration?—a question which must undoubtedly be answered in the affirmative. There was a debt due from the trustees; they were called upon to pay it, and if it was not paid they would have been liable to an execution upon their goods. If it had not been transferred into court, the property would have been obtained from them by other means. It would be impossible now to place the plaintiffs in the same position as if the trustees had not made this transfer of the fund. His Lordship was therefore of opinion that, however hardly it might operate on the persons on whom this fraud had been committed, it must be taken to be to all intents and purposes a purchase of property for a valuable consideration, without any notice as to the existence of any other title to it, and of which the purchaser (Mrs. Thorndike) had obtained the legal estate. It was, consequently, impossible to restore the fund to the original petitioners (the plaintiffs in the second-mentioned suit); for justice and the rules of this court alike required that the property should remain as it was under the order of January 1849. His Lordship, upon these considerations, dissented respectfully from the view which had been taken of the case by his Honour the Master of the Rolls. His Lordship and his learned Brother had thought it right to dispose of the petition solely upon the merits; but if their opinion had been the other way, he himself was not sure that it would have been right to dispose of the case on petition, although it might have been adding misfortune to misfortune to order another suit to be instituted. He was, therefore, glad that there was quite sufficient upon the merits to dispose of the question.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER added that he also was unfortunately unable to agree with His Honour's decision. Whatever equity there might have been against Cresswell before the transfer, that equity had been destroyed by the transfer. As soon as the transfer had taken place the fund came into the possession of this Court, and the beneficial interest in the fund was in the Thorndike family. Therefore, the petitioners upon the original petition had to make out a title against the Court, which had appropriated the fund to a particular trust. His Lordship concurred in the view that it was the best course to decide this case upon the merits, because it involved a question of great importance, as no person would be safe if he could not get funds out of court which had been paid in for his benefit, without making inquiry to whom the fund had originally belonged. But the case appeared to his Lordship clear, looking at it as a matter of form, that the original application was irregular; for it amounted, in fact, to trying an adverse title upon petition, without a bill having been filed. Therefore, on the ground of form, as well as of the merits, the petition ought to have been dismissed. There would, however, be no costs of the appeal on either side, and the deposit would be returned to the appellants.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Upon the matters appearing upon this petition my learned Brother and myself are of opinion that it is proper to call upon Mr. Warwick Augustus Hunt to shew cause on the first day of next term why he should not be struck off the Roll of Solicitors of the Court (3).

LORDS JUSTICES. } THE EARL OF MANSFIELD
March 25, 26. } v. OGLE.

Annuity—Arrears of—Interest on—Statutes, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

The chief clerk of one of the Vice Chancellors, in taking an account directed by the Court, certified that 1,002l. was due to J. P. in respect of the arrears of an annuity charged on real estate. The certificate was dated in November 1855. J. P. claimed interest on the debt from the date of the certificate being signed by the Judge, in November 1855, to the time of the hearing on further consideration, which a subsequent incumbrancer opposed:—Held (affirming a decision of the Vice Chancellor), that J. P. was not entitled as against a subsequent incumbrancer to such interest.

Whether, if the claim had been against the assets of the grantor, it would have prevailed—quære.

Interest on arrears of an annuity will not be given, except under special circumstances.

A certificate of the chief clerk finding money due is not "an order for payment," within the 18th section of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stuart, V.C., made on the 5th of February 1859.

The petitioner, the appellant, John Pearce, carried in a claim before the Master, as an annuity creditor upon the estate in question in this cause; but such claim was disallowed by the Master. Exceptions were taken to the Master's report, and on the 14th of February 1855 Vice

(3) On the 16th of April, the first day their Lordships sat in Easter term, an order was made, on the motion of Mr. Taylor, for this gentleman's name to be removed from the Roll, he not appearing either in person or by counsel to shew cause.

Chancellor Stuart ordered that those exceptions should be allowed, and that an account should be taken of what was due to the appellant in respect of his annuity, and that the place in which the incumbrance of the appellant stood in relation to the other incumbrances affecting the estates in the pleadings named should be stated. The chief clerk of the Vice Chancellor, by his certificate, dated the 19th of November 1855, found that there was due to the appellant in respect of his annuity, less income-tax, the sum of 1,002*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, and that the value of his annuity was 500*l.*, and that the appellant was entitled to stand as an incumbrancer on all the estates in question in the cause next after the plaintiff's mortgage for 34,000*l.* and interest. The cause came on for further consideration on the 22nd of July 1858, and the minutes, as issued by the registrar, provided for the payment to the appellant of the sum of 1,502*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, found by the certificate of the chief clerk to be due to him, with interest thereon at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, from the 19th of November 1855, the date of the chief clerk's certificate. A dispute, however, arose between the appellant and Henry Wheeler, one of the defendants, who was an incumbrancer on the estates in question subsequent to the charge thereon in respect of the appellant's annuity, as to the right of the appellant to interest on the sum of 1,002*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*; and as such dispute could not be settled before the closing of the offices for the long vacation, it was ultimately arranged that the order should provide for the payment to the appellant of the sum of 1,502*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, with interest on the sum of 500*l.*, the value of the annuity, from the date of the chief clerk's certificate, without prejudice to the appellant's right to interest from the same period on the sum of 1,002*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, and that such question should be brought before the Court. The order was thereupon passed and entered, and the appellant, Pearce, recovered the 1,502*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* and interest on the 500*l.* He, however, claimed a further sum of 116*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* as due to him for interest on the 1,002*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* from the date of the signing of the certificate, and that it might be paid out of a fund standing in court to the credit of the cause. The defendant Wheeler opposed this; and the Vice Chancellor decided against the claim (1).

Mr. Lee and Mr. Fooks, for the appellant, argued that the certificate of the chief clerk, when it had been signed by the Judge, was, in effect, and had the force of an order of the Court, by which the estates in question in the cause became charged with the amount of money which the

(1) In disposing of the case his Honour said that the petitioner asked that interest on the arrears of his annuity might now be computed and paid to him. The question was principally argued with reference to the statutes 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Independently of the operation of those acts, it was settled that, unless under extraordinary circumstances, the Court would not give interest on the arrears of an annuity; but it was said to be in the discretion of the Court, if circumstances justified it, to order such payment, and an attempt had been made to shew that such special circumstances existed here; but there were no special circumstances to distinguish the case from Booth v. Leycester (1). Therefore, if the present case was to be disposed of independently of the recent statutes, there could be no doubt that the claim of the petitioner must fail. It was argued that the act 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, which enacted that juries might in certain cases award interest, ought to induce this Court, by way of analogy, to award interest in this case; that contention, however, was concluded by authority, for in Re Powell's Trust (2) Vice Chancellor Turner decided that that statute had no such operation as to alter the law of the Court, which had been established with reference to questions of this kind. An appeal had been then made to the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the 18th and 19th sections of which were as follows:—

Section 18.—“That all decrees and orders of Courts of equity, and all rules of Courts of common law, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor, or of the Court of Review in matters of bankruptcy, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor in matters of lunacy, whereby any sum of money, or any costs, charges or expenses, shall be payable to any person, shall have the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law, and the persons to whom any such monies, or costs, charges or expenses, shall be payable, shall be deemed judgment creditors within the meaning of this act; and all powers hereby given to the Judges of the superior courts of common law with respect to matters depending in the same courts shall and may be exercised by Courts of equity with respect to matters therein depending, and by the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Review in matters of bankruptcy, and by the Lord Chancellor in matters of lunacy; and all remedies hereby given to judgment-creditors are in like manner given to persons to whom any monies, or costs, charges or expenses, are by such orders or rules respectively directed to be paid.”

“Section 19. That no judgment of any of the Court had by the signing of the certificate declared to be due to the appellant in respect of the arrears of his annuity. Independently of this consideration the certificate, when signed, was equivalent to a judgment debt, and as such carried interest like every judgment debt. As against Mr. Wheeler, who opposed the appellant's claim, registration was unnecessary under the 19th section of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, he (Wheeler) being a party to the cause, and having full notice of the appellant's claim; besides, registration under that section was only required for the safety of mortgagees and purchasers, but under section 18. of that statute, the certificate was a judgment for a debt on which interest would accrue. There was also an analogy in this case to those instances in which, under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, interest was given, at any rate, from the time at which the certificate of the chief clerk had been signed by the Judge. The respondent in the court below relied upon Booth v. Leycester (2) and Re Powell's Trust (3), but it was to be ob-said superior Courts, nor any decree or order in any court of equity, nor any rule of a Court of common law, nor any order in bankruptcy or lunacy, shall by virtue of this act affect any lands, tenements or hereditaments, as to purchasers, mortgagees or creditors, unless and until a memorandum or minute, containing the name and the usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and the court and the title of the cause or matter in which such judgment, decree, order or rule shall have been obtained or made, and the date of such judgment, decree, order or rule, and the amount of the debt, damages, costs or monies, thereby recovered or ordered to be paid shall be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, who shall forthwith enter the same," and so on.

So that by the 19th section the judgment or order of the Court, must, in order to bind lands, be registered. In the present case, there was neither registration, nor was there any order of the Court which could be registered; for there had been no order for payment. There was no other order made than that of August 1858. Thus there was wanting an order to which the provisions of the latter statute could apply, and the case was therefore thrown back on the old law. But finding that the law was settled by Booth v. Leycester, unless it could be shown that extraordinary circumstances existed to distinguish it from that case, the petition must fail. There were none, and the petition must be dismissed, with costs.

served that the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. had been passed since the date of the former case, and in the latter that statute is not even mentioned. Under all the circumstances, even if the Court should be of opinion that the present case was not within the words of the statute, it would hold, that it was one in which it would be proper to allow interest. They cited also—

Gawnt v. Taylor, 3 Myl. & K. 302; s.c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 135.

Mr. Wickens, for the defendant Wheeler, the subsequent incumbrancer, said that this was a case not between owner or grantor of an annuity and incumbrancer, but between second and third incumbrancers, and he relied upon Booth v. Leycester and Re Powell's Trust. He denied that the certificate of the chief clerk, even after it had been signed by the Judge, was an order of the Court in any sense. But even if it were to be so held, every order of the Court was, by section 19. of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, only equivalent to a judgment at law on being registered, which was not the case with this certificate, and therefore it had not the effect which had been attributed to it on behalf of the appellant. This case was governed by the general rules of law, and the appellant's claim for interest ought not to be allowed. He also cited Jenkins v. Briant (4).

Mr. Lee, in reply, referred to—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I abstain from saying what I should have thought of the present claim for interest if it had been made against the assets of Mr. Ogle the grantor of the annuity. The claim in this case is not so made, but it was made as against a subsequent incumbrancer, the benefit of whose security will be affected if the claim be allowed. As against such subsequent incumbrancer there is not the slightest ground for the claim for interest, and I think that the application wholly fails, and that the petition was rightly dismissed by the Vice Chancellor. The question was reserved by arrangement, but the appeal from the Vice Chancellor's decision wholly and entirely fails.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER. — This is an appeal from an order of Vice Chancellor Sir John Stuart, dismissing a petition for payment of interest on the arrears of an annuity as ascertained by the certificate of the chief clerk. The question here was not as to the arrears of the annuity as they accrued due, but only on the aggregate amount of the arrears as ascertained by the chief clerk. The application is at variance with all the rules of the Court applicable to this subject. The question was very much discussed in the case of Cress v. Hunter (5), where the Lord Chancellor of that day, Lord Loughborough, considered the question in all its bearings. But it may be said that the Court is now more in the habit of acting liberally in giving interest than at that time. There is, however, a decision of Lord St. Leonards in Ireland so late as 1842 to the same effect, in the case of Martyn v. Blake (6). The marginal note of that report fully explains the nature of that case, and is as follows: — "The established rule of this Court (which, however, is only general and not inflexible) is, that interest cannot be recovered upon the arrears of an annuity. But interest will be given upon the arrears of an annuity where the person bound to pay it has been a party to the deed by which it was created, and his acts disclose a system of gross misconduct and opposition to the Court for the purpose of evading payment. Mere legal delay is not a sufficient ground to induce the Court to give interest; nor will a mere covenant to pay an annuity be sufficient to create an exception to the general rule. But if there is a covenant to indemnify an annuitant against the effect of incumbrances, and the perception of the annuity has been prevented by the claims of incumbrancers, and especially if this has occurred in consequence of the acts of the covenantor, a case for damages under the covenant is clearly shewn, and this Court, in order to prevent circuitry of action, obtains jurisdiction to give interest upon the arrears of the annuity." That case clearly and very expressly lays down what I always understood to be the rule of the Court. But it was argued that that rule has been altered by the recent course of legislation on the subject, and two statutes have been referred to — the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The question as to the operation of the former statute had come before me in Re Powell's Trust. Of course, I place no reliance on my own judgment, but with Booth v. Leycester and Martyn v. Blake to guide me, I feel no difficulty. The latter of these cases disposes of the question which has been raised under the second statute. But, independently of Martyn v. Blake, I am of opinion that the certificate of the chief clerk is no order for payment within the 18th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. I think, therefore, that neither statute applies; nor can I find any special circumstances to take the case out of the operation of the two last-named cases. There is nothing to stop payment of the arrears except the necessary delay in carrying out the proceedings in the suit in this court: and legal delay is not sufficient to authorize the Court to order payment of interest on arrears. If this claim were allowed, and interest on the arrears given, why should not interest be allowed on the arrears of interest due on a bond? Every man, when he purchases an annuity, has in view repayment by instalments, and I do not see any difference in this respect between an annuity and the repayment of mortgage money. In truth, the Court is being asked to give interest on arrears of interest which have been ascertained by the chief clerk's certificate. Upon the whole case, I am quite clear that his Honour has most correctly decided this question; and my opinion is, that the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

SALTER v. BRADSHAW.
BRADSHAW v. SALTER.

Vendor and Purchaser—Reversion—Contract—Value—Evidence.

A young man of the age of twenty-two, being the owner of a reversionary interest in a freehold estate, contingent on his surviving his father and mother, whose respective ages were fifty-four and forty-seven, sold the same by private contract. There was a doubt whether the reversion was in fee or in tail, but no steps were taken to ascertain its market value. Upon the death of the surviving tenant for life, after a lapse of thirty-eight years, the vendor claimed payment of a charge upon the estate, unknown at the time of the purchase, and he instituted a suit to rescind the contract, on the ground of fraud and inadequacy of price, or otherwise to foreclose the equity of redemption:—Held, that a purchaser must, under such circumstances, satisfy the Court, by evidence taken at the time of purchase, that the purchase was bona fide and for full value; but that in the absence of such evidence the purchase must be set aside.

The suit of Salter v. Bradshaw was instituted on the 10th of May 1856 by the Rev. Henry George Salter, to set aside certain deeds dated the 20th and 21st of February 1818, and a fine levied thereon in pursuance of an agreement entered into with William Bradshaw, deceased, for the purchase of the plaintiff's reversionary interest in divers messuages, lands and hereditaments situate in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, in the county of Middlesex. Should this fail, the bill in the alternative prayed for an account of certain charges on the estate and payment, or otherwise for a foreclosure. The suit of Bradshaw v. Salter was instituted on the 21st of January 1857, by Mary Ann Bradshaw and her children, to have the deeds which had been executed carried into effect, and for the specific performance of the contract.

By a deed, dated the 30th of December 1795, made in contemplation of a marriage between James Salter and Elizabeth King Busby, it was agreed that divers messuages, lands and hereditaments situate in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, in the county of Middlesex, to which Elizabeth Busby was entitled absolutely, should be conveyed to trustees, upon trust after the marriage to pay the rents to J. Salter for life, with remainder to Elizabeth Busby for life, and after the decease of the survivor to be equally divided between the issue of the marriage, if any, share and share alike.

The intended marriage was solemnized on the 31st of December 1795, and the plaintiff H. G. Salter was born on the 12th of October 1796, but there was never any other issue of the marriage.

By indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 20th and 21st of November 1796, made between J. Salter and Elizabeth King, his wife, of the one part, Edward Augustus Butcher and George Jocelyn Robinson, of the other part, and by a fine sur connissance de droit come eco, the messuages, lands and hereditaments at Bethnal Green, the estate of Mrs. Salter, were limited and assured to the use of J. Salter for life, with remainder to the use of Elizabeth King for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to such uses and upon such trusts for the benefit of the issue of the marriage as expressed in the deed of the 30th of December 1795, to the intent that the issue of the body of J. Salter on the body of Elizabeth King, his wife, might have such estate therein as was therein agreed to be limited; and after the determination of the several estates, to the use of the child, if only one, and if more than one, then of all the children of J. Salter on the body of Elizabeth King Salter, his wife, to be equally divided between them, as tenants in common in tail, with cross-remainders between them in tail; and on failure of issue of all such children, to the use of the survivor of the said J. Salter and his wife in fee simple.

The messuages, lands and hereditaments in question formed part of larger estates which, under the 49 Geo. 3. cap. cx., were partitioned and divided between the parties entitled. It was now alleged that the share of Mrs. Salter was subject to a charge of 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and also to a further charge of 336*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, the costs of the partition.

These two sums were said to have been paid by J. Salter out of his own money.

By an indenture, dated the 16th of May 1810, J. Salter, to the intent that the two sums of 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and 436*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* might be kept on foot as subsisting charges, assigned the same to John Miers, in trust for J. Salter, his executors, administrators and assigns; and by the same indenture Lorenzo Stable, in whom the residue of two terms of 500 and 600 years in the estate were vested, declared that he, his executors, administrators and assigns would stand possessed of the premises during the terms for securing the payment of the said sums and interest.

On the 28th of January 1818, H. G. Salter, who was then in the twenty-second year of his age, and was studying the law under Mr. Serj. Manning, signed an agreement to sell to W. Bradshaw, for 1,200*l.*, the absolute reversion of all that freehold estate situate in the parish of Bethnal Green, consisting of divers messuages, &c. as described in the 3rd Schedule of 49 Geo. 3. cap. cx.; all of which W. Bradshaw was to become entitled to on the decease of the survivor of James Salter, aged fifty-four, and Eliza King, his wife, aged forty-seven, and H. G. Salter thereby engaged to make out, at his own expense, a perfect title to the reversion, and execute a proper conveyance thereof to W. Bradshaw and his heirs, as he or they should direct, and also to pay the expense of such conveyance, which was to be prepared by W. Bradshaw, who agreed to pay the purchase-money upon the execution of such conveyance.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 20th and 21st of February 1818, which recited the title of the vendor, and that he was entitled either to an estate in tail or in fee, H. G. Salter, in consideration of 1,200*l.*, less 39*l.* 13*s.*, towards the expense of the conveyance, granted and released all the several messuages, lands and hereditaments, with their appurtenances, to W. Bradshaw, his heirs and assigns, for all the estate and interest which H. G. Salter had or could or might grant therein, subject to the estates for the lives of J. Salter and Eliza King, his wife, and the life of the survivor of them, and subject also to the contingency that there might be other issue of the marriage, and subject to the land-tax thenceforth payable for the same, and subject to the leases and power of leasing given to the tenant for life by the act of parliament.

The deed then contained a covenant to levy a fine sur conuzance, &c., and also after the death of the surviving tenant for life to suffer a recovery to the use of W. Bradshaw, his heirs and assigns.

In Hilary Term, 58 Geo. 3, H. G. Salter accordingly levied a fine of the estate to the uses declared in the deed of release of the 21st of February 1818.

H. G. Salter, by his bill, now alleged, that at the time of entering into the contract he was in embarrassed circumstances, that he had pressing occasion for money, that several actions at law had been brought against him for the recovery of debts due from him; that he had then been twice recently arrested for debt, and that he was threatened by other creditors with legal proceedings for debts due from him; that with a view to extricate himself from his difficulties he applied to G. A. Hill, and that through him he was introduced to W. Bradshaw, and that being ignorant of such matters and trusting that W. Bradshaw, who was aware of his difficulties, would deal fairly with him, and being without any available advice or assistance, except that of G. A. Hill, he left the matter wholly to them, and that they accordingly prepared the agreement which he signed.

The bill also stated that H. G. Salter was wholly ignorant either of the rental or value of the property, or of his interest therein; that H. G. Salter subsequently met W. Bradshaw and G. A. Hill at the Grecian Coffee House, and then executed the deeds of the 20th and 21st of February 1818.

The bill then alleged that the deeds were prepared by W. Bradshaw or his solicitor, that no draft was ever perused by H. G. Salter or by any person on his behalf; that the deeds were never explained to him before their execution, but that, on the contrary, they were produced by Messrs. Hill and Bradshaw ready drawn and prepared for execution, and without the fact of the sale being known to J. Salter, from whom, at the request of Messrs. Bradshaw and Hill, it was carefully concealed.

At the execution of the deed W. Bradshaw paid G. A. Hill 1,200*l.*, less 800*l.*, which by arrangement previously entered into, G. A. Hill was to receive and apply in satisfaction of some of H. G. Salter's debts, but he neglected to discharge them, so that the plaintiff received out of the purchase-money 900*l.* only, and the sum of 6*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, the last sum being returned by W. Bradshaw out of 20*l.* retained by him to pay the bill of costs of his, W. Bradshaw's, solicitors.

The bill also alleged that the reversionary interest, whether calculated according to the tables or the market-price thereof, was of much larger value at the time of the execution of the deeds than the consideration-money paid, regard being had to the age of J. Salter and his wife, and to the fact that there had never been any issue of the marriage other than himself.

It was also alleged that the estates conveyed to W. Bradshaw were for the purposes of partition, as stated in the 3rd Schedule to the 49 Geo. 3. cap. cx., valued at 7,603*l.*; that William Bradshaw had estimated the difference in value between an absolute reversionary interest and a reversion subject to the contingency of there being any other child or children of James Salter and his wife at one-seventh part of the value of the reversion as an absolute reversion.

By an indenture, dated the 15th of March 1847, and duly registered in Middlesex, James Salter assigned the two sums of 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and the 436*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, and all interest thereon, to H. G. Salter, his executors, administrators and assigns.

Elizabeth King Salter died on the 25th of June 1839, and James Salter died on the 25th of January 1855.

The bill then charged that the deeds of the 20th and 21st of February 1818, and the fine levied thereon, were parts of one transaction, and that they ought to stand as a security only for the amount actually advanced by W. Bradshaw, with interest from the time of advance.

W. Bradshaw, by his will, dated the 22nd of January 1853, gave all his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates unto and to the use of his wife Mary Ann Bradshaw, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust for the benefit of herself and her children, and he appointed his wife executrix of his will. The testator died on the 12th of July 1855.

The bill then charged that the 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and the 436*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* were still due to H. G. Salter, with an arrear of interest, and submitted that he was entitled to an account of what was due in the event of the deeds of the 20th and 21st of February 1818 being upheld.

It also charged that Messrs. Miers and Stable were both dead, and that there was not now any legal personal representative of either of them.

The defendants by their answer stated, they believed that the terms of 500 and 600 years in the hereditaments had been assigned to Lorenzo Stable to attend the uses declared on the estates by the deeds of the 20th and 21st of November 1796; that at the time of the purchase of the reversion it was doubtful whether H. G. Salter was entitled to the estates in tail or in fee, but that they did not know whether the estates were subject to the payment of the 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and 436*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*; that the facts relative to the purchase were drawn from documents; that the reversion was offered to W. Bradshaw through W. G. Williams, an auctioneer, who was instructed by H. G. Salter; that after several interviews with the plaintiff, who was accompanied by Mr. Davison, a solicitor, who either was or had been a clerk to Mr. Hill, Bradshaw agreed to become the purchaser; that the agreement was prepared and executed and witnessed by John Williams, a brother of the auctioneer; that abstracts of title were obtained from Messrs. Aldridge & Colley Smith, the solicitors of James Salter; that they were laid before counsel, with whom H. G. Salter himself had several interviews; that W. Bradshaw hesitated to complete the purchase in consequence of the difficulties and contingencies stated in counsel's opinion, but that, finally, W. Bradshaw agreed to complete the purchase, and he instructed Messrs. Robinson & Hine, his solicitors, to levy the fine; that fair copies of the conveyance and fine were sent to Mr. Hill to peruse, on behalf of H. G. Salter, and were returned by him signed and approved on behalf of H. G. Salter; that the engrossments were prepared and subsequently sent to Mr. Hill for examination on behalf of the plaintiff, and that H. G. Salter afterwards attended the Judge, and passed the fine. The defendants also denied that W. Bradshaw had any knowledge of H. G. Salter's embarrassed circumstances, as alleged in the bill. They also denied that W. Bradshaw had, before purchasing the estate, any knowledge of the charge of the 16th of May 1810, and submitted that the plaintiff could not be permitted to set it up, as W. Bradshaw was a purchaser without notice. They also said that H. G. Salter had a copy of the act of parliament in his possession, and that he could not have been ignorant of the rental and value of the estate, as they were expressly stated therein.

The defendants, however, to put an end to litigation, offered to pay the two sums of 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and 436*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, with interest from the death of J. Salter, if the Court would sanction it, on behalf of the infant defendants, upon H. G. Salter executing a conveyance under the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries.

They then stated the fact, that the deeds of the 20th and 21st of February 1818 were executed at a special meeting, and that H. G. Salter was attended by G. A. Hill, his solicitor, and Mr. Bradshaw by William Hine, his solicitor; that a fair copy of the draft of the deed had been sent to Mr. Hill, and approved by him on behalf of Mr. Salter; that the engrossments had in like manner been sent and examined by him; and that the deeds were drawn by counsel. They also denied the allegation that the sale was made at the desire of G. A. Hill and W. Bradshaw, or either of them, or that it was carefully concealed from James Salter, or that any such desire was expressed; that the whole 1,200*l.*, less 39*l.* 13*s.* towards the expense of the fine and conveyance, was paid to the plaintiff, and that 6*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* out of the 39*l.* 13*s.* was subsequently paid to H. G. Salter, as the sum payable at the King's Silver Office on account of the fine was less than contemplated; that the deeds were registered in Middlesex; and that notice was served on the trustees of the estate, and of the terms existing therein; that considering the contingencies existing,

the possibility of the estate being lost by H. G. Salter dying a bachelor, and of other children of his father and mother being born, the 1,200*l.* was the full value of the reversion depending on two lives of the respective ages of fifty-four and forty-seven years, and though the estate for partition had been valued at 7,603*l.*, still it was without reference to deductions for insurance, repairs, or rates, and land and other taxes; and, lastly, they submitted that H. G. Salter was not entitled to the relief asked, on account of the lapse of time, and his laches in filing the bill, as most of the persons concerned in the purchase were dead, and their evidence lost to the defendants.

The evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff was by the clerk of a surveyor and an auctioneer, who stated that, considering the nature of the reversionary interest and the condition of the premises in February 1818, so far as it could be ascertained, and the contingencies and other circumstances, the market value of the reversionary interest when purchased was 1,719*l.* The only other evidence was, that G. A. Hill was a solicitor much concerned in speculative money transactions.

From the evidence, on behalf of the defendants, it appeared that at the time of the partition the rental was estimated at 420*l.* a year, and that 277*l.* 10*s.* arose from tenancies at will. The several witnesses, who were either auctioneers or actuaries of insurance offices in the city of London, upon computations now made estimated the market value of the absolute reversion in fee, one at 1,573*l.*, which, for the doubt whether the plaintiff was tenant in fee or in tail, and on account of the contingency of there being other children, he reduced to 1,100*l.*; another at 1,520*l.*, which, with the doubt on the title, the contingency of another child and the leasing power, he reduced to 1,080*l.*; another at 1,600*l.*, which, for the same reasons, he reduced to 1,100*l.*; another at 1,360*l.*, which, with the doubts and contingencies, he reduced to 1,006*l.*; another at 1,365*l.*, which, for the same reasons, he reduced to 1,008*l.*; and these sums were again further reduced, if the reversion had been sold, subject to the 769*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* now claimed. They all also said that the reversion would have been of a still less value if the life of H. G. Salter was to have been insured against the lives of his father and mother.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. W. H. Terrell, for H. G. Salter, insisted that the purchase had been made at an under value, and that in the absence of proof that the full market value had been paid, the transaction would be set aside, especially as the purchase was made from an expectant heir, a young man wholly dependent on his father, and in greatly embarrassed circumstances.

Bowes v. Heaps, 3 Ves. & B. 117.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Follett and Mr. Sheffield, for the defendants.—This purchase was made bond fide; it was without fraud or imposition, which was not proved, and which could not be implied from inadequacy of price. If this transaction were set aside, it would render reversions nearly unsaleable. There was a fair doubt whether the vendor was entitled in tail or in fee; there was the chance of other issue of his father and mother being born, and being a bachelor, there was the chance of his never marrying and dying in the lifetime of his parents: all these circumstances would reduce the value. There were allegations in the bill that the whole purchase-money had not been paid; the proof, however, was directly the reverse. The evidence given by the plaintiff as to the value was altogether unsatisfactory and indefinite, but the testimony on behalf of the defendants was, that more than the value had been paid. The tenants for life had large powers of dealing with the property. They could alter its entire character; it was liable to become, not only dilapidated, but unproductive for long periods; it was also liable to insurance, rates and taxes, as well as to the costs of collecting the rents. The difficulty of proving the death of the tenants for life, as well as the probable chance of litigation to obtain the possession, was also to be considered. It was manifest, therefore, that the sum paid exceeded the market value of the reversion. These difficulties had been so much felt that Mr. Bradshaw had hesitated to complete the contract. It was, however, completed, the risks had been run, thirty-eight years had elapsed since the transaction, and this suit was now most ungraciously instituted, when the purchaser and nearly all the parties to the transaction were dead. The laches of the plaintiff, therefore, would, alone, prevent his getting the relief asked. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed.—

Meure v. Meure, 2 Atk. 265.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—My impression is, that the contract cannot stand. I assume that there were doubts existing as to whether the vendor was entitled in fee or in tail, and the purchaser has the right to all the benefits arising upon them, and my impression is, that the vendor was tenant in tail; but still the purchaser, when called upon at any time, must shew that he gave full value for the reversion. The plaintiff was not required to go into evidence to shew the value of the reversion. It is impossible for me to say that the sum paid was the full value; no estimate of the value appears to have been made, though the value of the estate was stated in the act of parliament nine years before this transaction. I cannot, however, act upon the presumption that the property was of a given value forty years ago. In Edwards v. Burt the property was small; an actuary had there been employed; the Lords Justices, however, were of opinion that there was no proof that the full market value of the property had been given, and they set the transaction aside. In this case no estimate was made by any competent person at the time. I will, however, look at the papers, to see what notes were made by W. Bradshaw himself at the time, and give my judgment to-morrow.

July 21.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is established by modern decisions that the purchaser of a reversionary interest must satisfy the Court that he at the time bona fide gave full value for the interest purchased. In order, therefore, to maintain the validity of the transaction, it is essential that he should preserve abundant evidence that at the time of the purchase the price paid was the full value, and that the reversion purchased was of no greater value than that which he gave for it. In the present case not only has he not preserved any such evidence, but he has made it impossible to obtain any such evidence. It is out of the question to suppose that the Court can arrive at a satisfactory conclusion by any speculative opinions upon what the probable value of the reversion was at the time; it is not what the value of this particular property was nine years before, or what it is at the present time, that is to be considered. It is a perfectly bona fide case, but the purchaser has thought fit not to preserve any evidence of the value, nor to ascertain at the time what the value of it was; that is very clearly shewn; and circumstances, now that it has fallen in, have made it impossible now to ascertain what the value was. I think, also, that the time since the purchase was made cannot be reckoned at all, although I should feel disposed to give the purchaser every advantage that could be derived from the great length of time that has elapsed, viz., forty-one years, since the transaction took place; but, then, the reversion did not fall into possession until the 25th of January 1855, and the bill was filed a year after. If it could have been shewn that great pains had been taken to ascertain what was the value at the time of purchase, that a person had been employed to value the reversion, but that by reason of death, or other circumstances, that evidence had been lost and could not now be ascertained, it would have been a matter of great importance, but it is proved that the value was not ascertained; and the result is, that the transaction complained of in the suit of Salter v. Bradshaw must be set aside, but I shall not give costs on either side. The suit of Bradshaw v. Salter must be dismissed, but without costs.

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Subsequent Incumbrancers—Sale.

*A first mortgagee filed a bill of foreclosure, and asked for a decree. Subsequent incumbrancers asked, under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 48, for a sale of the mortgaged estates. The plaintiff not consenting, the Court directed the subsequent incumbrancers to deposit a sum of 200*l.* to cover the expense of any ineffectual attempt to sell, and also directed a reserved bidding to be fixed sufficient to cover the amount due to the plaintiff, and made an order for sale of the estates within a given time, and foreclosure in default.*

The plaintiff, as first mortgagee, instituted a suit to obtain a foreclosure of divers freehold estates, which had been conveyed to him in fee to secure the payment of 7,000*l.*, which was due, together with an arrear of interest.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Renshaw, for the plaintiff, asked for the usual decree of foreclosure.

Mr. Osborne Morgan, for subsequent incumbrancers, asked the Court to exercise the discretion given to it by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 48, and to direct a sale of the estate.—

Boydell v. Manby, 9 Hare, App. liii.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—When a first mortgagee withholds his consent to the sale of the estate, not only have I usually required a deposit sufficient to cover the expense of an abortive attempt to sell, but I have also directed a reserved bidding to be fixed, that there may be sufficient to pay the amount which may be ultimately found due upon the first mortgage. If, therefore, the incumbrancer who desires the sale deposits a sum of 200*l.* within a week after the chief clerk shall have fixed a reserved bidding and given his certificate, I will order a sale of the estate; but if it should not be sold within six months, all the parties must stand foreclosed.

Will—Probate Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77.
—Discovery in Aid of Proceedings in the Court of Probate—Injunction.

The old rule that the Court would not admit a bill of discovery in aid of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court is not applicable to the case of a bill for discovery in aid of proceedings in the Probate Court, that Court not having the same power of compelling discovery as the Ecclesiastical Court had.

An heir-at-law having been cited to see proceedings commenced in the Probate Court for the purpose of proving the testator's will in solemn form, filed several pleas denying the validity of the will, and filed a bill of discovery in aid of his pleas, and moved for an injunction to stay proceedings until answer. Interrogatories not having been filed, the motion was refused, with costs, but leave was given to move on a future day, after the interrogatories should have been filed.

This was a motion to stay proceedings in a suit in the Probate Court, promoted by the defendant, to prove in solemn form per testes the will of Hugh Fuller, dated the 1st of March 1851 (whereby the defendant was constituted sole executor and residuary legatee and devisee), until the defendant should have put in a full and perfect answer to the plaintiff's bill. The testator died on the 5th of September 1858, and on the 9th of November the defendant commenced a suit in the Court of Probate against Eleanor Fuller, one of the next-of-kin, for the purpose of proving the will in solemn form of law, and on the 23rd of November the plaintiff was served, as the heir-at-law, with a citation to see the proceedings in the suit, and duly appeared. On the 16th of December the defendant filed his declaration, propounding the will, and on the 11th of January 1859 the plaintiff filed the following pleas:—First, that the alleged will was not executed according to the provisions of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26); secondly, that the deceased, at the date of the alleged will, was not of perfect sound mind, memory and understanding; thirdly, that at, and for many years previous to the date of the alleged will, the deceased had been in a condition of mental imbecility, and had fallen, and at the time aforesaid was under the entire controul and guidance of the plaintiff Ingram and of one Henry Hudson, named as a legatee and devisee in the alleged will, and that the alleged will was signed by the deceased while in such state of mental imbecility, and by means of and under the influence and controul of the plaintiff Ingram and Hudson and their agents. On the 14th of January, replication was filed, and issue was joined on the 22nd of January, and the cause was set down for hearing in the Court of Probate. The bill in the present suit was filed on the 22nd of February. After stating the above facts, it proceeded to charge various matters tending to prove the insanity of the testator and undue influence, and prayed for a discovery of the same matters, and an injunction to restrain the proceedings in the Probate Court until answer.

At the time of bringing on the motion interrogatories had not been filed.

Mr. Roll and Mr. Cracknall, in support of the motion.

Mr. James and Mr. Hislop Clarke, for the defendant, objected that the motion could not be made until interrogatories had been filed—Lovell v. Galloway (1), Lloyd v. Adams (2). No discovery could be obtained in this Court in aid of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, because that Court was fully capable of coming at the discovery itself—Dun v. Coates (3), The Earl of Derby v. the Duke of Athol (4); and the Court of Probate had, by the 24th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, full power to compel discovery. They referred also to the 4th and 29th sections of the act.

WOOD, V.C.—It is impossible to proceed without the interrogatories, or that the injunction can be moved for until they are filed, and upon that part of the case I shall dismiss this motion, with costs; but I shall give the plaintiff leave to serve a fresh notice of motion for Monday. With regard to the other part of the case, I am satisfied that the Court of Probate has not, under the recent act, the same power which the old Court possessed as to wills of personal estate; but clearly it has not a similar power as to real estate in a contest between the devisee and the heir-at-law. The powers given by the act are certainly no more than the old powers of the Ecclesiastical Court as to wills of personal estate. The power given by the 61st section of citing the heir to see proceedings is an entirely new power, and, of course, the act does not touch the question of the right of the heir to have the will of real estate proved. But, even if it were so, and such power as to wills of real estate were given by the act, the proceedings must be according to the rules laid down, and in those rules there is nothing analogous to the old process by allegation and counter-allegation and responsive allegation in the nature of a bill and cross-bill. Therefore, the defence cannot be made to rest upon the process of the old court, for the old rules do not apply to the new course of proceeding, and accordingly, though I agree with Mr. James, that this Court would not interfere with the old Ecclesiastical Court, it cannot be said that it will not interfere, because the Court of Probate has power to compel discovery, for the question must rest upon the new powers. But the powers of this Court are not abrogated by the powers conferred upon another Court, and fortunately so, for those powers do not seem to me to be sufficient.—[His Honour read the 24th section.]—The first part of that section seems certainly to refer to the examination of witnesses. It is possible the Court of Probate may examine witnesses upon interrogatories, but a question might arise whether, when you have the answer to the interrogatory as to documents, you could enforce the production of those documents, as you can in equity. When you come to look at the Rules and Orders, there is a clause (81.) relating to applications for the production of instruments purporting to be testamentary, but I find nothing relating to any other documents. Then, all the directions as to the trial are in the common form applicable to ordinary trials at common law, and nothing else.

NEW SERIES, XXVIII.—CHANC.

I very much fear that if the powers given by this act to the Court of Probate were required to be put in force, there would be the same difficulty as has been found in the courts of common law as to obtaining discovery. No one would rejoice more than I should to find that entire jurisdiction was vested in that Court, but I can see nothing in the act which satisfies me that the Court of Probate has such full powers. It has been objected that this application has been made for the purposes of delay, but the defendant, being in possession, will be no sufferer by the delay; but if he is allowed to proceed and prove the will in solemn form, the plaintiff will be precluded for ever. No doubt, in some cases, that would be very useful, but it is a very serious proceeding, and would affect the plaintiff far more seriously than this injunction can affect the defendant. It is very important for the heir to collect such facts as he can from the evidence of others. He must get his facts well together before he comes to a conclusion upon the case, and, after all, the delay will not be very great. I cannot conceive, under these circumstances, that the heir is to be concluded before discovery made. As I said before, the motion must be refused, with costs, on the ground that interrogatories have not been filed, but I shall give leave to serve notice of motion for Monday on filing interrogatories.

MARRIAGE v. SKIGGS.

Administration of Estate—Injunction—Judgment by Creditor before Probate—Sale before Decree—Bills of Exchange Act.

A testator died indebted on bills of exchange. The creditor, before the executors proved the will, issued a writ under the Bills of Exchange Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67.), and, the executors not appearing, the creditor signed judgment and levied on the goods of the testator in the hands of the executors, and the sheriff sold. Specialty creditors of the testator afterwards took out an administration summons and obtained a decree at the Rolls, and moved to restrain the sheriff from parting with the money arising from the sale, and that the money should be paid into court, and the same was ordered by the Master of the Rolls:—Held, upon appeal (reversing his Honour's order), that as the money was in the hands of the sheriff at the suit of the creditor on the bills of exchange before the decree in the administration suit, the motion must be refused, with costs.

This was an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls, granting an injunction and ordering money to be paid into court on motion in a suit instituted by summons by Mr. Marriage and others, specialty creditors of Robert Skiggs, against Charles John Skiggs and Frederick Kent, the executors of his will, for the administration of his estate. The facts were these:—The plaintiffs (the specialty creditors) moved that the Sheriff of Essex might be restrained by injunction from further proceeding under a writ of execution against the goods and chattels of Robert Skiggs, deceased, in the hands of the defendants Skiggs and Kent, obtained in an action at law, by the London and County Bank, against the above-named defendants, as executors of Robert Skiggs, and from paying the monies levied under such execution to the London and County Bank; and that the London and County Bank might be restrained from receiving such monies; and that such monies might be paid into court, to the credit of this matter and cause.

It appeared that Robert Skiggs died on the 4th of October 1858, indebted to the London and County Bank, in respect of four bills of exchange for 414*l.* 1*s.* altogether, and on the 30th of December 1858 they issued a writ of summons, under the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855, (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67), against the defendants Charles John Skiggs and Frederick Kent, who were appointed executors of the will, and on the 1st of January 1859 served the same on them, and on the 15th of January judgment was signed thereon, for want of appearance by the defendants; and the London and County Bank immediately issued and lodged with the Sheriff of Essex a writ of fi. fa. for 418*l.* 19*s.* for debt and costs, and on the 17th of January the sheriff executed the writ by levying goods and chattels of Robert Skiggs in the hands of the executors, and on the 27th of January sold a portion of the goods and chattels, which produced the amount of the debt and costs, except about 47*l.* On the 4th of February the sheriff sold a further portion of the goods and chattels, and thereby realized the remainder of the debt and costs.

It further appeared, that on the 22nd of January, the defendants obtained grant of probate of the will of the testator Robert Skiggs; and on the same day the plaintiffs (the specialty creditors) took out an administration summons in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls, and on the 5th of February the usual order was made for the administration of the testator's estate.

On the 29th of January, the plaintiffs served the sheriff with notice of the administration summons, and that the plaintiffs were specialty creditors of the testator, and entitled to be paid in priority to the debt of the London and County Bank, and requiring him to retain the monies produced by the sale of the testator's goods under the said levy. The London and County Bank denied that they had notice of any specialty debts of the testator until the service of the notice on the sheriff.

The motion was heard, before the Master of the Rolls, on the 8th of February, when his Honour said:—"I am of opinion that I must grant the injunction, but without prejudice to the rights of the creditor under the execution. The question is new, and is one of great importance. No doubt, if a party obtains possession of goods of a testator before probate, he may be sued as executor de son tort. But has probate relation back, so as to make everything good that has been done before? I think that may be doubtful, and whether this Court cannot, before the money has been parted with by the sheriff, and whilst the rights of the parties remain unchanged, interfere to stay the proceedings at law. If the money were in the hands of the creditor, he might be entitled to retain it; but whether, where the money has not been paid over to the creditor, he is entitled to it, I express no opinion; but if he is, then the practice of this Court in appointing a receiver of the estate of a testator pending proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts with reference to the grant of probate, which proceeds upon the assumption that until probate is granted you cannot tell who to sue, is certainly wrong; and it is clear that a party named executor may, by collusion, allow the simple contract creditors of a testator to sweep away the estate; whilst, on the other hand, in this court, it is also certain that you cannot obtain a decree against a person for administration before probate is granted. I shall grant the motion, without prejudice to any question as to the right of the creditor to the money the produce of the sale. The money must be paid into a separate account, to mark it."

From this order the London and County Bank appealed.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. H. Stevens, for the appellants, said it was to be observed, that the London and County Bank had no notice whatever of the existence of any specialty debts of the testator until some time after they had commenced their action on the bills of exchange, and the first notice of any allegation of there being such debts was the notice served upon them by the plaintiffs in this suit, on the 29th of January 1859. They contended that the sale of the goods in satisfaction of the judgment obtained by them under the proceedings in the action they had brought under the Bills of Exchange Act, and the proceeds of the sale, became the moment it reached the hands of the sheriff the absolute property of the bank, and it was then too late to ask the Court to interfere to prevent their obtaining the benefit of their diligence. In support of these propositions, they cited—

Giles v. Grover, 9 Bing. 128.

Ranken v. Harwood, 5 Hare, 215; s.c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 496.

Williams on Executors, 5th edit. p. 1730, et seq., and the cases there cited.

From the law as laid down at page 255 of the same treatise, it was plain that the probate when obtained had relation back to the time of the death of the testator, and vested the property in the executor, and for that reason a judgment obtained against the executor before probate was perfectly good against all the world—Vincent v. Godson (1). They confidently trusted the Court would not restrain execution to the full extent on a judgment obtained, and in all other respects perfected before decree, and would reverse the order of the Master of the Rolls.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Nalder, in support of the order of the Master of the Rolls, contended that after decree in a suit for administration, this Court will restrain proceedings on a judgment at law by creditors de bonis testatoris—Clarke v. the Earl of Ormonde (2) and Drewry v. Thacker (3), though judgment had been obtained in an action before the decree—Egan v. Baldwin (4). Even a sale by the sheriff of the goods levied under an execution issued on a judgment obtained before probate would not enable the creditor to intercept the administration of the estate of a testator under a decree of this Court—Kent v. Pickering (5), Burles v. Popplewell (6) and Kirby v. Barton (7).

Mr. Wickens, for the Sheriff of Essex, submitted to any order the Court might please to make.

Mr. Southgate, for the executors, did the same.

Mr. Roundell Palmer was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that money was in the hands of the Sheriff of Essex at the suit of the creditor, before the decree in the administration suit; therefore, in his Lordship's opinion, the decree could not affect the rights of the creditor, for the fact that he was actually a creditor was not in dispute. The only question for consideration, therefore, was, whether there had been any irregularity in the proceedings at law. There might possibly be a question whether an executor could properly be made a defendant under the Bills of Exchange Act; and although his Lordship would give no opinion whether the executor in the present case might have objected to that proceeding, still, as between themselves and the general creditors of the testator, he was of opinion that they were not obliged to take that line of defence. He thought that the injunction must be refused, and that the plaintiffs must pay all the costs, both before his Honour the Master of the Rolls and in this court.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER concurred.—He was not aware of any authority—and none had been cited in the argument—which would sanction this Court in restraining a creditor to the extent contended for by the plaintiffs. After commenting on the judgment of Lord Eldon in Clarke v. the Earl of Ormonde, and referring to Ranken v. Harwood, he expressed his opinion to be also that the order of his Honour the Master of the Rolls must be reversed, with costs.

Production of Documents—Privilege—Examination of Plaintiffs in Bankruptcy—Evidence for Defendants.

A. and B. had dealings together. B. afterwards became bankrupt, and A. filed a bill against B.'s assignees to establish the dealings. The defendants admitted the possession of copies of the examination of A. before the Commissioners, but refused to produce them, on the ground of privilege, as being evidence given in support of the defence. The Court (overruling a decision of the Master of the Rolls) discharged an order for their production, considering that they ought not to be produced until the hearing of the cause.

This suit was instituted against the assignees in bankruptcy of one Christal, to establish the validity of a security obtained by the plaintiff from the bankrupt before his bankruptcy for monies advanced to him.

The assignees had disputed the security in the Court of Bankruptcy, and the plaintiff and other witnesses had been examined before the Commissioner with respect to the transaction referred to.

The bill having been filed, a summons at chambers was taken out by the plaintiff for production of documents by the defendants, who admitted the possession of certain documents, and amongst them of copies of the depositions of the plaintiff and the other witnesses in the bankruptcy, but refused to produce the depositions, contending that they were privileged as forming part of their case, and as parts of the evidence which the defendants were getting up with reference to the dispute which was the subject-matter of the suit.

At the hearing, before the Master of the Rolls, his Honour said the documents were not privileged. All the examinations relating to the subject-matter of the suit must be produced. He concurred generally, that as to all documents for getting up the defendants' case, the plaintiff was not entitled to see them; but proceedings in the same matter, either before a Court of law or a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, the plaintiff might require to be produced. Take a case of disputed boundaries, where the defendant was in possession of the depositions of the plaintiff or other parties before the Inclosure Commissioners; was the plaintiff not entitled to see them? Were they privileged, though very important to the defendant's case? He was of opinion that production must be ordered.

From this order, so far as related to the production of the office copies of the examination of the plaintiff before the Commissioner in Bankruptcy, the defendants appealed, but they submitted to produce the other documents embraced by the order at the Rolls.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Speed argued that the documents required to be produced contained evidence in support of the defendants' case, which, if obtained in any other way than through the examination of the plaintiff before the Commissioner, would have been privileged; and what, they asked, could be the difference as to the defendants' privilege, that the matter had been disclosed in the plaintiff's examination? They argued that so much of the order ought to be discharged.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Beavan, in support of the order, referred to the following cases :—

Goodall v. Little, 1 Sim. N.S. 155; s.c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 132.

Glyn v. Caulfeild, 3 Mac. & G. 463.

Betts v. Menzies, 29 Law Times, 325; s.c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 528.

Mr. Selwyn was not called on to reply.

Their LORDSHIPS were of opinion that, considering the particular nature of the two documents in dispute, they ought not to be ordered to be produced until the hearing of the cause. The order, therefore, so far as related to them (and no other part of it was in dispute), would be discharged.

STUART, V.C. }
March 5, 7, 8. } PAYNE v. MORTIMER.

Voluntary Bond—Marriage Settlement—Debtor and Creditor.

A father, having given a voluntary bond to trustees, conditioned for the payment after his death of a sum of money to them for the benefit of his two sons, afterwards, upon the marriages of the sons, assented to such bond being settled upon trust for the benefit of the said sons and their respective wives and children. The marriages having taken place upon the faith of the provision thus assented to :—Held, that the trustees of the marriage settlements of the sons were entitled to claim as specially creditors for value in a suit instituted after the father's decease for the administration of his estate.

Edward Horlock Mortimer, by his bond, dated in September 1842, became bound in the penal sum of 57,200*l.* to the trustees therein named. The bond was conditioned to be void on payment to the said trustees by the executors of the obligor of the sum of 28,600*l.* within six months after his death, it being declared by the said bond that the trustees, on receiving the said sum of 28,600*l.*, should forthwith pay over the same in the following proportions to six of his children by his first marriage, for whom he was desirous of settling and assuring some certain provision in the event of his death, viz., to Thomas Richard Bythesea Mortimer the sum of 4,350*l.*, to John Lewis Mortimer the sum of 5,250*l.*, to John Baskerville Mortimer the sum of 6,000*l.*, to Edmund Bythesea Mortimer the sum of 6,000*l.*, to Elizabeth Caroline Payne the sum of 1,000*l.* for her separate use, and to Rosina Laura Mortimer the sum of 6,000*l.* for her separate use; and in case either of his said sons and daughters should die before the said sums should become payable to him or her, then upon trust to pay the said sum which he or she would have been entitled to by virtue of the said bond, to the survivors or survivor of them, in like proportions as the said sum of 28,600*l.* was directed to be paid to them respectively.

In 1843 two of the above-named sons of the obligor, viz., T. R. B. Mortimer and J. B. Mortimer, intermarried with two of the daughters of Charles Payne; and prior to such marriages they executed settlements, each of which was dated the 20th of October 1843, assigning all their respective interests under the above-mentioned bond of September 1842 to the trustees therein respectively named, for the benefit of their respective wives and the issue of such marriages respectively.

In the course of the negotiations on the subject of these settlements, E. H. Mortimer, the obligor, wrote in answer to an application made to him by the mother of the intended brides the following letter, dated in August 1843 :—

“Madame,—I have been in communication with my solicitor, which has prevented my writing you before. As I informed you, I gave a bond to trustees during my illness last year, which was for the benefit of my children, . . . but it is therein specified that should either die before myself, their portion would fall among the survivors. The bond, I find, cannot under any circumstances be altered, but my sons could give a bond, which I trust will be satisfactory."

On the 30th of August 1843 Mr. Payne's solicitor wrote to the testator's solicitor a letter, which, after referring to the bond of September 1842, contained the following passage:—"The sums to which the two intended husbands will become entitled under the above bond are intended to form part of the settlements, and I will therefore thank you to furnish me with a copy of the bond without delay."

In compliance with this request a copy of the bond was shortly afterwards sent to Mr. Payne's solicitor.

Edward Horlock Mortimer, the obligor of the bond, died in November 1857, and the present suit was shortly afterwards instituted for the administration of his estate, the usual decree being made in it in May 1858.

The testator's estate, which consisted wholly of personalty, turned out to be insufficient for the payment of his specialty debts for value, exclusive of the said two sums made payable by the said bond of September 1842, and afterwards settled by the marriage settlements of October 1843.

The trustees of these settlements, however, claimed the sums so respectively settled, as specialty debts for value against the estate of the testator, but the chief clerk disallowed such claims, holding the sums so claimed to be merely voluntary debts.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed by summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Freeling and Mr. Fooks, in support of the claims disallowed by the certificate, cited—

The East India Company v. Clavell, Prec. in Chanc. 377; s. c. Gilb. Rep. 37.

Mr. Bacon replied.

STUART, V.C. said that the bond of September 1842, though undoubtedly a mere voluntary obligation, while in the ownership of the obligor's sons or the trustees for the sons, the only obligees named in it, had ceased to be so situated. The claims now made under it were not advanced by the obligees named in the bond or their cestuis que trust, but by the trustees of the settlements made on the marriages of the obligor's two sons, marriages which had been contracted in the reliance that those claims would be provided for. Thus there had been imported into the bond, in respect of those claims, the consideration of marriage, a consideration as valuable as if money had been paid for the bond. That being so, the case fell clearly within and was governed by the doctrine laid down in the words following, by Lord Eldon, in George v. Milbanke:—"If the doctrine is rightly collected from the authorities, it imports all this; that if a man is indebted, and makes a provision for his child by a pure voluntary settlement, and that child afterwards marries, the circumstance of its leading to the marriage makes the settlement good against the creditors; though it would have been bad if no marriage had taken place." making those observations, Lord Eldon did not point to any distinction in principle as existing between a settlement by voluntary grant or assignment of property and a settlement by mere voluntary obligation, nor did he (the Vice Chancellor) think that such a distinction could be maintained as affecting the question of the effect of the subsequent importation of a valuable consideration into the transaction. There had been, moreover, in the present case, a representation by the obligor to the mother of the intended brides of his two sons, the obligees, that this bond existed as a provision, though a contingent one, for such sons. The bond was thereupon sent by the solicitor of the obligor to the solicitor of the mother, who, acting upon that representation, prepared settlements for the daughters, between whom and the two sons the marriages were, on the faith of the truth of such representations, accordingly solemnized. It was impossible to say that such a transaction did not involve a representation amounting to a contract, and on this ground also, as well as upon that of a subsequent importation of valuable consideration into the bond, it was impossible to treat the claims now made under the bond as those merely of volunteers. The names of the present claimants should, therefore, be inserted in the schedule as creditors who held a specialty obligation, not as volunteers, but as purchasers for value.

The costs of the summons to be costs in the cause.

WOOD, V.C. } EYRE v. SANDERS,
March 21, 22. } ex parte YEO.

Settlement—Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120.)—Authority of conveying Parties—Legal Estate acquired subsequently to the Order for Sale.

Real estate subject to a mortgage was devised in strict settlement, and a power of sale given to the trustees; a suit was instituted, and the Court ordered the estate to be sold, and E, S. and V. were appointed to execute the conveyance, and it was declared that the mortgagees should be bound by the order. The legal estate having been afterwards reconveyed to the trustees of the settlement,—Held, that E, S. and V. had power to convey it, and that the trustees of the settlement were not necessary parties to the deed.

By deeds of lease and release, dated the 4th and 5th of September 1822, Col. Henry Samuel Eyre mortgaged part of the St. John's Wood Estate to Messrs. Pole & Thornton for 40,000*l.*, and by his will, dated in 1837, devised the equity of redemption in strict settlement, giving a power of sale to his trustees. The testator died in 1851, and in 1857 a suit was instituted for the purpose of having the trusts of a term of years created by the will declared, and for raising the sums charged on the estates. In this suit, and in the matter of the settled estates of Col. Eyre, and of the Settled Estates Act, an order was made on the 20th of March 1858, for the sale of a portion of the estates, and George John Eyre, George Williams Sanders and Edward Urch Vidal were appointed as the persons, pursuant to the statutes, to execute the deeds of conveyance of the premises directed to be sold, and it was ordered that all proper parties should join in and execute proper conveyances to be settled by the Judge. Pole & Thornton, in whom the legal estate was vested under the mortgage, were not parties to this order; but an order was made on the 24th of July following, whereby the Court declared, that they and the trustees, and other specified persons, were bound by such former order, and the sales under the same, in the same manner as if they had been parties thereto, and had consented to be bound thereby in respect of their several charges.

The sale, at which Mr. Yeo purchased a portion of the property, took place on the day previous to the latter order. The legal estate remained outstanding in the mortgagees, until some day between the 17th of September and the 7th of October, when a deed, dated the 17th of July 1858, was executed, and the legal estate thereby conveyed to the trustees of Col. Eyre's will in fee, to the uses of the will. Mr. Yeo, the purchaser, accepted the title, and paid his purchase-money into court; but upon the draft of the conveyance being submitted to him, he insisted that a conveyance by the nominees of the Court only did not pass the legal estate, and he required, as the shortest way of acquiring such legal estate, that the trustees of the will should join, and execute the power of sale given by the will. The vendors, on the other hand, contended that the conveyance was sufficient without their concurrence; and the question being raised before the chief clerk on the settlement of the conveyance, was adjourned by him into court.

Mr. G. L. Russell, for the vendors, contended that the persons appointed by the Court had full power to convey the legal estate, the reconveyance being a dedication of the legal estate to the uses of the will. The 15th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120. gave power to the Court to bind the legal as well as the equitable estate.

Mr. Bowring, for the purchaser, objected that the order of the Court could only operate on the interests of the persons bound by it, and the order of the 20th of March did not affect the legal estate, and the order of July did not authorize the conveyance of it. He referred to the interpretation of the word "settlement" in the 1st section of the act, and also to section 41:—"the estates or interests of the parties entitled to any such charge or incumbrance shall not be affected by the acts of the person entitled to the possession, or to the receipt of the rents and profits as aforesaid, unless they shall concur therein."

Mr. Amphlett appeared for other parties.

Mr. Russell replied.

March 22.—WOOD, V.C.—This is a question of conveyancing which appears to have divided the opinions of conveyancers. The argument on behalf of the purchaser is, that the legal estate, which was outstanding in a mortgagee, could not be reconveyed by the order of the Court directing that the reconveyance should be made by the persons named in the order, the mortgagees not being parties to that order. The 15th section of the act enacts, that "the Court may direct what person or persons shall execute the deed of conveyance, and the deed executed by such person or persons shall take effect as if the settlement had contained a power enabling such person or persons to effect such sale or dedication, and so as to operate, (if necessary) by way of revocation and appointment of the use, or otherwise as the Court shall direct." There was first an order made, to which the mortgagees were no parties, ordering a conveyance to be made by the persons named in the order; and then the Court made another order, by which all persons were unquestionably bound, and which passed every estate and interest to which they were entitled under the settlement. The 1st section of the act defines the words "settled estates" to signify "all hereditaments of any tenure, and all estates or interests in any such hereditaments which are the subject of a settlement." I apprehend you are to convey every estate and interest to which you are entitled under the settlement; and the question is, whether if, between the date of the order and the execution of the conveyance, a person acquires the legal estate, the words of the 15th section are not large enough to take in a conveyance passing the legal estate. It seems to me that in such a case the legal estate will be effectually conveyed. The argument against that is, that the settlement is not now by virtue of the will, but by virtue of the conveyance from the mortgagees. That is perfectly absurd. The testator settles the estate; he conveys the equity of redemption and all the right to call for the legal estate. That is a right which existed at the date of the order, and which would, whenever the mortgage was paid off, become vested in the persons interested under the settlement. The subsequent order does not, I think, materially alter the case. The mortgagees were not bound by the order, but the legal estate became vested afterwards in those who were bound by it, and thereupon the equitable interest was merged. The order binds all the estates and interests which the parties have, and every interest they can acquire before they make the conveyance. The purchaser takes everything that the parties are ordered to convey, and those who make the conveyance are absolutely authorized to make it. The parties interested under the will have an interest in the legal estate, and that being acquired by virtue of the settlement is bound by the order. Therefore, I think the persons appointed to convey are alone capable of making a good conveyance, and the draft will be approved.

Feb. 17. } WALLIS v. WALLIS.

Practice—Right of Defendant to dismiss Bill without Costs.

A defendant is not entitled to dismiss a bill, upon conceding all that the plaintiff demands, without paying the costs, and the Court will not upon a motion for such dismissal go into the merits of the case.

In consequence of the doubtful expressions in the authorities, the costs of the motion were reserved to the hearing.

This was a suit instituted for the specific performance of a contract to exchange certain property, and to restrain an action of ejectment. No replication having been filed, the cause was set down by the plaintiff, who then moved for a decree, and filed affidavits to establish his rights. The defendant had also filed affidavits. A motion was now made on behalf of the defendant that, on the defendant's executing a conveyance to the plaintiff of the property mentioned in the bill, in exchange for the land and buildings mentioned in the bill belonging to the plaintiff, and on the defendant undertaking to abandon all further proceedings in the action at law, in the said bill also mentioned, the bill in this suit might be dismissed without costs, or that such order might be made as to the payment of, or otherwise as to the costs of this suit, and of the said action at law, as to the Court should seem fit.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Nalder, in support of the motion, submitted that the Court should refuse to allow the plaintiff to go on incurring expenses after the defendant had offered to give him all that he asked. This had been decided in many cases, and the only question was as to costs. This must be decided by the Court going into the merits of the case, which it could do upon the affidavits already filed.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—If a defendant offers to give the plaintiff what he demands, and then it comes out that the plaintiff had no right to make the demand, in that case, no doubt, I should make him pay the costs; but it appears the time for completing the evidence as to the merits has not yet arrived, and the parties have a right to produce further evidence. When the defendant made the offer to satisfy the plaintiff, what ought the plaintiff to have done?

Mr. Glasse.—He ought to have brought on his motion for a decree, and that would have decided the question of costs. Such a motion as this has been allowed by the Court in similar cases. The great object of the Court always is to prevent further expenses, and there is no reason why the question of costs should not now be decided upon the merits. They cited—

Knox v. Brown, 1 Cox, 359.

Tapp v. Tanner, 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 559.

Wright v. Barlow, 5 De Gex & Sm. 43.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Elderton resisted the motion, on the ground that the defendant had no right to have the bill dismissed without paying all the costs. It would be different if the plaintiff was not justified in making his demand, but the defendant had admitted the demand to be just by offering to concede all that was asked; and there had been no case decided in which, at such a period of the cause, the Court had gone into the merits of the suit. This was a motion to prevent the cause coming to a hearing, but it was only at the hearing that the merits could be considered.

Mr. Glasse, in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is a question of some importance, as a number of motions founded on the same principle might be made. It comes to this, that at any stage of the proceedings in a case, the defendant may say, I will give you all you want except the costs, and we will dismiss the bill without going into the merits. In the first place, no doubt, the defendant may, at any time, without leave, come to the Court, and as a matter of course may have an order on motion for a decree to the effect of what the plaintiff asks. He may stop the proceedings by giving the plaintiff all he asks, together with his costs; a defendant may do that at any time, and then he pays all the costs, and the costs of the motion. Then we come to a case where the defendant does not say, I am ready to give you all you ask, but I will give you all but the costs of the suit, that is, I dispute your claim, and think you ought not to have filed the bill; still it is more to my interest to give you what you ask, but I will give it without costs. And then the defendant says, he has a right so to dismiss the matter. Now, it appears to me the distinction in these cases is this: where the application turns on the ground of trying the case upon the merits, there such a motion may be made, but not on the ground that on entering into the merits then the costs ought not to be paid by the defendant. I will mention some instances in which a party may come, sometimes the plaintiff and sometimes the defendant, to stop the suit, without offering to pay all the costs of the suit. I need not say that the Court has always an object in stopping unnecessary costs, and to dispose of the question in some way to prevent the parties going on to no purpose to incur additional costs; and on that principle it is that the cases have gone of allowing the defendant to come and say, "I will give you all the costs, and you shall go on no further." On the other hand, we must bear this in mind, that if the defendant has put the plaintiff to unnecessary costs, it should not be allowed that he should come and say, "Now, stop the suit, and still I will not pay the costs"; therefore, the Court must steer between the two objects, one being not to allow the parties to go on vexing one another, and the other not to let one party put another to expense, and then stop the proceedings. Now, I will give an instance in which it might be proper, either for the plaintiff or the defendant, to make such a request. Suppose the plaintiff filed his bill to enforce the demand. If the defendant, after the bill being filed, concedes the claim of the plaintiff, I think it would not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say, "Although I concede the demand, I dispute it." But admitting himself to be wrong, he may come with a motion to dismiss the bill, with costs; that is, the Court will prevent the plaintiff from going on, upon this footing: that the defendant, having conceded the plaintiff's demand, it must be taken on such an application that the demand was a just one, and on that footing only will the Court entertain it; and on the application of the plaintiff the Court will take the same view of the case, and will stop the suit, not making the defendant go into the merits of it, but on the footing that the defendant has admitted the justice of the plaintiff's claim; and it does not lie in his mouth to say that the claim was not a just one. There might be a case of that sort; but might there not be a case of this sort?—where the defendant knows he is wrong, and has been staving off the claim, and then comes to say, "I will agree to your claim, but I will not pay the costs; I will now come, and ask to dismiss the suit, without costs." This is a case in which either the defendant or the plaintiff might come to stop further proceedings, namely, where the defendant has conceded the claim of the plaintiff to give him what he asks, and he is not entitled to go into the merits. Now in another case, it might be proper to make the plaintiff pay costs, such as this—suppose the plaintiff files a bill, having an equitable right against the defendant, without any dispute on the part of the defendant, that he would not do what he is asked. The defendant might say, "I never disputed your claim, but yet you filed the bill for the purpose of making costs"; surely in such a case the Court will entertain an application of the defendant to stop proceedings, without costs; not, however, on the ground of merits, but, admitting the claim, it would be on the question whether the plaintiff was justified in filing such a bill. That, then, is a case in which the defendant might come with an application to stay proceedings, without costs; but on a footing distinct from the merits—that the plaintiff was not justified in filing the bill. Another case is such a one as The Sutton Harbour Company v. Hitchens, which was founded upon the decision of Lord Cottenham in The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith. There several bills were filed, and the plaintiffs, at the time of filing them, were justified in doing so; and if the decision of Lord Cottenham had remained unreversed, the parties would have got their decrees; but a case of the same kind came before Lord Truro, and he took a different view of the law, and overruled the decision of the previous Lord Chancellor; so that the plaintiffs would not have been entitled to their decrees. Then, what were the plaintiffs to do in these suits which had been put out of court? They might, of course, have dismissed their bills and paid their costs; but that would have created great injustice to them, as it was no fault of theirs that Lord Cottenham had laid down a view of the law which was afterwards found to be erroneous. In these cases, then, the Court held, that the question could be decided irrespective of merits. The plaintiffs might come and say, “We are wrong, because the law is altered; therefore, stay the proceedings without our being obliged to pay costs.” The Court granted the applications, quite extrinsic of the merits of the case. Having mentioned these cases, in which applications of this nature might be made, let us now see what would be the effect of what is contended for by the defendant in this case, in holding that an application while the case is going on may be made by the defendant to try the case on its merits. What would be the consequence of such a proceeding? Suppose the case were taken just after filing the bill—I mean where the plaintiff has properly filed his bill—and after that no steps have been taken, why should the defendant come and say, “Now try the merits of the case, and stop the suit on my conceding what the plaintiff has demanded, but without costs”? Just see what a position we should have. There is nothing but the bill. Is the bill to be taken to be true, or are we to have evidence given in the case? In other words, you must go into evidence on both sides, to try on that motion, what should be tried at the hearing, whether the plaintiff is entitled to what he asks by his bill. There would be nothing gained by that; there would be witnesses examined and cross-examined, and it would be the same as a motion for a decree.

Suppose, then, in such a case, the defendant has made the offer to give the plaintiff all he asks, without costs. Is the defendant then to come with such an application, that is, in fact, an application for the plaintiff to pay the costs? Besides the defendant in that case might say, I must file my answer, first, because that would decide the question of costs? If, then, after the answer, it is done, the defendant may say, “Now, in my answer, I have shewn that I am right; therefore, stop the suit, but I will not pay costs.” In such a case, it might be that the answer is full of misrepresentations, and if it came to a hearing, the plaintiff might prove it to be false, and that the defendant ought to pay the costs. I only put these cases to shew that at any stage of the proceedings, if you go into the merits, you must do that which involves the question of costs and expenses, which it is the professed object of the parties to avoid.

Now, take the present case, and I think if ever there was a stage of the proceedings in which it ought not to be done, it is in the present stage of this case. The defendant has resisted the plaintiff's claim; the plaintiff, in the usual way, moves for a decree, and files certain affidavits to establish his rights. If the defendant had at once conceded his claim, it might have been different; but he has allowed the case to go on, and the defendant is now actually cross-examining the witnesses of the plaintiff. There have been affidavits filed on the merits, on both sides, so the defendant has evidence in the cause, which he has now to go into and to read; at all events, the evidence thus far is incomplete; but if this motion is to be entertained, I must allow each party to bring forward on the merits any evidence he pleases. I cannot refuse this to either party. Then, what do I gain by it? Here is a motion for a decree pending, in which the whole evidence will be gone into, which will not be more expensive than trying the question now. But, however, I do not put it on that footing, because I think, in any stage of the cause, although there may be cases in which the stay of proceedings might be asked, still it is contrary to all principle, and also, I think, contrary to all the authorities, except perhaps some particular dicta, to allow that to be done. I will refer to that case of Sivell v. Abraham. It was a case in which the plaintiff had filed a bill for the purpose of compelling the vendor to give a conveyance, and he contended, that the heir-at-law of the testator ought to join. That was the whole question. Then, the bill having been filed in October 1841, the defendant prevailed on the heir to execute the conveyance—evidence was taken, and notice given to the plaintiff that the conveyance had been executed, and then the defendant wanted to have the bill dismissed, without costs. The plaintiff refused. That is something like this case. Then the plaintiff brought on the cause to a hearing, and the Master of the Rolls said, "Surely, the plaintiff ought not to have gone on incurring further expenses." Before that case there was no authority in which, on the application of the plaintiff, the Court had given costs to a plaintiff and dismissed the bill. The Master of the Rolls said, "The Court will not permit the plaintiff to go on incurring useless expense." I wish to observe upon this, that I think in that case there is an inconsistency in the judgment; the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that the deed had been executed, and proposed that the bill should be dismissed, without costs, which the Master of the Rolls says was substantially a correct notice to give. We should not then expect him to make the defendant pay the costs, but we find he did. Now, Lord Langdale affirmed by that decision, that the plaintiff had no right to give notice to dismiss, without costs, but that he ought to have made an application to the Court respecting the costs. That could only be founded on this ground, that the plaintiff's case might be assumed to be right on the merits, and then after that he made him pay costs, that is to say, he would not allow the plaintiff any costs subsequent to the notice given by the defendant, and made the defendant pay the costs up to that time, shewing that the plaintiff was entitled to move to dismiss, without costs. That case, therefore, I think inconsistent, and I cannot draw any conclusion from it. I cannot think that Lord Langdale would have allowed the parties to go into the merits of the case. I cannot understand that the Court should allow the merits to be gone into on such a motion.

In the case of The Sutton Harbour Company v. Hitchens, the Master of the Rolls thought that a motion to dismiss might be made, but not upon the merits of the case. There it was useless to go on with the suit, because of the adverse decision on the law. Upon appeal, in that case, the Lords Justices considered that the order of the Master of the Rolls was right, except that the defendant ought to have the costs of his motion to dismiss.

Now, this is a motion in which the defendant says, he has a right to stay the suit without costs being paid on either side, and for that purpose he contends he has a right to go into the merits. I cannot grant the motion, and the only question is, whether I am to refuse it with or without costs, or whether I ought to reserve the costs. Now, it appears to me, the justice of the case requires this: I think there are in the cases cited an indication of some more or less clearly expressed opinions, and particularly in that case of Sivell v. Abraham, there are expressions which might fairly lead the parties to come to this court with such an application as this. In that view, I think I ought to refuse the motion and not allow the defendant his costs, which he must not have under any circumstances, but direct the costs to be costs in the cause, so that if the plaintiff succeeds he will get costs, and if he fails he will not get costs, but will not have to pay the defendant his costs. I think justice requires this course from the indications which I have alluded to in the cases cited.

 Feb. 21. } BOYD v. BARKER.

*Clergy—Gilbert's Act, 17 Geo. 3. c. 53.
 —Repairs and Additions to the Parsonage House.*

An incumbent may borrow money upon mortgage under the provisions of the act 17 Geo. 3. c. 53, for the purpose of enlarging and adding to the parsonage-house, as well as for "building, rebuilding and repairing," if such additions are considered necessary; and there is no objection to the incumbent advancing the money himself upon mortgage for such a purpose.

The bill in this case stated, that in the year 1854 the plaintiff, the Rev. Frederick Boyd, was presented by the Bishop of Rochester to the rectory and parish church of Woldham, in the county of Kent, on the resignation of the defendant the Rev. Alleyne Higgs Barker, who had previously held the living for a period of twenty years and upwards. After the plaintiff had been inducted to the living, the defendant informed the plaintiff that he had a charge upon the living for the amount laid out by him in improving and repairing the rectory-house, and that he had taken a mortgage for such amount, and the defendant claimed to be entitled to receive from the plaintiff a year's instalment of the amount charged upon the glebe, tithes, rents and other profits and emoluments arising from the said living, together with a year's interest on the amount due on such mortgage. The plaintiff objected to pay these sums. The defendant John Burmester had since made application to the plaintiff for payment of such instalment, and also of subsequent instalments and interest, alleging that he was the mortgagee and person entitled to receive the same; nevertheless he admitted that no money was in point of fact advanced by him, and that his name was inserted in the mortgage-deed as trustee only for the defendant Barker. The defendant Barker had forwarded to the plaintiff a deed purporting to be the counterpart of an indenture, dated the 12th of April 1845, and made between the said defendant A. H. Barker of the one part and J. Burmester of the other part, whereby, after reciting that the said A. H. Barker had obtained the consent of the ordinary of the diocese and patron of the church and living to borrow 300*l.* under the act of 17 Geo. 3. c. 53, to be laid out and expended in enlarging the parsonage-house and other necessary offices belonging to the church, it was witnessed that the said A. H. Barker, in consideration of the sum of 300*l.*, paid to the Rev. Samuel Drew, a person nominated by the ordinary to receive the same pursuant to the directions of the act, had granted, bargained, sold and demised unto J. Burmester, his executors, administrators and assigns, all the glebe lands, tithes, rents, rent-charges, moduses, compositions for tithes, salaries, stipends, fees, gratuities and other emoluments and profits payable to the rector of the said living in respect thereof, to hold the same to the said J. Burmester, his executors, administrators and assigns, for thirty-five years. And the defendant A. H. Barker thereby covenanted to pay to the defendant J. Burmester, so long as he should continue rector of the parish, interest for the said sum of 300*l.*, or so much as should remain due at the end of every year, after the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum, by yearly payments, and also in each and every year during such term, one equal thirtieth part of the principal sum of 300*l.*

It appeared that the net income of the living was 260*l.*, and Mr. Barker, when appointed to it, found the parsonage house in a ruinous and uninhabitable condition, and considerable repairs were executed by him at his own expense. In the year 1845, Mr. Barker was desirous of further improving the house and of enlarging it, and he then applied to the bishop of the diocese for his sanction to enable him to borrow 300*l.* to effect such improvements. The whole expense of the repairs was to be 500*l.*, but he only wished to borrow 300*l.* The bishop appointed a commission of two clergymen to examine the premises, and to report to him as to the propriety of the outlay, in conformity with the act; and upon the report of the commission, the bishop nominated Mr. Drew to be the person to receive the money, and effect such proper contracts for the work as might be necessary. Mr. Barker, upon this, advanced the money himself which was to be laid out, instead of borrowing it from a third person, and the before-mentioned mortgage was then executed, and Mr. Burmester was made a party to it, as if he, and not Mr. Barker, had advanced the money; Mr. Burmester being, in fact, a trustee for Mr. Barker. The amount was in consequence paid to Mr. Drew, and was expended in repairs and additions to the parsonage house.

The plaintiff insisted by his bill, that the repairs effected by Mr. Barker were not such as were warranted by the terms of the act of parliament, since the money was expended in additions to the house, and not in building, rebuilding or repairing; that these repairs were unnecessary; and also that Mr. Barker ought not to have advanced the money himself, but to have borrowed it from a disinterested party. The bill, therefore, prayed that the mortgage-deed might be set aside, and ordered to be delivered up to be cancelled; or at all events that it might, under the circumstances, be declared void as against the plaintiff and his successors, rectors of the rectory and parish church of Woldham. The bill also prayed an injunction to restrain the defendants Barker and Burmester from enforcing the claim by sequestration or otherwise against the plaintiff's living.

The portions of the act referred to were as follows. The act was entitled 'An Act to promote the residence of the parochial clergy by making provision for the more speedy and effectual building, rebuilding, repairing or purchasing houses and other necessary buildings and tenements for the use of their benefices.'

"Whereas many of the parochial clergy, for want of proper habitations, are induced to reside at a distance from their benefices, by which means the parishioners lose the advantage of their instruction and hospitality, which were great objects in the original distribution of tythes and glebes for the endowment of churches, for remedy whereof may it please your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons, &c., that from and after the 24th day of June 1777, whenever the parson, vicar, or other

incumbent of any ecclesiastical living, parochial benefice, chapelry, or perpetual curacy, being under the jurisdiction of the bishop or other ecclesiastical ordinary, whereon there is no house of habitation, or such house is become so ruinous and decayed, or is so mean that one year's net income and produce of such living will not be sufficient to build, rebuild, or put the same, with the necessary offices belonging thereto, in sufficient repair, shall think fit to apply for the aid and assistance intended to be given by this act, it shall and may be lawful for every such parson, vicar or incumbent (after having procured from some skilful and experienced workman or surveyor a certificate containing a state of the condition of the buildings on their respective glebes, and of the value of the timber and other materials thereupon fit to be employed in such buildings or repairs, or to be sold, and also a plan and estimate of the work proposed to be done—such state and estimate to be verified upon oath taken before some Justice of the Peace, or Master in Chancery ordinary or extraordinary—and laid the same, together with a just and particular account in writing signed by him and verified upon oath, taken as aforesaid, of the annual profits of such living, before the ordinary and patron of the living, and obtained their consent to such proposed new buildings or repairs, by writing under their respective hands in the form for that purpose contained in the Schedule hereunto annexed), to borrow and take up at interest, in the manner hereafter mentioned, such sum or sums of money as the said estimate shall amount unto, after deducting the value of timber or other materials which may be thought proper to be sold, not exceeding two years net income and produce of such living, after deducting all rents, stipends, taxes and other outgoings, excepting only the salaries to the assistant curate, where such a curate is necessary; and as a security for the money so to be borrowed, to mortgage the glebe, tithes, rents and other profits and emoluments arising, or to arise, from such living, to such person or persons who shall advance the same, by one or more deed or deeds, for the term of twenty-five years, or until the money so to be borrowed, with interest for the same, and such costs and charges as may attend the recovery thereof, shall be fully paid and satisfied according to the terms, conditions, true intent and meaning of this act; which mortgage deed or deeds shall be made in the forms or to the effect for that purpose contained in the said Schedule, and shall bind every succeeding parson, vicar or incumbent of such living, until the principal and interest, costs and charges, shall be paid off and discharged as fully and effectually as if such successor had executed the same." Section 3. "Provided always, and be it further enacted, that whenever the principal and interest directed to be paid to the mortgagee, under the several provisions of this act, shall be in arrear and unpaid for the space of forty days after the same shall become due, it shall and may be lawful for such mortgagee, his executors, administrators or assigns, to recover the same and the costs and charges attending the recovery thereof, by distress and sale, in such manner as rents may be recovered by landlords or lessors from their tenants by the laws in being." Section 4. "And be it further enacted, that the money so to be borrowed shall be paid into the hands of such person or persons as shall be nominated and appointed to receive and apply the same for the purposes aforesaid, by the ordinary patron and incumbent, by writing, under their respective hands, in the form for that purpose contained in the said Schedule, after such nominee shall have given a bond to the ordinary, with sufficient surety in double the sum so to be borrowed and raised, with condition for his duly applying and accounting for the same, according to the directions of this act; and the receipt of the person or persons so to be nominated shall be a sufficient discharge to the person or persons who shall advance and pay the money," &c.

The act then provided that the person so appointed to receive the money should enter into all proper contracts relating to the repairs.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Morris, for the plaintiff, contended that under the above act of parliament the defendant Mr. Barker had no right to borrow money for the purpose of making additions to the parsonage house. He could do no more than "build, rebuild or repair" the house. The necessity for restricting the alterations to this extent was obvious, because it was clear that a clergyman ought not to be allowed to enlarge his house to suit his particular family, when the next incumbent might have a smaller family, and would object to the expense of a house that was too large for him. This house was quite large enough before the defendant commenced his additions, and the present incumbent did not think it at all necessary for him to have the butler's pantry or the extra rooms which had been added by Mr. Barker. A drawing-room might be requisite for the purpose of giving entertainments, but could not be required for a country clergyman whose living did not exceed 260*l.* a year. If money had been raised sufficient only to repair the house in the terms of the act, there would have been no objection to the expenditure. Then, the money was lent by Mr. Barker himself, instead of by a third person. This was taking away that protection which must have existed if the money had been lent by a disinterested party, whose business it would have been to see that the money was properly expended according to the terms of the act. They cited—

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Pole appeared for the defendant, but were not called upon to address the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — I do not think there is any ground for this bill, and I cannot help regretting that it should have been filed. It appears that the plaintiff succeeded to the income of this living in the year 1854, and the state of the facts is this:—The defendant, Mr. Barker, became the incumbent many years ago, and when he took possession of the house, he found that as it was close upon the river, and was not properly built for keeping out the water, it was very damp, and liable to be inundated. The house consisted at that time of two kitchens, two cellars, a small room for servants, and a staircase, and on the upper floor there were three bedrooms. Now, no doubt, in the times of Parson Adams, the rector might have been contented with such an humble residence as this, but things have very much changed since then, and Mr. Barker not being satisfied with the house in its then state, set about repairing it at his own expense. He prevented the water from coming in, and he built a new room, that is, a sitting-room. This was several years before 1845, and in that year he thought it desirable to have a second sitting-room built and a butler's pantry, and bed-rooms above. Still there was no more than a ground-floor and first-floor. The building of these extra rooms was to cost something under 500*l.*, but it was only 300*l.* of this amount that he wished to charge upon the living. Probably his whole outlay upon the house, from the first, was not less than 1,000*l.* When the plaintiff became incumbent, there was then 230*l.* left unpaid of this sum of 300*l.*, the rest having been cleared off by payment of instalments from the time of the mortgage, and Mr. Boyd then files this bill impeaching the transaction. I cannot but regret that Mr. Boyd should even wish to succeed in such a case as this, but still I must not prevent his right, if it exists, to set aside the transaction. The grounds upon which he relies are these:—First, he says, what has been done was not sanctioned by the act of parliament, because in this case, there was a question of adding to a building, and not simply building, rebuilding or repairing:—that certain additional rooms had been added, and the act did not authorize an addition. That, as I conceive, is the only important point for consideration. If the plaintiff's contention is just, the result would be that at least nineteen out of every twenty charges that have been effected under Gilbert's Act would be liable to be set aside; and if the arguments were worth anything, they would go to this, that even if you are rebuilding a house you have no right to make it even a yard larger than it was before—you must not enlarge, though you may rebuild. Now, the words of the act are these.—[His Honour read the passages already referred to.]—It is contended that these words give no power to add, under any circumstances, anything whatever to the existing building. I cannot help saying, that if I were obliged to put this construction upon the words, I should be so narrowing the meaning of the act as to defeat the intention of the legislature; because, if you look at the preamble, you will find that the act was passed with a view to induce the parochial clergy to reside upon their benefices, by providing proper habitations. Here, then, is the very point: the object is to hold out an inducement to clergymen as much as possible to reside in their parishes, in order that the parishioners may have the benefit of their instruction and hospitality. It is true that other acts of parliament have been since passed, requiring clergymen to reside in their parishes, but at that time they had great facilities for escaping a continuous residence; and the object of the legislature was to enable them to have such an amount of comfort in their houses as would induce them to reside. Now, we have, probably, all of us, seen specimens of remarkable parsonage-houses in olden times, no better than hovels; and the argument of the plaintiff must go to this, that you cannot hold out the inducement to the clergy to reside, as set out in the act, by adding to the house. So, if I am driven to decide in that way, I should be deciding in the narrowest manner, and the act would be nearly valueless. There are three cases supposed: one is where there is no habitation for the clergyman, and in that case it is admitted you may build to any extent the bishop thinks right. In that case a man may get a comfortable and convenient building erected for himself, and charge the expense of it upon the living under this act; but if you have got a house utterly unfit for a decent person to reside in, you may repair it, or you may pull it down and rebuild it, but you must on no account make it larger than it was originally. I cannot help saying that I should listen to such an argument with great reluctance. The second case is this: where there is a house, but such house is become so ruinous and decayed that one year's income will not be sufficient to repair it, still, bad as the house may be, you must not go beyond the original limits of the building. The next point is—where the existing building is so mean that one year's net income will not be enough to repair it. What does that word "mean" signify? It is argued that that expression has nothing to do with the size of the house, but the material of which it is built; so that if it happens to be built of bad materials, it may be rebuilt with brick and mortar, but still it must not be enlarged. It appears to me that cannot be the meaning of the act. The act says, the object was to make such improvements in the houses as to induce the clergy to reside in the parishes, and then it provides for the case of a house being mean. Now, surely, if the house is so mean as not to be a fit habitation for a clergyman, it cannot be intended only to rebuild it by altering the materials of which it is built. I think the act does justify the bishop and patron and the parties concerned here in doing as they have done. If they thought it was not a house which was reasonably comfortable for the house of a clergyman, they were justified in sanctioning the improvement of the existing building by authorizing an enlargement of it. That being the construction I put upon the act, it is asked what proceedings are to be taken. The act points out the steps to be gone through, and it appears there was some slight irregularity with respect to them, but not any of importance. A gentleman was first employed to make a certificate of the condition of the building, and there is no concealment or suggestion that, under the plea of repairing, they were enlarging; but it is openly stated to be for enlarging the house. Then this certificate is laid before the bishop. In the first place, he sends down a commission of two clergymen to consider what is the condition of the building, and whether there is any dilapidation, and whether there was any sum paid by the last incumbent. The report is favourable, and the bishop thereupon gives his consent. Then, I have to consider whether, supposing the proceedings to have been regular, what was done was unreasonable or unnecessary; whether, therefore, there was a violation of the act. We have here a parsonage-house where the income of the living is 260*l.* per annum. Now that is not by any means a small living, but then it is an object for the parishioners to have a resident clergyman, and for that purpose it is necessary there should be a comfortable residence, and this is quite as necessary where the living is small as where it is a rich living. Clergymen are brought up as gentlemen, and ought to have a decent and comfortable house to live in in their parishes. As to what is reasonable, I will take the common and ordinary average case of a clergyman with an ordinary family, and having to keep himself in the position of a gentleman; say that he requires accommodation for himself, his wife and children. Surely no one can say that one sitting-room is necessarily quite sufficient for the house. He has to attend to parochial duties, and to read and write his sermons, and also to exercise a certain amount of hospitality; then there are the requirements of his wife and children, and all to go on in one sitting-room. I must say, I do not think it was unreasonable that Mr. Barker should desire to have a second sitting-room; and my opinion is, that it was quite expedient that this additional accommodation should be made. It may be said that he did not want a drawing-room for the purpose of entertaining society; but it comes to this: that any one having two sitting-rooms calls one a drawing-room and the other a dining-room. Under these circumstances, I can see no ground whatever for holding this deed to be void, either on the construction of the act of parliament, or on the ground of its being an unreasonable addition.

Other minor matters are contended for, and the plaintiff tries to make out every technical point he can to set aside this deed. He says, that under the terms of the act the lender and borrower of the money should be different persons. Now, in most cases it would not be likely that a clergyman would be able to advance the money himself, but if he has got the money why should he not lend it? It is argued that one important check is taken away. My opinion is, that such is not the case. I cannot see that the proposed mortgagee can have any check; he cannot check the matter in the least degree. The bishop and ordinary are the real check. Then where is the harm of his lending the money himself? It is said that the power is not well executed unless the formality is strictly observed, and that it was not so observed here, because the lender and borrower are not different persons. Here the money is borrowed at only 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. In the case referred to of Sanders v. Franks, it appeared that the incumbent was the purchaser of the land, but that case does not arise here. What benefit to himself can Mr. Barker obtain by lending this money? I admit that he has an advantage by getting a better house to live in, but there can be no other advantage for lending the money. He might have got as much as 5*l.* per cent. upon mortgage, or 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. in the funds; now, here he gets only 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent., and the money is tied up for thirty-five years. And in the case of Greenlaw v. King, it was the bishop standing in an adverse character; but even then he did not lose the money, but it was paid back, with interest, and there was the extra sum for an annuity of which he was deprived. Here, it is proposed, that this gentleman should not only lose the advantage of what was done with the money, but should also pay back the money. Under all these circumstances, I am of opinion that there is no ground for saying, that the defendant has gone beyond the scheme of the act, and that everything has been done with fairness. I must, therefore, dismiss the bill, with costs.

Jan. 22.

MADDISON v. CHAPMAN.

Will—Construction—Minority—Limitation over.

A testator directed that, when the youngest of his two daughters had attained twenty-one, his real and personal estate and effects should be divided into three equal parts: one part to be for his wife, and one of the remaining two for each daughter; at his wife's decease her share to be equally divided between his two daughters; and, provided either of his two daughters should die before a division of the property should have been made, and having no surviving issue, then the part of the deceased to be given to her surviving sister. By a codicil, the testator provided that "should both his children die in their minority, and leave no issue, then in such case, and in such case only property should go to his widow for life then over. One daughter attained one, and died without having been married, and afterwards the other daughter under age and without having been married—Held, (affirming the decision of the Vice Chancellors) that the gift codicil to the widow for life, and the will had failed.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Eve Chapman and James Cooke, from the decision of Wood, V.C. upon the construction of the will and codicil of John Chapman. The testator by his will, dated in 1850, devised as follows:—my funeral and testamentary expenses are paid by my executrix hereinafter named, my will is that all my houses, tenements and real and personal property, situate at Binbrooke and elsewhere, and of what nature or kind (except household furniture and effects) shall, at the time my youngest child attained the age of twenty-one years, be valued and divided into three equal parts, which division shall be made without selling the land; one part to be for my dear wife, Eve Chapman, one for my daughter Mary Ann, and one for my daughter Maria; and provided my daughter Mary Ann wishes to leave her property when she has attained the age of twenty-one years, she shall have the same given to her, without paying interest on the same, but which shall be accounted for as part of her share at the time the general division is made. Any money paid in as principal, either from the proceeds of the sale of the land, or from notes or from any other source, shall be put out to interest at the discretion of the trustees hereinafter named, so that the property may not be diminished; and my wife's decease her share of the property shall be equally divided between my two children above named, share and share alike. And provided either of my two children above named shall die before a division of the property shall have been made as above directed, and having no surviving issue, then the part of the deceased shall be given to her surviving sister; but if either of them shall die and leave surviving issue, the part of her so dying shall be equally divided amongst her surviving children in equal shares and proportions. All interest of money, rents of lands, houses or tenements, shall be applied to the support of my wife and to the support of my children, and their education during their minority or the minority of either of them: and likewise that each of my daughters shall have 10*l.* a year for their own pocket-money during their minority, or until such division of the property is made as above described."

The testator then bequeathed an annuity to his sister, and appointed the defendants Benn and Cooke trustees of his property.

By a codicil, without date, the testator directed as follows:—"Should both my children die in their minority and leave no issue, then in such case, and in such case only, I give to my wife, Eve Chapman, the whole of my property for the term of her natural life, or so long only as she shall remain my widow; and at my wife's decease, or marriage, which shall first happen, I then give to James Cooke all my lands and houses situate at Binbrooke, but to be chargeable with the payment of the annuity to my sister, as above stated, and the remainder of my property shall be at my wife's disposal."

The testator died in 1850, leaving two children only, Mary Ann (who attained twenty-one, and died in 1854, without having been married) and Maria (who died in 1857, under age, and without having been married). It was suggested, but not proved, that the elder daughter left a will.

The suit was instituted by the testator's heiress-at-law, who claimed to be entitled, in the events which had happened, to an equitable estate in fee simple in possession in two-thirds of the testator's real estate, and to an equitable estate in fee simple in remainder expectant on the death of Eve Chapman, in the remaining third part of the said real estate.

The defendant Eve Chapman claimed to have the real estate for her life, and, subject thereto, the defendant Cooke claimed to be entitled under the gift over contained in the codicil.

The Vice Chancellor, however, held that the gift over, under the codicil, had failed—4 Kay & J. 709.

The Solicitor General and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for Mrs. Chapman; and

Mr. W. M. James and Mr. Little, for Mr. Cooke.—The question for decision was, whether the words "die in minority" used in the codicil were to be interpreted as applicable to each child, as the Court below had held, or whether, according to the appellants' contention, it was during the minority before mentioned, that is, during the minority of either of the children. The expression in the codicil must be considered as referring to a class, and must apply to the time of the youngest being in minority. Each child would, for the purposes of the will, be considered a minor while either of them continued to be a minor. The rule in such cases as the present, was to lean to that construction which would include as many objects of the gift as possible, consistently with the declared purpose of the author of the instrument.—

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Faber, for the respondent, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that the sole question upon the appeal was, whether the gift over, in the event of both the children of the testator dying in their minority and leaving no issue, had failed; and although his inclination was to construe it in favour of the widow, the words used by the testator were much too strong, and the conjectural interpretation much too weak to enable him to do so. The will itself was clear as to the objects to be benefited, but the events which had happened were not provided for. The division was to take place upon the youngest of the children attaining twenty-one, and the testator had contemplated one dying before that time and leaving no issue, but not the possibility of both so dying. It was clear that the word "minority" was used by the testator in his will in its ordinary sense; and then by the codicil he provided for events not contemplated in the will, and made the gift over. Taking the words in the codicil in their ordinary sense, the ulterior gift could not arise unless both the children died in their minority leaving no issue. It was argued that the word "minority" was in the codicil applied to a class, and meant the minority of each of the class; and it was competent to the testator to have used the word in that sense, but he had not shewn that such was his intention. It could not be conjectured what the testator would have done if the state of things which had since happened had been present to his mind, and the words which he had used must be taken to have been used in their ordinary sense. As illustrating his Lordship's view on such points of construction, he referred to the language of Wilde, C.J. in the case of Boote v. Scarisbrick (1), where he said, "The language of the clause is not ambiguous, but is such as is in ordinary use and bears a well-known meaning. But it is contended that, upon reference to the other parts of the will, an intention may be inferred on the part of the testator which will not be fully carried into effect by reading the clause in question in the ordinary sense attached to the language. Such imputed intentions are in most respects speculative and uncertain, and where any are to be found which the construction of the clause in question, according to its ordinary meaning, will not carry into effect, or may defeat, it is more probable that such failure will arise from the testator not having contemplated or provided for the very many events which may be supposed as possible to arise in the family, than that he used such expressions in any other than the ordinary meaning. The clause being plain and simple in its language, we do not think the rules of construction now considered as settled, will warrant the clause receiving a construction other than according to its ordinary meaning, without its appearing satisfactorily from other parts of the will that the language was used by the testator in some other sense." The appeal, in the present case, must be dismissed; the costs to be costs in the cause.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that adhering, as he did, to the decisions in Hart v. Tulk and Key v. Key, he found himself unable to dissent from the Lord Chancellor in dismissing this appeal.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER concurred.

WOOD, V.C. }
March 8, 9. } SCHOLEFIELD v. TEMPLER.

Principal and Surety—Fraud—Innocent Misrepresentation—Release.

An innocent party to a fraud committed by another will not be allowed to derive any benefit from that fraud, unless there has been a consideration moving from himself. Therefore, where a surety innocently joined with his principal in persuading the creditor to accept a transfer of a pretended mortgage, which turned out to have no existence, and to release the surety from his liability—Held, that such a release was inoperative.

The friends of a surety advanced money to satisfy his private debts, stipulating, however, as a condition of such advance, that he should be released from his liability as surety. The surety having been released under the circumstances above mentioned,—Held, that the creditor was not entitled to set aside the release without repaying to the friends the money advanced by them.

Observations on Ex parte Wilson (1).

The bill stated, that in 1850 the plaintiff discounted for William Bell, one of the defendants, who had since absconded, two joint and several promissory notes for 150*l.* each, signed by Bell, and also by the defendant Templer, and later in the same year he agreed to advance to Bell a further sum, if the defendants would give two joint and several promissory notes for 500*l.* to secure the two sums of 150*l.* and the further sum required, and upon condition that the plaintiff should be at liberty to retain and negotiate the two bills for 150*l.*, and hold the amount when received in part satisfaction of the amount to be secured on the 500*l.* notes. The plaintiff accordingly advanced the sum required, and received from Bell two joint and several promissory notes for 500*l.* each, signed by both defendants.

In February 1851 the plaintiff advanced to Bell a further sum upon a bill of exchange for 600*l.*, drawn by Bell and accepted by Templer. This bill was presented at maturity and dishonoured.

The plaintiff was afterwards applied to to make a further advance of 500*l.* on the security of a bill or note signed by both defendants, but declined to do so.

It was then proposed that the plaintiff should take a transfer of a mortgage for 5,000*l.*, to which Bell represented that he was entitled, upon the estate of Mr. Mirehouse in Wales, stating that the money had been lent by his father, who held the mortgage and title-deeds on his behalf, and Templer strongly urged the plaintiff to do so, alleging all would be right, and that he would have a better security for his money than he then possessed.

To this arrangement the plaintiff agreed, on condition that the original mortgage and the title-deeds were to be given up to him when Bell got them out of his father's possession. Accordingly a deed of transfer was prepared, which, after reciting the alleged mortgage from Mirehouse, purported to transfer the same to the plaintiff.

The deed of transfer was dated the 13th of June 1851, and was executed by Bell and attested by Templer. Bell then requested that the promissory notes and bill of exchange might be delivered up, but the plaintiff declined to give them up until he received the title-deeds of the mortgaged premises.

In the autumn of 1851 Templer compromised with some of his creditors, the arrangement for payment of the composition extending over several years, and his relations rendering some assistance. Previously to doing so he called on the plaintiff, and told him his friends would not assist him in arranging with his own private creditors, unless he was released from his liability on the promissory notes and bill, and he also intimated that, unless he was so released, bankruptcy or insolvency would be the consequence. He also alleged, that the plaintiff would be quite safe in so releasing him, as the mortgage was a sufficient security. The plaintiff, therefore, relying on the transfer of the mortgage, and in the belief that it was a valid mortgage security, was induced to give the defendant Templer a letter as follows:—

“Leeds, 24th July 1851.

“My dear Sir,—Mr. Bell having arranged with me for repayment of the 1,600*l.* which I advanced to him, with lawful interest thereon, I beg to state, for the satisfaction of your friends and relatives, as well as yourself, that I do not hold you in any way responsible to me for the above sum.”

Shortly after this Templer called on the plaintiff, and stated that his friends were not satisfied with the letter, inasmuch as the plaintiff might indorse the notes and bill to some other person, and the plaintiff was induced, by the defendant still assuring him that the transfer was a perfectly good security, to add a postscript to the letter, as follows:—“P.S. Of course, I have struck your name out of the securities.” And he did thereupon strike Templer's name out of the two 500*l.* notes and the acceptance of the bill of exchange.

The bill further stated that the plaintiff afterwards made many applications to Bell and Templer for the mortgage and title-deeds, but could not obtain them, and upon applying to Bell's father for the deeds, he discovered that no such mortgage existed; that all the representations made by Bell as to the pretended mortgage were untrue; that the pretended transfer was prepared when Bell well knew that he had no interest in the pretended mortgage; and that Templer had no reason to believe that Bell was entitled to the said pretended mortgage, or that it existed, or that the said pretended transfer which he had assisted in preparing was not utterly worthless.

In December 1852 the plaintiff wrote to Templer, reminding him that he was induced to take the pretended security without the title-deeds, entirely on the representations made by Bell and himself, and
